Whilst the Highlanders were proclaiming King James at the Cross of Edinburgh, Sir John Cope was landing his troops at Dunbar, a small port twenty-seven miles east from the capital. That doughty general, after making a wide circuit, and performing a rapid sea-voyage in order to get once more in front of the Chevalier, probably finding his nerves braced by the keen air of Aberdeen, now resolved to give the Highland army that opportunity of battle which he had formerly declined.

This gentleman's character has been the theme of so much ridicule among the Jacobites, and such severe censure among the whigs, that the present popular impression regarding it is perhaps extremely inaccurate. "He was, in fact," says the writer of an article in the Quarterly Review, "by no means either a coward or a bad soldier, or even a contemptible general upon ordinary occasions. He was a pudding-headed, thick-brained sort of person, who could act well enough in circumstances with which he was conversant, especially as he was perfectly acquainted with the routine of his profession, and had been often engaged in action, without ever, until the fatal field of Preston, having shown sense enough to run away. On the present occasion, he was, as sportsmen say, at fault." Even this is a more severe view of his character than his conduct throughout this whole campaign will well justify. From a letter which he wrote to Lord Milton when at Inverness, it appears that, instead of being inclined to adhere in the present distressing case to the ordinary rules of business, he was an advocate for measures equally irregular and energetic with those of the Highlanders. It also appears from the same document, that he lacked no zeal in the cause intrusted to him, but that he had all along conducted himself with as much activity, as the circumstances in which he was placed, and the means in his power, rendered possible or necessary.

Sir John's infantry was reinforced at Dunbar by the craven dragoons, who had fled thither as the safest place within their reach. "The behaviour of these gentlemen, 'whose business it was to die,' " remarks the reviewer just quoted, "was even less edifying than that of the citizen-volunteers, whose business, as Fluellin says to Pistol, was 'to live and eat their victuals.' " The following lively description of it," he continues, "from the pen, it is believed, of David Hume, will not be altogether impertinent to the subject, and may probably amuse the reader. After remarking that cavalry ought to have the same advantage over irregular infantry, which veteran infantry possess over cavalry, and that particularly in the case of Highlanders, whom they encounter with their own weapon, the broadsword, and who neither formed platoons, nor had bayonets or any other long weapon to withstand a charge,—after noticing, moreover, that if it were too sanguine to expect a victory, Brigadier Fowke, who had two regiments of cavalry, might at least have made a leisurely and regular retreat, though he had advanced within musket-shot of his enemy, before a column that could not turn out five mounted horsemen, he proceeds thus:—'Before the rebels came within sight of the king's forces, before they came within three miles distance of them, orders were issued to the dragoons to wheel, which they immediately did with the greatest order and regularity imaginable. As it is known that nothing is more beautiful than the evolutions and movements of cavalry, the spectators stood in expectation of what fine manoeuvre they might terminate in; when new orders were immediately issued to retreat they immediately obeyed, and began to march in the usual pace of cavalry. Orders were repeated every furlong to quicken their pace, and both precept and example concurring, they quickened it so well that, before they reached Edinburgh, they quickened it to a very smart gallop. They passed in inexpressible hurry and confusion through the narrow lanes at Barefoot's Parks, in the sight of all the north part of Edinburgh, to the infinite joy of the disaffected, and equal grief and consternation of all the other inhabitants. They rushed like a torrent down to Leith, where they endeavoured to draw breath; but some unlucky boy (I suppose a Jacobite in his heart) calling to them that the Highlanders were approaching, they immediately took to their heels again, and galloped to Prestonpans, about five miles farther. There, in a literal sense, timor addidit alas—there fear added wings, I mean to the rebels. For, otherwise, they could not possibly have imagined these formidable enemies to be within several miles of them. But at Prestonpans, the same alarm was repeated. The Philistines be upon thee, Sampson! They galloped to North Berwick, and being now about twenty miles to the other side of Edinburgh, they thought they might safely dismount from their horses, and look out for victuals. Accordingly, like the ancient Grecian heroes, each began to kill and dress his provisions: egit amor dapis atque pugnae; they were actuated by the desire of supper and of battle. The sheep and turkeys of north Berwick paid for this warlike disposition. But behold the uncertainty of human happiness! When the mutton was just ready to be put upon the table, they heard, or thought they heard, the same cry of Highlanders. Their fear proved stronger than their hunger; they again got on horseback; but were informed of the falseness of the alarm, time enough to prevent the spoiling of their meal. By such rudiments as these, the dragoons were so thoroughly initiated in the art of running, that at the battle of Preston, they could practise it of themselves, though even there the same good example was not wanting. I have seen an Italian opera called Cesare in Egitto, Cæsar in Egypt, where in the first scene, Cæsar is introduced in a great hurry, giving orders to his soldiers, fugge, fugge, a' llo scampo—fly, fly, to your heels! This is a proof that the commander at the Colt-bridge is not the first hero that gave such orders to his troops."

The "Canter of Coltbridge," as this disgraceful retreat was popularly termed, is related by Mr. Home with circumstances somewhat different, but not less ridiculous. After passing through Leith and Musselburgh, they encamped for the evening in a field near Colonel Gardiner's house, at Preston, that venerable officer taking up his quarters in his own dwelling. Between ten and eleven at night, one of their number going in search of forage, fell into a disused coal pit, which was full of water, and making a dreadful outcry for assistance, impressed his companions with a belief that their dreaded enemy was upon them. Not stopping to ascertain the real cause of the noise, or to relieve their unfortunate fellow-soldier, the whole mounted their horses, and with all imaginable speed galloped off to Dunbar. Colonel Gardiner, awakening in the morning, found a silent and deserted camp, and was obliged, with a heavy heart, to follow in the direction which he learned they had taken. There was little danger that he should have missed their track, for, as he passed along, he found the road strewed with swords, pistols, and firelocks, which they had thrown away in their panic. He caused these to be gathered, and conveyed in covered carts to Dunbar, where he arrived in time to greet General Cope as he landed. The mind of this gallant old officer and excellent man, seems to have been depressed to the very point where life ceases to be prized, by the shameful conduct of his men; and circumstances seem to warrant a supposition, that he now resolved to sacrifice himself, as he did, at once in atonement for their misbehaviour, and in order to escape the infamy in which they had involved his name.

The disembarkation of the troops, artillery, and stores, was not completed till Thursday the 18th; when Mr. Home, author of the history already quoted, presented himself at the camp, and gave the general all the information he could desire, regarding the numbers and condition of the highland army. The author of Douglas had gone to the different posts about the city, and counted the men there stationed; he had then ascended the hill which overlooked the bivouack of the main body, and reckoned them as they sat at food in lines upon the ground. The whole number, in his estimation, did not exceed two thousand; but he had been told that several bodies from the North were on their march to join them. The general asked his informant what sort of appearance they made, and, in particular, how were they armed; to which the young poet replied, that most of them seemed to be strong, active, hardy men, though many were of an ordinary size, and, if clothed like Lowlanders, would appear inferior to the king's troops. The Highland garb, he said, favoured them, as it showed their naked limbs, which were strong and muscular; while their stern countenances, and bushy uncombed hair, gave them a fierce, barbarous, and imposing aspect. As to their arms, he continued, they had no artillery of any sort, but one small unmounted cannon, which he had seen lying upon a cart, drawn by a little Highland pony. Fourteen or fifteen hundred of them were armed with firelocks and broadswords, and many others had only either the one or the other of these weapons. Their firelocks were of all sorts and sizes, muskets, fuscées, and fowlingpieces; but they must soon provide themselves more generally with that weapon, as the arsenal of the Trained Bands had fallen into their hands. In the mean time, he had seen one or two companies, amounting altogether perhaps to an hundred men, each of whom had no other weapon than the blade of a scythe fastened end-long upon a pole. General Cope dismissed Mr. Home, with many compliments, for bringing him so accurate and intelligent an account of the enemy.

The king's army was joined at Dunbar by several judges and other civil officers, who, having fled from Edinburgh on the evening before the prince had entered it, now resolved to remain with the royal troops, not as fighting men, but as anxious and interested spectators of the approaching action. Cope received at the same time a few more effective reinforcements in the shape of noblemen and gentlemen of the country, who came to him attended with their tenants in arms. Among the latter was the Earl of Home, who, being then an officer in the guards, thought it his duty to offer his services when the king's troops were in the field. The retinue which this nobleman brought along with him, was such as to surprise many persons. At the time when the Lowlands of Scotland were equally warlike, and equally under the influence of the feudal system, with the Highlands, his lordship's ancestors could have raised as many men upon their dominions in Berwickshire, as would have themselves repelled the Chevalier's little army. Even so late as 1633, the Earl of Home had greeted Charles the First, as he crossed the border to visit Scotland, at the head of six hundred well-mounted gentlemen, his relations and retainers. All that the present earl could bring, besides himself, to assist his sovereign in opposing a public enemy, was two body servants!

It was not till the day succeeding the disembarkation, Thursday the 19th of September, that the royal army left Dunbar to meet the insurgents. It is said to have made a great show upon its march; the infantry, cavalry, cannon, and baggage, occupying at once several miles of road. The people of the country, long accustomed to war and arms, flocked from all quarters to see an army going to fight a battle in Lothian: and, with infinite concern and anxiety, beheld this uncommon spectacle.

The army halted for the night in a field to the west of Haddington, sixteen miles east of Edinburgh. In the evening, it was proposed to employ some young people who followed the camp, to ride betwixt Haddington and Edinburgh, during the dark hours, lest the Highlanders, whose movements were rapid, should march in the night-time and surprise the army. A proposal so obviously beneficial was seconded by the general; and accordingly, sixteen young men, most of whom had been volunteers at Edinburgh, and among whom the author of Douglas was one, offered their services. About nine at night, eight of them set out, in four parties, by four different roads, for Duddingstone, where they understood the Highlanders to be encamped. They returned safe at midnight, reporting that all was quiet; and the other eight then set out in the same manner. But all the individuals of the second party were not alike fortunate or dexterous, in performing their portion of duty.

It was the duty of two of this little corps to observe the coast road towards Musselburgh. Their names were Francis Garden and Robert Cunningham—the one afterwards better known by his senatorial title of Lord Gardenstone, and the other by his official designation of general. On approaching Musselburgh, says the lively reviewer just quoted, "they avoided the bridge to escape observation, and crossed the Eske, it being then low water, at a place nigh its junction with the sea. Unluckily there was, at the opposite side, a snug, thatched tavern, kept by a cleanly old woman called Luckie F——, who was eminent for the excellence of her oysters and sherry. The patrols were both bon-vivants,—one of them, whom we remember in the situation of a scotor, was unusually so, and a gay, witty, agreeable companion besides. Luckie's sign, and the heap of oyster-shells deposited near her door, proved as great a temptation to this vigilant forlorn-hope, as the wine-house to the Abbess of Andouillet's muletter. They had scarcely got settled at some right pandore, with a bottle of sherry as an accompaniment, when, as some Jacobite devil would have it, an unlucky North-country lad, a writer's (that is, attorney's) apprentice, who had given his indentures the slip, and taken the white cockade, chanced to pass by on his errand to join Prince Charlie.* He saw the two volunteers through the window, knew them, and guessed their business;—he saw the tide would make it impossible for them to return along the sands as they had come. He therefore placed himself in ambush upon the steep, narrow, impracticable bridge, which was then, and for many years afterwards, the only place of crossing the Eske; and how he contrived it I could never learn, but the courage and assurance of his province are proverbial, and the Norland whipper-snapper surrounded and made prisoners of the two unfortunate volunteers, before they could draw a trigger."

They were immediately conducted to the camp at

* The reason why Charles's name is so generally diminished in this manner by popular parlance, seems to be, that the Erse or Gaelic translation of Charles is Charlich or Charli. The Lowlanders must have adopted the name generally given to him by his adherents.

Duddingstone, and put into the hands of John Roy Stuart, commander of the Prince's Body-Guard, who at once pronounced them spies, and proposed to hang them accordingly. Thrown into a dreadful consternation by this sentence, they luckily recollected that a youthful acquaintance, by name Colquhoun Grant, bore a commission in the very body which John Roy commanded: and they entreated him to lead them before that person, who was able to attest their innocence. Colquhoun Grant, who lived many years afterwards as a respectable writer to the signet at Edinburgh, used to relate that he never was so much surprised in his life, and at the same time amused, as when his two young friends were brought up to him for his verdict. Roy Stuart introduced them with the following words:—"Here are two fellows, who have been caught prowling near the camp. I am certain they are spies, at least this oldest one (Mr. Garden,) and I propose that, to make sure, we should hang them both." Mr. Grant, of course, interfered in behalf of his friends, and afterwards, getting them into his own custody, took it upon him to permit their escape.

On the morning of the succeeding day, Friday the 20th of September, Cope continued his march towards Edinburgh, by the ordinary post-road from Haddington. After marching a very few miles, it occurred to him, that the defiles and inclosures near the road would, in case of an attack, prove unfavourable to the action of cavalry; and he resolved to adopt a less frequented and more open path. On coming to Huntington, therefore, he turned off to the right, and took what is called the Low Road, that is, the road which traverses the Low country near the sea, passing by St. Germains and Seton. At the same time, he sent forward his adjutant-general, the Earl of Loudoun, accompanied by the Earl of Home, to mark out a camp for the army near Musselburgh, intending to go no further that day. During the march, his soldiers were in the highest spirits; the infantry feeling confident in the assistance of the cavalry, and the cavalry, who had betrayed still greater pusillanimity when unsupported, acquiring the same courage by a junction with the infantry.

The first files of the troops were entering the plain between Seton and Preston, when Lord Loudoun came back at a round pace, with information, that the Highlanders were in full march towards the royal army. The general surprised, but not disconcerted by this intelligence, and thinking the plain which lay before him a very proper place to receive the enemy, called a halt there, and drew up his troops with a front to the west. His right was thus extended to the sea, and his left towards the village of Tranent. Soon after he had taken up his ground, the Chevalier's army came in sight.

CHAPTER XII.

THE PRINCE'S MARCH TO PRESTON.

When Charlie looked this letter upon,
He drew his sword the scabbard from,
Crying, "Follow me, my merry, merry men,
And we'll gie Johnnie Cope his morning!"
Jacobite Song.

Three days of rest at Edinburgh, where they were supplied with plenty of food, and did not want opportunities of improving their appointments, had meanwhile increased in no inconsiderable degree the efficacy and confidence of "Charlie and his men." Learning that Cope had landed at Dunbar, and was marching to give him battle, the prince came to Duddingstone on Thursday night, where, calling a council of war, he proposed to march next morning, and meet the enemy half way. The council agreed, that this was the only thing they could do; and Charles then asked the Highland chiefs, how they thought their men would behave in meeting a general who had already avoided them. The chiefs desired MacDonald of Keppoch to speak for them, as he had served in the French army, and was thought to know best what the Highlanders could do against regular troops. Keppoch's speech was brief, but emphatic. He said, that the country having been long at peace, and few or none of the private men having ever seen a battle, it was difficult to foretell how they would behave; but he would venture to assure his royal highness, that the gentlemen would be in the midst of the enemy, and that the clansmen, devoted to their chiefs, and loving the cause, would certainly not be far behind them. Charles, catching the spirit of the moment, exclaimed he would be the first man to charge the foe, and so set, if possible, a still more striking example of attack! But the chiefs disavowed this imprudent proposal; declaring that in his life lay the strength of their cause, and that, should he be slain, they would be undone beyond redemption, whether victorious or defeated. They even went so far as to declare, that they would go home, and endeavour to make the best terms they could for themselves, if he persisted in so rash a resolution. This remonstrance with difficulty repressed the ardour of their young commander, whose great passion at this moment seems to have been to strike a decisive blow, and share personally in its glory.

On the morning of Friday the 20th of September, when the king's army was commencing its march from Haddington, the Highlanders roused themselves from their shelterless lairs, near Duddingstone, and prepared to set forward. They had been reinforced since day-break by a party of Grants from Glenmorriston, as they had been the day before by some MacLauchlans and Atholemen. The prince, putting himself at the head of his army, thus increased two hundred and fifty, presented his sword, and said aloud, "My friends, I have thrown away the scabbard!" He was answered by a cheerful hurra; and the band then set forward in three files, Charles marching on horseback by their side, along with some of his principal officers.

The situation of the Highland camp, or rather bivouac, was not so near the village, as it was to the mill of Duddingstone. It was pitched in a snug and sheltered place upon the banks of the Figgat Burn, within the present park around Duddingstone House, and immediately adjacent to the cauld or dam-head belonging to the mill. The nearest road from that point towards the bridge of Musselburgh, where the army had to cross the Eke, was of course that old and pleasant path, which, leading down between two luxuriant hedges, passes the little village of Easter Duddingstone, and joins the post-road, near Magdalene Bridge. Along this retired and rural way Charles passed "with all his chivalry," his whole soul bent upon the approaching combat. We have had the good fortune to converse with a lady who saw him leading his men through Easter Duddingstone, and who yet lives (1837,) at the age of eighty-nine, to describe the memorable pageant. The Highlanders strode on with their squalid clothes and various arms, their rough limbs and uncombed hair, looking around them with faces, in which were strangely blended, pride with ferocity, savage ignorance with high-souled resolution. The prince rode on amidst his officers, at a little distance from the flank of the column, preferring to amble over the dry stubble-fields beside the road. Our aged friend remembers, as yesterday, his graceful carriage and comely looks—his long light hair straggling below his neck—and the flap of his tartan coat thrown back by the wind, so as to make the star dangle for a moment clear in the air by its silken ribbon. He was viewed with admiration by the simple villagers; and even those who were ignorant of his claims, or who rejected them, could not help wishing good fortune and no calamity to so fair and so princely a young man.

Soon after falling into the post-road, the insurgents continued their march till they entered the market-gate of Fisher-row, an old narrow street leading to the bridge. One of their number there went up to a new house upon which the tilers were engaged, and took up a long slip of wood technically called a tile-lath; from another house he abstracted an ordinary broom, which he tied upon the end of the pole. This he bore aloft over his head, emblematising what seemed to be the general sentiment of the army, that they would sweep their enemies off the face of the earth. De Ruyter, the Dutch admiral, it will be recollected, in the reign of Charles the Second, affixed the same ensign to his top-mast, to signify that he had swept the British fleet out of the Channel; and it is probable that the Highlander merely copied the idea from that famous incident. The shouts with which the symbol was hailed on the present occasion, testified the high courage and resolution of the troops, and but too truly presaged the issue of the approaching conflict. Charles, in passing along the market-gate, bowed to the ladies who surveyed him from the windows, bending to those who were young or beautiful even till his hair mingled with the mane of his charger. To all the crowd he maintained an aspect of the most winning sweetness. There was there also many a fair young chieftain, and many a gay Angus cavalier, who imitated his polite behaviour, and rivalled his gallant carriage, though without coming in for a due share of that enviable observation which, in Milton's phrase, was "rained" upon their leader. Never again shall that old street behold a scene so animating or so grand—may it never witness one so pregnant with sorrow and with blood!

The army now passed along the ancient bridge which there crosses the Eke; a structure supposed to be of Roman origin, and over which the Scottish army had passed, two centuries before, to the field of Pinkie; a structure over which all of noble or of kingly, that had approached Edinburgh for at least a thousand years, must certainly have passed; which has borne processions of monks, and marches of armies, and trains of kings; which has rattled under the feet of Mary's frolic steed, and thundered beneath the war-horse of Cromwell. Proceeding directly onward, the column traversed, not the town of Musselburgh, but the old kirk-road, as it is called, to Inveresk, and entered the street of Newbigging about the centre. It then marched along the precincts of Pinkie Clench, and sought the high grounds near Carberry; two localities memorable in Scottish history, for the disaster and the shame with which they are connected.

The reason of Charles having taken this unusual path was, that he wished to get the advantage of Cope, by occupying the high ground to the south. He went up Edge-buckling Brae, where Somerset's steel-clad bands once hovered over the Scottish army; passed by the west side of Walleyford; and ascended Fawside Hill. Here, learning that Cope was much nearer the sea than he expected, he turned a little to the left, and drew his men down the gently declining hill towards the post-road, where he knew that he would still be sufficiently above the lines of his enemy. Entering the road at Doup-histon, he marched up Birsley Brae, till, about half a mile from the west side of Tranent, coming within sight of General Cope, he halted and formed his army.

At this early stage of the campaign, the mode of forming the Highland army was extremely simple, on account of the want of horse and artillery. The column in which it always moved, was merely halted at the proper place, and then, facing about, became at once a line. Such was the evolution by which, on the present occasion, Charles brought his men to their first tele-d-tele with the devoted troops of his antagonist.

When the royal troops first perceived the Highlanders, they uttered a vehement and spirited shout, to which the others replied with a yell, that rolled down the hollow ground towards them like the echoes of thunder. The two armies were about a mile distant from each other, with a gentle descent and a long stripe of marshy ground between. It was a little after noon, and the weather was favourable for immediate combat. Both armies had marched the equal distance of eight miles, and were alike fresh and ardent. It was Charles's wish, as it had been his expectation, to engage his foes before night-fall; and the ground appeared perfectly favourable for the purpose. The descent towards Cope's position, though gentle, was sufficient to increase the natural speed and impetuosity of the Highlanders, who have a maxim, (used by Evan dhu Maccombich in "Waverley,") that even "the haggis, God bless her, can charge down hill," and whose ancestors had been always successful in conflicts fought in that manner. But Cope had not the same eager desire of battle: and various considerations, arising from the nature of the ground, interposed to prevent an immediate attack on the part of the Highlanders.

The English general had at first arranged his troops with their front to the west, expecting the enemy to come directly from Musselburgh; but when he saw them appear on the southern heights, he altered his position accordingly, and now lay upon a plain swelling gently up from the coast, with Cockenzie and the sea behind him, the intricate little village of Preston, with its numerous parks and garden-walls on his right, Seton House at a distance on his left, and a deep ditch or drain traversing the morass before him. On all sides but the east, he was inaccessible, except perhaps by a column, which no enemy could ever have thought of directing against him. His position was very strong, but of that sort of strength which is rather calculated for a siege than a battle; and the only merit which can be allowed to him for his choice, is, that he does not seem to have calculated it for a fight.

By examining the country people, who, as usual, flocked about him in great numbers, the prince soon learned that to attack General Cope across the morass, was impracticable except at a frightful risk. In order to ascertain the fact still more satisfactorily, Lord George Murray despatched an officer of military experience, to survey and report upon the ground. The person selected for this service, or who volunteered to perform it, was Mr. Ker of Gradon; and the perilous duty was executed in a manner which commanded admiration from both armies. Mounted upon a little white poney, Mr. Ker descended alone from Tranent, and with the greatest deliberation approached the post of the enemy. When very near it, he rode slowly along the edge of the morass, carefully inspecting the ground on all sides, and scanning the breadth and depth of the ditch with peculiar accuracy. A few shots were fired at him by the king's troops, who were not above two hundred yards off; but he did not pay the slightest attention to them. So great, indeed, was his coolness, that, on approaching a stone fence which he required to cross, he dismounted, pulled down a piece of the dyke, and then led his horse through the breach. When he had completely satisfied himself, he returned to the army in the same soldier-like manner, and reported his observations to the lieutenant-general. The morass, he said, could not be passed, without the troops being exposed to several unreturned fires, and was therefore not to be thought of. When Charles learned this, he moved a considerable part of his army back to Douphistone, and affected to meditate an attack upon Cope's west or right flank. The English general, observing this, resumed his first position, in order to meet the insurgents with the front of his army.

Charles, probably deterred from making an attack in this quarter by the park-dykes which so effectually screened the enemy's front, now once more shifted his ground, and returned to his first station near Tranent. The king's army faced round at the same time, so as to occasion a bystander to exclaim, in derision of these ineffectual movements, what has since become a proverbial expression, "Why, they're just where they were, wi' their faces to Tranent." The whole afternoon was occupied by these evolutions, which resembled nothing so much as the last moves of a well-contested game of draughts, where a bold player is perpetually attempting to set a wily one. When evening approached, General Cope found himself still in possession of the advantageous ground he had originally chosen; but it was feared by some unconcerned spectators that he had been perhaps over-cautious in his evolutions—that he had cooped himself up in a narrow place, while the Highlanders were at liberty to move about as they pleased—and that he had disheartened his men by keeping them so carefully on the defensive, while the Highlanders were proportionably animated by the certainty of making the attack.

Cope had not acted altogether on the defensive. He had sent off a few cannon-shots, one of which wounded a Cameron in the arm, as he stood at his post below Tranent church. This made the Highlanders remove farther back, and take up their station on some ground, then wild and covered with furze, south-west of Tranent, where there was a swell or gentle eminence intervening betwixt them and the enemy's cannon. Charles, however, posted five hundred men under Lord Nairn at Preston, to the west of Cope's position, to prevent him from stealing a march in that direction; and, by posting parties at all the roads round about, he seemed to express a determined resolution to hem in and make sure work of his cautious enemy.

A little incident, personal to the prince, occurred in the course of the afternoon, which, preserved by tradition, serves to show that he never neglected an opportunity of making himself popular. As he was passing the house of Windygowl, about a quarter of a mile south-east of Tranent, a number of ladies came out to greet him. One of the party, more enthusiastic than the rest, approached him, and desired to kiss his royal hand. He not only granted this favour, but took the girl in his arms, and gave her a kiss of his lips also; calling her, in conclusion, "a bonnie lassie." It would appear from this that, in accordance with the policy which induced him to wear the Highland habit, he had studied to learn the phrases of compliment peculiar to Scotland, wisely judging that they would be much more effective with a Scottish ear than any others. It would indeed appear that he used the endearing epithet above mentioned upon system; for we remember an ancient dame who used to tell, with an innocent air of vanity strangely in contrast with her aged face, that as she passed the prince on Glasgow Green, at a later period of his campaign, he clasped her on the head, and "called her a bonnie lassie."

At a late period of the afternoon, when all thoughts of the battle had been given up for the night, Charles went with two of his officers, one of whom was the Duke of Perth, to an inn at Tranent, and desired to have dinner. Tranent, though a large, is also a poor village; and its principal inn was then a house of no great splendour. It consisted of only two rooms, a but and a ben, Anglicé, a kitchen and parlour. Humble as it was, however, Prince Charles condescended to enter it, and accept of its meagre hospitalities. The name of the good publican, who was also the chief butcher of the village, was James Allan; his wife had previously concealed her service of pewter, and every small article of value belonging to her house, for fear of the wild Highlanders; so that she was now much less able than usual to entertain such distinguished guests. She could not present her coarse soup, or kail, in any better dish than a huge shallow one turned out of wood; and she could purvey no more than two wooden spoons for her three guests. Down they sat, however, around her plain deal board; and, the prince appropriating one whole spoon, while his two officers enjoyed the other by rotation, they soon made an end of their broth. Mrs. Allan then put the meat with which her soup had been made, into the same wooden dish, and, presenting them with the knife used by her husband in his professional immolations, told them to make the best they could of what they saw before them, as she could really offer them nothing else. One of them having cut the meat into small pieces, they ate it with their fingers, using bannocks of barley-meal for bread. It would appear that Charles had afterwards provided himself with a portable knife and fork for the exigencies of his campaign; as a lady presented a set of eating utensils, attested to have been his, to the king when he visited Edinburgh. On the present occasion, he purchased five bullocks from James Allan for the use of his army, and amply paid for both his own dinner and that of his adherents.

Since the insurgents had first risen in Lochaber, the weather had been extremely fine. "Indeed," says the Caledonian Mercury, in allusion to this fact, "it has been more mild and comforting in September than it has ever been in June for the last half century." The nights, however, though calm, were chill, as generally happens in the finest autumn weather under this northern climate. The night of Friday the 20th of September, 1745, set in with a cold mist, which, without doing any particular injury to the hardy children of the north, was infinitely annoying to their opponents, less accustomed to night bivouacking, and obliged to be more upon the alert in case of a night attack. Under these disagreeable circumstances, General Cope lighted great fires all round his position, to warm and inspirit his men. He also threw off a few cothorns during the night, to let the enemy know he was, in the words of the song, "waukin yet." At an early period of the evening, he had planted pickets with great care in every direction around him, especially towards the east. He had also sent his military chest and baggage down to Cockenzie, under a strong guard.

The royal army was arranged along the front of the morass in a manner displaying considerable military skill. The centre consisted of eight companies of Lascelles's regiment, and two of Guise's. On the right were five companies of Lees's; on the left the whole of Sir John Murray's. Besides these, there were a number of recruits for different regiments at present abroad, and a few small parties of volunteers, comprising the gentlemen with their tenants already mentioned, and some persons who had been induced to join by the enthusiasm of religion. The infantry was protected, on the right flank by Gardiner's, on the left by Hamilton's dragoons; who stood each with two troops to the front, and one in the rear for a reserve. The cannon, six pieces in all, guarded by a company of Lees's regiment, commanded by Captain Cochrane, and under the orders of Lieutenant-Colonel Whiteford, were placed on the right of the army, near the wagon-road or railway from Tranent to Cockenzie.

The army of Cope altogether consisted of 2100 men; but a number of these did not fight in the subsequent engagement, being engaged elsewhere as videttes and guards. The artillery was by far the most hopeless of all the component parts of the army. At the time when General Cope marched to the north, there were no gunners or matrosses to be had in broad Scotland, but one old man, who had belonged to the Scots train of artillery before the Union. Him, and three old invalid soldiers, the general carried on with him to Inverness; and the hopeful band was afterwards re-inforced by a few sailors from the ship of war which escorted the troops to Dunbar. A more miserable troop was perhaps never before, or since, entrusted with so important a charge.

As soon as it became dark, the Highland army moved from the west to the east side of Tranent, where the morass seemed to be more practicable; and a council of war being called, it was resolved to attack the enemy in that quarter at break of day. The Highlanders, wrapping themselves up in their plaids, then laid themselves down to sleep upon the stubble-fields. Charles, whose pleasure it had all along been to share in the fatigues and privations of his men, rejecting the opportunity of an easier couch in the village, also made his lodging "upon the cold ground." During the night, not a light was to be seen, and not a word to be heard in his bivouack, in obedience to an order which had been issued, for the purpose of concealing their position from Sir John Cope.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE BATTLE OF PRESTON.

*Brav.—Slaying is the word;
It is a deed in fashion.*

Julius Caesar.

A circumstance now occurred, in itself trivial, but upon which the fate of the subsequent day seems to have almost entirely depended. Mr. Robert Anderson (the son of Anderson of Whitbrough in East Lothian,) a gentleman who joined the insurgents at Edinburgh, had been present at the council which determined the place and mode of attack, but did not take the liberty to speak or give his opinion. After the dismissal of the council, Anderson told his friend Mr. Hepburn of Keith, that he knew the ground well, and thought there was a better way to come at the king's army than that which the council had resolved to follow. "I could undertake," he added, "to show them a place where they might easily pass the morass without being seen by the enemy, and form without being exposed to their fire." Anderson listened attentively to this information, and expressed his opinion of it in such terms, that Anderson desired he would carry him to Lord George Murray. Mr. Hepburn advised him to go alone to the lieutenant-general, with whom he was already perfectly well acquainted, and who would like best to receive any information of this sort without the presence of a third party. Anderson immediately sought Lord George, whom he found asleep in a field of cut peas, with the prince and several of the chiefs lying near him. The young gentleman immediately awoke his lordship, and proceeded to inform him of his project. To Lord George it appeared so eligible, that he hesitated not a moment to use the same freedom with the prince which Mr. Anderson had used with him. Charles sat up on his bed of peas-straw, and listened to the scheme with great attention. He then caused Lochiel and the other leaders to be called and taken into council. They all approved of the plan; and a resolution was instantly passed to take advantage of Mr. Anderson's offers of service. It was justly considered strange that a youthful country gentleman, who had never seen an army, should have thus given advice to a band of military officers, some of whom had considerable experience, and that that advice eventually proved not more excellent than successful.

Lord Nairn's party being recalled from Preston, the Highland army began to move about three o'clock in the morning (Saturday, 21st September,) when the sun was as yet three hours below the horizon. It was thought necessary, on this occasion, to reverse the order of march, by shifting the rear of the column to the van. Mr. Ke, already mentioned with applause for the deliberation with which he surveyed Cope's position on the preceding evening, managed this evolution with his characteristic skill and prudence. Passing slowly from the head to the other end of the column, desiring the men as he went along to observe the strictest silence, he turned the rear forward, making the men wheel round his own person till they were all on the march. Mr. Anderson led the way. Next to him was MacDonald of Glenaladale, Major of the Clanranald regiment, with a chosen body of sixty men, appointed to secure Cope's baggage whenever they saw the armies engaged. Close behind came the army, marching as usual in a column of three men abreast. They came down by a sort of valley, or hollow, that winds through the farm of Ringan-head. Not a whisper was heard amongst them. At first their march was concealed by darkness, and, when daylight began to appear, by the mist already mentioned. When they were near the morass, some dragoons who stood upon the other side as an advanced guard, called out, "Who's there?" The Highlanders made no answer, but marched on. The dragoons, soon perceiving who they were, fired their pieces, and rode off to give the alarm.

The ditch so often mentioned as traversing the morass, became a mill-dam at this easterly point, for the service of Seton Mill with water. The Highlanders had, therefore, not only the difficulty of wading through the bog knee-deep in mud, but also that of crossing the broad deep run of water by a narrow wooden bridge. Charles himself jumped across the dam, but fell on the other side, and got his legs and hands beslimed. The column, as it gradually cleared this impediment, moved directly onwards to the sea, till it was thought by those at the head, that all would be over the morass; and a line was then formed, in the usual manner, upon the firm and level ground.

The arrangement of the Highland army preparatory to the battle of Preston, was rather accordant with the old Scottish rules of precedence in such matters, than dictated by considerations of efficiency—was rather a matter of heraldry than of generalship. The great Clan Colla, or MacDonalds, formed the right wing, because Robert Bruce had assigned it that station at the battle of Bannockburn, in gratitude for the treatment he had received from its chief when in hiding in the Hebrides, and because it had assumed that station in every battle since, except that of Harlaw, on which occasion the post of honour was voluntarily resigned in favour of the MacLeods. The Camerons and Appin Stuarths composed the left wing, perhaps for some similar reason; while the Duke of Perth's regiment and the MacGregors stood in the centre. The Duke of Perth commanded the right wing, Lord George Murray the left.

Behind the first line which was thus disposed and thus commanded, a second was arranged at the distance of fifty yards, consisting of the Athole men, the Robertsons, the MacDonalds of Glencoe, and the MacLachlans, under the command of Lord Nairn. Charles took his place between the two lines. The whole army was rather superior in numbers to that of General Cope, being probably about 2400; but as the second line never came into action, the real number of combatants, as stated by the prince's authority after the battle, was only 1456.

Surprise being no part of the prince's plan, no regret was expressed at the alarm which the videttes had carried to the king's army; but it was thought necessary to form the lines as quickly as possible. When this was effected, Charles addressed his men in these words, "Follow me, gentlemen; and by the blessing of God, I will this day make you a free and happy people!" The Duke of Perth then sent Mr. Anderson to inform Lord George Murray that he was ready to march. Anderson met an aide-de-camp, sent by Lord George to inform the duke that the left wing was moving. Some time of course elapsed before the right wing was aware of this motion, it was a little behind the left; and the charge was thus made in an oblique manner.

It was just dawn, and the mist was fast retiring before the advance of the sun, when the Highlanders set out upon their attack. A long uninterrupted series of fields, from which the grain had recently been reaped, lay between them and General Cope's position. Morn was already on the waters of the Forth to their right, and the mist was rolling in large masses over the marsh and up the crofts to their left; but it was not yet clear enough to admit of either army seeing the other. An impervious darkness lay between, which was soon, however, to disclose to both the exciting spectacle of an armed and determined enemy. Early as was the hour, and notwithstanding the darkness, the walls of almost all the neighbouring fields around were covered by rustics and others, anxious to obtain, from a safe distance, a view of the impending conflict. On the part of the Highlanders there was perfect silence, except the rushing sound occasioned by their feet going through the stubble: on that of General Cope, only an occasional drum was to be heard, as it hoarsely pronounced some military signal.

At setting out upon the charge, the Highlanders all pulled off their bonnets, and, looking upwards, uttered a short prayer. The front-rank men, most of whom were gentlemen, and all of whom had targets, stooped as much as they could in going forward, keeping their shields in front of their heads, so as to protect almost every part of their bodies, except the limbs, from the fire which they expected. The inferior and worse-armed men behind, endeavoured to supply the want of defensive weapons by going close in rear of their companions. Every chief charged in the centre of his regiment, supported immediately on both sides by his nearest relations and principal officers; any one of whom, as of the whole clan, would have willingly substituted his person to the blow aimed at that honoured individual.

A little in advance of the second line, Charles himself went on, in the midst of a small guard. His situation was not so dangerous as it would have been if he had carried through his wish of going foremost into the enemy's lines; but, as he was only a few yards behind the front line, his position was not without peril. To prove that he had all the resolution and coolness necessary for a soldier, we may quote a circumstance incidentally mentioned in the journal of a Highland officer. This gentleman saw his royal highness, just before the meeting of the armies, leave his guard and go forward to the Duke of Perth and Clanranald, in order to give his last orders.

In returning to his guard, he passed the journalist, and said, with a smile, "Gres-ort, gres-ort,"—that is, "Make haste, make haste!"

Not only was the front line, as already mentioned, oblique, but it was soon further weakened from another cause. Soon after commencing the charge, it was found that the marsh retired southwards a little, and left some firm ground unoccupied by that extremity of the army, so that it would have been possible for Cope to turn their flank with a troop of dragoons. In order to obviate this disadvantage, the Camerons were desired by Lord George Murray to incline that way, and fill the open ground. When they had done so, there was an interval in the centre of the line, which was ordered to be filled up from the second line; but it could not be done in time. Some of the prince's officers afterwards acknowledged, that when they first saw the regular lines of the royal army, and the level rays of the new-risen sun reflected at a thousand points from the long extended series of muskets, they could not help expecting that the wavering unsteady clusters into which their own line was broken, would be defeated in a moment, and utterly swept from the field. The issue was destined to be far otherwise.

Sir John Cope, who had spent the night at the little village of Cockenzie, where his baggage was disposed under a guard, hastened to join his troops on first receiving intelligence that the Highlanders were moving towards the east. His first impression regarding their movement seems to have been, that, after finding it impossible to attack him either across the morass or through the defiles of Preston, they were now about to take up a position on the open fields to the east, in order to fight a fair battle when daylight should appear. It does not seem to have occurred to him that they would make the attack immediately; and, accordingly, although he thought proper to form his lines and turn them in the direction of the enemy, he was at last somewhat disconcerted, and his men were not a little surprised, when it was given out by the sentries that the Highlanders were upon them.

The circumstances which lead us to this conclusion will scarcely fail to impress the reader with the same idea. According to the journal-writer already quoted, the advancing mountaineers, on first coming within sight of Cope's army, heard them call out, "Who is there? Who is there? Cannons! Cannons! get ready the cannons, cannoners!" On the other hand, Andrew Henderson, a whig historian, has mentioned, in his account of the engagement, that the sentries, on first perceiving the Highland line through the mist, thought it a hedge which was gradually becoming apparent as the light increased. The event, however, was perhaps the best proof, that the royal army was somewhat taken by surprise.

The mode of fighting practised at this period by the Highlanders, though as simple as can well be conceived, was calculated with peculiar felicity to set at nought and defeat the tactics of a regular soldiery. It has been thus described by the Chevalier Johnstone, who was engaged in all the actions fought during this campaign. They advanced with the utmost rapidity towards the enemy, gave fire when within a musket-length of the object, and then, throwing down their pieces, drew their swords, and holding a dirk in their left hand along with the target, darted with fury on the enemy through the smoke of their fire. When within reach of the enemy's bayonets, bending their left knee, they contrived to receive the thrust of that weapon on their targets; then raising their arm, and with it the enemy's point, they rushed in upon the soldier, now defenceless, killed him at one blow, and were in a moment within the lines, pushing right and left with sword and dagger, often bringing down two men at once. The battle was thus decided in a moment, and all that followed was mere carnage.

Cope, informed by his retreating sentries, that the enemy was advancing, had only time to ride once along the front of his lines to encourage the men, and was just returned to his place on the right of the infantry, when he perceived, through the thin sunny mist, the dark clumps of the clans rushing swiftly and silently on towards his troops; those which were directly opposite to him being most visible, while on the left they faded away in an interminable line amongst the darkness from which they seemed gradually evolving. The indefinite and apparently innumerable clusters in which they successively burst upon his sight—the rapidity with which they advanced—the deceptive and indefinite extent given to their appearance by the mist—all conspired to appeal the unhappy general, and had no doubt an effect still less equivocal upon his troops. Little time was given for the action of fear; for, opening up one of those frightful yells, with which we have described them as accustomed to commence their battles, the Highlanders almost immediately appeared before them in all the terror-striking and overwhelming reality of savage warfare. Five of the six cannon were discharged against their left, with such effect as to make that part of the army hover for a moment upon the advance; and one volley of musketry went along the royal lines from right to left, as the clans successively came up. But all was unavailing against the ferocious resolution of the Highlanders. One discharge of muskets—one burst of flame and smoke—one long re-echoing peal of thunder-like sound—when the lightning sword flashed out from the tartan cloud, and smote with irresistible vehemence the palsied and defenceless soldiery.

The victory began, with the battle, among the Camerons. That spirited clan, notwithstanding their exposure to the cannon, and although received with a discharge of musketry by the artillery guard, ran on with undaunted speed, and were first up to the front of the enemy. Having swept over the cannon, they found themselves opposed to a squadron of dragoons under Lieutenant-Colonel Whitney, which was advancing to attack them. They had only to fire a few shots, when these dastards, not yet recovered from their former fright, wheeled about, and fled over the artillery-guard, which was accordingly dispersed. The posterior squadron of dragoons, under Colonel Gardiner himself, was then ordered to advance to the attack. Their gallant old commander led them forward, encouraging them as well as he could by the way; but they had not proceeded many steps, when, receiving a few shots from the Highlanders, they reeled, turned, and followed their companions. Lochiel had ordered his men to strike at the noses of the horses, as the best means of getting the better of their masters; but they never found a single opportunity of practising this ruse, the men having chosen to retreat while they were yet some yards distant.

If Gardiner's dragoons behaved thus ill, Hamilton's, at the other extremity of the army, may be said to have behaved still worse. No sooner had they seen their fellows flying before the Camerons, than they also turned about and fled, without having fired a carbine, and while the MacDonalds were still at a little distance.

The infantry, when deserted by those from whom they were taught to expect support, gave way on all hands, without having reloaded their pieces, or flung a single bayonet with blood. The whole at once threw down their arms, either to lighten them in their flight, or to signify that they surrendered; and many fell upon their knees before the impetuous Highlanders, to beg the quarter which, in the hurry of the moment, could scarcely be given them. One small party alone out of the army, had the resolution to make any resistance. They fought for a brief space, under the command of Colonel Gardiner, who, deserted by his own troop, and observing their gallant behaviour, thought proper to put himself at their head. They only fled when they had suffered considerably, and when their noble leader was cut down by numerous wounds. Such was the rapidity with which the Highlanders, in general, bore the royal soldiers off the field, that their second line, though only fifty yards behind, and though it ran fully as fast as the first, on coming up to the place, found nothing upon the ground but the killed and wounded. The whole battle, indeed, is said to have lasted only five or six minutes.

In the panic flight which immediately ensued, the Highlanders used their dreadful weapons with unparagoned vigour, and performed many feats of individual prowess, such as might rather adorn the pages of some ancient romance, than the authentic narrative of a modern battle. A small party of MacGregors, in particular, bearing for their only arms the blades of scythes fastened end-long upon poles, clove heads to the chin, cut off the legs of horses, and even, it is said, laid the bodies of men in two distinct pieces upon the field. With the broadsword alone, strength and skill enabled them to do prodigious execution. Men's feet and hands, and also the feet of horses, were severed from the limbs by that powerful weapon; and it is a well-authenticated fact, that "a Highland gentleman, after breaking through Murray's regiment, gave a grenadier a blow, which not only severed the arm raised to ward it off, but cut the skull an inch deep, so that the man immediately died."

The various degrees of good conduct displayed by the different clans in this singular conflict, is necessarily a very delicate subject, though one which should not be altogether neglected. The Camerons, of course, deserve the highest praise, because they were the first in action, and that although raked by artillery, which none of the rest had to endure. Yet this need not be construed as in the least degree reflecting upon, or impairing the well-won military renown of the MacDonalds, who were only prevented by a fortuitous circumstance from getting so soon up to the enemy. There never yet flowed a drop of coward blood in the veins of a MacDonald; and had the good fortune of the Camerons been theirs, it is impossible to doubt that they would have as well deserved it. Regarding the conduct of the centre of the insurgent army, we can speak less equivocally. According to MacPharig's manuscript, already quoted, the Duke of Perth's regiment, who occupied that part of the line, and most of whom had been pressed into action by their landlord, "stood stock-still like oxen," on approaching the royal troops. It was to this regiment that the scythe-armed company of MacGregors belonged. They, at least, evinced all the ardour and bravery which were so generally displayed that day by their countrymen. Disregarding the example of their immediate fellow-soldiers, they continued to rush forwards, under the command of their captain, Malcolm MacGregor, or Murray, son of Duncan Macgregor, or Murray, Craigree. A space being left betwixt them and their clan-regiment, which went on beside the Camerons, under the command of Glencairn, their chief, they edged obliquely athwart the field in that direction, in order to rank themselves beside their proper banner—an evolution which exposed them in a peculiar manner to the fire coming at that moment from the British regiments. Their captain fell before this fire, pierced with no fewer than five bullets, two of which went quite through his body. Like Marmion, however, under similar circumstances, this heroic young man, though unable to engage personally in the conflict, thought he might at least encourage his men to do so. He accordingly raised himself upon his elbow, and cried out, as loud as he could, "Look ye, my lads, I'm not dead—by G—, I shall see if any of you does not do his duty!" This speech, half whimsical as it was, is said to have actually communicated an impulse to his men, and perhaps contributed, with other acts of individual heroism, to decide the fate of the day.

The general result of the battle of Preston, may be stated as having been the total overthrow and almost entire destruction of the royal army. We have already mentioned, that Cope did not seem to have calculated his position for a flight. His troops now found the fatal consequences of that oversight. Most of the infantry, falling back upon the park-walls of Preston, were there huddled together without the power of resistance into a confused drove, and had either to surrender or be cut in pieces. Many, in vainly attempting to climb over the walls, fell an easy prey to the ruthless claymores. Nearly four hundred, it is said, were thus slain, seven hundred taken, while only about an hundred and seventy in all succeeded in effecting their escape.

Their dragoons, with worse conduct, were much more fortunate. In falling back, they had the good luck to find outlets from their respective positions, by the roads which run along the various extremities of the park-wall; and they thus got clear through the village with very little slaughter; after which, as the Highlanders had no horse to pursue them, they were quite safe. Several officers, among whom were Fowkes and Lascelles, escaped down to Cockenzie, and along Seton Sands, in a direction strangely contrary to the general flight.

The unfortunate Cope,—who, though personally unscathed, may be considered the chief sufferer by this disaster,—had attempted, at the first break of Gardiner's dragoons, to stop and rally them, but was borne headlong, with the confused bands, through the narrow road to the south of the enclosures, notwithstanding all his efforts to the contrary. On getting quite beyond the village, where he was joined by the retreating bands of the other regiment, he made one desperate effort to retrieve the fortune of the day. But their lesson of retreat had taken too certain effect upon their minds to be unlearned at this juncture. They fled on in spite of him, ducking their heads along their horses' necks to escape the bullets which the pursuers occasionally sent after them; and Sir John was at last obliged, however reluctantly, to take care of his own life, by also galloping off. He retired with his panic-struck troops, up a narrow path leading from Preston towards Birnie Brae, which the country people, in honour of him, now called Johnnie Cope's Road; and striking into another narrow cross-road to the south, he made with all his speed for the hills above Dalkeith. He did not draw bridle till he had reached Channellkirk, a small village at the head of Lauderdale, twenty miles from the fatal field. He there stopped to breakfast, and wrote a note to one of the officers of state, expressing, in one emphatic sentence, the fate of the day. He has been described by a person who saw him there as exhibiting in his countenance a strange and almost ludicrous mixture of dejection and perplexity. That he was still under the influence of panic, seems to be proved by his not considering himself safe with twenty miles of hilly road between himself and the Highlanders, but continuing his flight immediately to Coldstream upon Tweed, a place fully double that distance from the field of battle. Even here he did not consider himself altogether safe, but, rising early next morning, rode off towards Berwick, where the fortifications seemed to give assurance of at least temporary protection. He every where brought the first intelligence of his own defeat.

The number of dragoons who accompanied the general, was about four hundred; besides which, there were perhaps half as many who dispersed themselves in different directions. The people of Musselburgh have a picturesque tradition of a considerable party riding furiously through that town, on the way to Edinburgh, with countenances and demeanour which betrayed the utmost terror; while a long train of riderless steeds followed close after, their nostrils distended with fright, their saddles turned under their bellies, and the skins of many spotted with the blood of their masters. It is also remembered by tradition at Peebles, as a circumstance illustrative of the terror into which these wretched soldiers had been thrown, that a party of about half a dozen, who reached that remote town early in the forenoon, were in the act of surrendering to a single Jacobite, the chaplain of the Earl of Traquair, who called upon them to yield in the name of King James, when they were rescued by a zealous whig magistrate, who, sallying out of his cow-house with a dung-fork in his hand, threatened to run the daring catholic through the body, if he persisted in detaining the king's men. Of all the detached parties, that which made for the castle of Edinburgh testified perhaps the most remarkable degree of pusillanimity; for they actually permitted themselves to be pursued and galled the whole way by a single cavalier, without ever once having the courage to turn about and face him. It was Colquhoun Grant, a gentleman already mentioned, who had the hardihood to perform this feat; and assuredly the courage he displayed was fully as wonderful in its way as the cowardice of the dragoons. Grant was a man of prodigious bodily strength, which he had testified, the day before Charles entered Edinburgh, by simultaneously knocking down two of Hamilton's dragoons, as they were standing upon the High street. His athletic frame was animated by a mind, which, for high chivalric resolution, might have graced a paladin of romance, or a Clarendon cavalier. After performing some deeds of desperate valour on the field of Preston, he mounted the horse of a British officer, whom he had brought down with his broadsword, and rode after the fugitive dragoons with all possible speed, resolved to destroy all he could overtake. The victory just gained by his prince had elevated his political zeal to the highest pitch; and his heart, fleshed by the bloody work of the morning, was prepared to encounter every sort of danger. The party which he pursued, sunk in proportion to the lowest degree of imbecility, entered the long ancient street of Edinburgh, little more than half an hour after the battle, crying out to all they met to make way for them, and in their fright firing off their carbines at every one who seemed disposed to accost them. In the rear of their long straggling troop came the heroic Grant, so close in pursuit that he entered the Netherbow Port, ere the warders could close the gate which had been opened to admit them. Notwithstanding all his efforts, they got safe into the castle, and he was obliged to turn away disappointed. He who had so lately been the triumphant pursuer might now be considered in some measure a prisoner, for the least degree of resolution on the part of the citizens would have been sufficient to capture him, enclosed as he was within their walls, at the distance of many miles from those who could have supported or succoured him. The same dauntless courage, however, which had involved him in this dilemma, served to extricate him from it. He, in the first place, turned into the shop of a draper in the Lawnmarket, and ordered a full suit of tartan to be prepared for him against the day after next, when the prince regent, he said, along with the whole army, would return in triumph to the city. Then remounting his horse, and still brandishing his sword, he rode fearlessly down the street towards the Netherbow Port, an object of infinite wonder and consternation to the crowds which surveyed him. Before he reached the barrier, a sort of resolution had been made by the guard, to detain him as an enemy to government; but when they heard his terrific voice commanding them to open their gate and allow him a free passage,—when they looked upon his bold countenance, his bloody sword, and battle-stained habiliments, their half-collected courage melted away in a moment; the gate slowly revolved upon its hinges, apparently of itself; the guard shrunk aside, beneath the wave of his lofty brand; and Colquhoun Grant, who might have been so easily taken and slain, passed scatheless forth of the city. It is said that, after he was fairly gone, the courage of the warders revived wonderfully, and each questioned another, with angry looks and hard words, how he came to shrink from his duty at so interesting a crisis. But some time after, on being interrogated by a fellow-townsmen, as to their silliness in permitting so bloody a rebel to pass unpunished, when they might have so easily served their country, and at the same time avenged the many murders he had committed that morning, by detaining him, they had the candour to confess, that they considered their duty in this case more honoured in the breach than the observance, and that, indeed, every thing considered, it was perhaps quite as good that "they had got rid of the fellow in the way they did."

"The cowardice of the English," says the Chevalier Johnstone, in allusion to their conduct at Preston, "surpassed all imagination. They threw down their arms that they might run with more speed, thus depriving themselves of the only means they had of arresting the vengeance of the Highlanders. Of so many men in a condition, from their numbers, to preserve order in their retreat, not one thought of defending himself. Terror had taken complete possession of their minds. I saw," he continues, "a young Highlander, scarcely formed, who was presented to the prince as a prodigy, having killed, it was said, fourteen of the enemy. The prince asked if it was true? 'I do not know,' replied he, 'if I killed them, but I brought fourteen soldiers to the ground with my broadsword!' Another Highlander brought ten soldiers to the prince, whom he had made prisoners of war, driving them before him like a flock of sheep. This Highlander, from a rashness without example, having pursued a party to some distance from the field of battle, along the road between the enclosures, struck down the hindmost with a blow of his sword, calling at the same time, 'down with your arms!' The soldiers, terror-struck, threw down their arms without looking behind them; and the Highlander, with a pistol in one hand, and his sword in the other, made them do just as he pleased."

From the eagerness of the Highlanders to secure as much plunder as possible, they did not improve their victory by a very eager or long continued pursuit. A great proportion remained upon the field, investing themselves with the spoils of the slain and wounded, while others busied themselves in ransacking the house of Colonel Gardiner, which happened to be immediately adjacent to the field. A small party, among whom were the brave MacGregors, continued the chase for a mile and a half, when, in the words of MacPharig, "the prince came up and successively took Glencairn and Major Evans in his arms, congratulating them upon the result of the fight. He then commanded the whole of the clan Gregor to be collected in the middle of the field, and, a table being covered, he sat down with Glencairn and Major Evans to refresh himself, all the rest standing round as a guard, and each receiving a glass of wine and a little bread." In regard to Charles's conduct after a victory so auspicious to his arms, we quote the report of another eye-witness, Andrew Henderson, author of an historical account of the campaign. "I saw the Chevalier," says Andrew, "after the battle, standing by his horse, dressed like an ordinary captain, in a coarse plaid and large blue bonnet, with a narrow plain gold lace about it, his boots and knees much dirtied, the effects of his having fallen in a ditch. He was exceedingly merry, and twice cried out with a hearty laugh, 'My Highlanders have lost their plaids.' But his jollity seemed somewhat damped when he looked upon the seven standards which had been taken from the dragoons; at this sight he could not help observing, with a sigh, 'We have missed some of them.' After this he refreshed himself upon the field, and with the greatest composure eat a slice of cold beef and drank a glass of wine." Mr. Henderson ought to have mentioned that Charles had, before then attending to his own personal wants, spent several hours in providing for the relief of the wounded of both armies; preserving (to use the language of Mr. Home), from temper or from judgment, every appearance of moderation and humanity. It remains to be stated, that, after giving orders for the disposal of the prisoners, and for securing the spoils, which comprised the baggage, tents, cannon and a military chest containing four thousand pounds, he left the field, and rode towards Pinkie House, the seat of the Marquis of Tweeddale, where he lodged for the night. And whence he wrote the following letter to his father:—

Pinkie House, near Edinburgh, Sept. 21, O.S. 1745.

"Sir,—Since my last from Perth it has pleased God to prosper your majesty's arms under my command with a success that has surprised my wishes. On the 17th we entered Edinburgh sword in hand, and got possession of the town without shedding one drop of blood, or using any violence. And this morning I have gained a most signal victory with little or no loss. If I had had a squadron or two of horse to pursue the flying enemy, there would not one man of them have escaped. As it is, they have hardly saved any but a few dragoons, who by a most precipitate flight will I believe get into Berwick.

"If I had obtained this victory over foreigners, my joy would have been complete; but as it is over Englishmen, it has thrown a damp upon it that I little imagined. The men I have defeated were your majesty's enemies it is true, but they might have become your friends and dutiful subjects, when they had got their eyes opened to see the true interest of their country, which you mean to save, not to destroy. For this reason I have discharged all public rejoicing. I don't care to enter into the particulars of the action, but choose rather that your majesty would hear it from another than myself. I send this by Stewart, to whom you may give entire confidence. He is a faithful honest fellow, and thoroughly instructed in every thing that has happened till this day. I shall have a loss in him, but I hope it will be soon made up by his speedy return with the most agreeable news I can receive—I mean, that of your majesty's and my dearest brother's health.

"I have sent two or three Gazettes filled with addresses and mandates from the bishops to the clergy. The addresses are such as I expected, and can impose on none but the weak and credulous. The mandates are of the same sort, but artfully drawn. They order their clergy to make the people sensible of the great blessings they enjoy under the present family that governs them; particularly of the strict administration of justice, of the sacred regard that is paid to the laws, and the great security of their religion, and liberty, and property. This sounds all very well, and may impose on the unthinking, but one who reads with a little care will easily see the fallacy. What occasions has a prince who has learnt the secret of corrupting the fountain of all laws, to disturb the ordinary course of justice? Would not this be to give the alarm, or amount to telling them that he was not come to protect as he pretended, but really to betray them? When they talk of the security of their religion, they take care not to mention one word of the dreadful growth of atheism and infidelity, which I am extremely sorry to hear from very sensible, sober men, have within these few years got to a flaming height, even so far that I am assured many of their most fashionable men are ashamed to own themselves Christians, and many of the lower sort act as if they were not.

"Conversing on this melancholy subject, I was led into a thing which I never understood rightly before, which is that those men who are loudest in the cry of the growth of Popery, and the danger of the Protestant religion, are not really Protestants, but a set of profligate men, of good parts with some learning, and void of all principles, but pretending to be republicans.

"I asked those who told me this, what should make these men so jealous about preserving the Protestant religion, seeing they are not Christians; and was answered, that it is in order to recommend themselves to the ministry, who (if they can write pamphlets for them, or get themselves chosen members of parliament) will be sure to provide amply for them; and the motive of this extraordinary zeal is that they thereby procure to themselves the connivance at least, if not the protection of government, while they are propagating their impiety and infidelity.

"I hope in God, Christianity is not at so low an ebb in this country as the account I have had represents it to be; yet if I compare what I have frequently seen and heard at Rome, with some things I have observed since, I am afraid there is too much truth in it.

"The bishops are as unfair and partial in representing the security of their property as that of their religion: for when they mention it, they do not say a word of the vast load of debt that increases yearly, under which the nation is groaning, and which must be paid (if ever they intend to pay it) out of their property. 'Tis true all this debt has not been contracted under the princes of this family, but a great part of it has, and the whole of it might have been cleared by a frugal administration during these thirty years of a profound peace which the nation has enjoyed, had it not been for the immense sums that have been squandered away in corrupting parliaments, and supporting foreign interests, which can never be of any service to these kingdoms.

"I am afraid I have taken up too much of your majesty's time about these sorry mandates, but having mentioned them, I was willing to give your majesty my sense of them. I remember Dr. Wagstaff (with whom I wish I had conversed more frequently, for he always told me the truth) once said to me, that I must not judge of the clergy of the Church of England by the bishops, who were not preferred for their piety or learning, but for very different talents; for writing pamphlets, for being active at elections, and voting in parliament as the ministry directed them. After I have won another battle, they will write for me and answer their own letters.

"There is another sort of men, among whom I am inclined to believe the lowest are the honestest, as well as the clergy; I mean the army, for never was a finer body of men looked at, than those I fought this morning; yet they did not behave as I expected. I thought I could plainly see that the common men did not like the cause they were engaged in. Had they been fighting against Frenchmen, come to invade their country, I am convinced they would have made a better defence. The poor men's pay, and their low prospects, are not sufficient to corrupt their natural principles of justice and honesty; which is not the case with their officers, who, incited by their own ambition, and false notions of honour, fought most desperately. I asked one of them, who is my prisoner, (a gallant man), why he would fight against his lawful prince, and one who was come to rescue his country from a foreign yoke? He said he was a man of honour, and would be true to the prince whose bread he ate, and whose commission he bore. I told him it was a noble principle, but ill applied, and asked him if he was not a whig? He replied that he was.—Well, then, said I, how come you to look upon the commission you bear, and the bread you eat, to be the prince's and not your country's, which raised you up, and pays you to serve and defend it against foreigners, for that I have always understood to be the true principle of a whig? Have you not heard how your countrymen have been carried abroad, to be maltreated by the defenders of their Protestant religion, butchered fighting in a quarrel in which your country has little or no concern, only to aggrandize Hanover?—To this he made no answer, but looked sullen, and hung down his head.

"The truth is, there are few good officers among them. They are brave, because an Englishman cannot be otherwise; but they have generally little knowledge in their business, are corrupt in their morals and have few restraints from religion, though they would have you believe they are fighting for it. As to their honour they talk so much of, I shall soon have occasion to try it, for having no strong place to put my prisoners in, shall be obliged to release them upon parole. If they do not keep it, I wish they may not fall into my hands again, for in that case it will not be in my power to protect them from the resentment of my Highlanders, who would be apt to kill them in cold blood, which, as I take no pleasure in revenge, would be extremely shocking to me. My haughty foe thinks it beneath him, I suppose, to settle a cartel. I wish for it as much for the sake of his men as my own. I hope ere long I shall make him glad to sue for it.

"I hear there are 6000 Dutch troops arrived, and ten battalions of the English sent for. I wish they were all Dutch, that I might not have the pain of shedding English blood. I hope I shall soon oblige them to bring over the rest, which in all events will be one piece of service done to my country, in helping it out of a ruinous foreign war. 'Tis hard my victory should put me under new difficulties which I did not feel before, and yet this is the case. I am charged both with the care of my friends and enemies. Those who should bury the dead are run away, as if it were no business of theirs. My Highlanders think it beneath them to do it, and the country people are fled away. However, I am determined to try, if I can get people for money to undertake it, for I cannot bear the thought of suffering Englishmen to rot above the ground. I am in great difficulties how I shall dispose of my wounded prisoners. If I make a hospital of the church, it will be looked upon as a great profanation, and of having violated my manifesto, in which I promised to violate no man's property. If the magistrates would act, they would help me out of this difficulty. Come what will, I am resolved not to let the poor wounded men lie in the streets, and if I can do no better, I will make a hospital of the palace, and leave it to them.

"I am so distracted with these cares, joined to those of my people, that I have only time to add, that "I am your majesty's most dutiful son,

CHARLES."

Though the general behaviour of the king's army on this memorable battle was the reverse of soldierly, there were not wanting instances of valour on its part, less daring perhaps, but equally honourable with any displayed by the victors. The venerable Gardiner—that beau-ideal of an old officer of the Marlborough school, and a man who perhaps combined in his single person all the attributes which Sir Richard Steele has given to "the Christian soldier,"—afforded a noble instance of devoted bravery. On the previous afternoon, though so weak that he had to be carried forward from Haddington in a post chaise, he urged the propriety of instantly attacking the Highlanders, and even it is said, offered Cope his neighbouring mansion of Bankton in a present, provided he would consent to that measure, which he felt convinced was the only one that could ensure victory. When he found this counsel decidedly rejected, he gave all up for lost, and proceeded to prepare his mind by pious exercises for the fate which he expected to meet in the morning. In the battle, notwithstanding his gloomy anticipations, he behaved with the greatest fortitude, making more than one of the insurgents fall around him. Deserted by his dragoons, and severely wounded, he put himself at the head of a small body of foot which still refused to yield; and he only ceased to fight, when brought to the ground by severe and repeated wounds. He expired in the manse of Tranent, after having rather breathed than lived a few hours.

Another redeeming instance of self-devotion, was presented by Captain Brymer of Lee's regiment, the only officer in the army who had ever before seen the Highlanders attack regular troops. He had witnessed the wild onset of the MacDonalds at Sheriffmuir, which impressed him with a respect for the instinctive valour of the race. At Haddington, two nights before, when all the rest of the officers were talking lightly of the enemy, and anticipating an easy victory, Brymer retired to solitary meditation, assured that the danger which approached was by no means inconsiderable. When the dread moment of fight arrived, he disdained to fly like the rest, but fell at his station, "with his face to the foe."

The field of Preston, after the heat of the battle was past, presented, it is said, a spectacle more horrible than may be generally displayed upon fields where many times the number have been slain. As most of the wounds had been inflicted by the broadsword, or by still deadlier weapons, and comparatively few by gunshot, the bodies of the dead and wounded were almost all dreadfully gashed, and there was a much greater effusion of blood upon the field than could have otherwise taken place. The proper horror of the spectacle was greatly increased by discovered members—"legs, arms, hands and noses," says an eye-witness,—which were strewn about the field, in promiscuous and most bizarre confusion, so as at once to astonish and terrify the beholder. A number of women, followers of the camp, and mostly natives of England, added to the horrors of the scene, by their wild wailing cries; while seven hundred disarmed soldiers, including seventy officers, stood dejected in a herd at a corner of the field, under the charge of a few well-armed mountaineers.

The Highlanders having been generally considered a barbarous people, it will scarcely be believed of them, that they took considerable pains, after their blood had cooled from the heat of action, to administer such relief as was in their power, to the wounded of the enemy. This is attested by the tradition of the country people, as well as by the Journal of the Clanranald officer, so often quoted. "Whatever notion," says this gentleman, "our Low country people may entertain of the Highlanders, I can attest they gave many proofs this day of their humanity and mercy. Not only did I often hear our common clansmen ask the soldiers if they wanted quarter, and not only did we, the officers, exert our utmost pains to save those who were stubborn, or who could not make themselves understood, but I saw some of our private men after the battle, run to Port Seton for ale and other liquors, to support the wounded. As one proof for all, of my own particular observation, I saw a Highlander, carefully, and with patient kindness, support a poor wounded soldier by the arms * * * * * and afterwards carry him on his back into a house, where he left him, with a sixpence to pay his charges. In all this," adds the journalist, "we followed not only the dictates of humanity, but also the orders of our prince, who acted in every thing as the true father of his country."

Of the Highlanders themselves, only thirty were killed, including three officers, and about seventy or eighty wounded. The greater part of the wounded of both armies were taken into Colonel Gardiner's house, where it is yet possible to see upon the oaken floors, the dark outlines or prints of the tartaned warriors, formed by their bloody garments, where they lay.

Whatever humanity may have been displayed by the Highlanders towards the wounded, it would be in vain to deny that they exhibited quite as much, if not more, general activity in despoiling the slain. Every article they conceived to be of the least value, they eagerly appropriated; often, in their ignorance of civilised life, making ludicrous mistakes in their preference of particular articles, and as often appropriating articles which were of no value at all. One who had got a watch, sold it soon afterwards to some person for a trifle, and remarked, when the bargain was concluded, with an air of great gratulation, "he was glad to be quit of ta chratur, for she leaved nae time after he caught her;" the machine having in reality stopped for want of winding up. Another exchanged a horse for a horse pistol. Rough old Highlanders were seen going with the fine shirts of the English officers over the rest of their clothes, while little boys went strutting about with vast gold laced cocked hats on their heads, bandoliers dangling down to their heels, and breeches which it required at least one of their hands to keep from tripping them. Out of the great numbers which deserted in order to carry home their spoils, more than one were seen hurrying over hill and dale, with nothing but a great military saddle upon their backs, and apparently impressed with the idea that they had secured a competency for life.

The greater part of the slain were interred at the northeast corner of the park wall, so often alluded to, where the ground is still perceptibly elevated in consequence. A considerable number were also buried round a thorn tree, which is said to have marked the centre of Cope's first line, and which still stands. The country people, of whom it might truly be said, in the words of Shakespeare, that, were drawn forth and employed in this disagreeable duty; which they performed, with horror and disgust, by carting quantities of earth and emptying it upon the bloody heaps. A circumstance worthy of note occurred at the inhumation of a small party of dragoons, which had been cut off at a short distance below Tranent churchyard. A hole was dug for these men, into which they were thrown as they had fallen, undivested of their clothes. A Highlander, happening to approach, and seeing a pair of excellent boots upon one of the party, desired a rustic who had been employed in digging the grave, to descend into the pit and hand them up to him. The rustic refused, and said the Highlander might go down himself, if he pleased. With some hesitation he did so, and was stooping to pull off the boots, when the indignant gravedigger gave him a blow on the back of the head, with his spade, which stretched him beside his prey; and he was immediately inhumed in the same pit.

"— With more dismay
They saw the fight, than those that made the fray,"

When the search for spoil had ceased, the Highlanders began to collect provisions. They fixed their mess-room in one of the houses of Tranent, and, sending abroad through the neighbouring parks, seized such sheep as they could conveniently catch. The people of the village have a picturesque tradition of their coming straggling in, every now and then during the day, each with a sheep upon his back, which he threw down at the general depot, with the exclamation, "Tare's mhair o' Cope pagage!" When men's minds are agitated by any mirthful or triumphant emotion, they are pleased with wonderfully small jokes; and to represent the spoil which they procured among private individuals as only a further accession of plunder from the vanquished army, seems to have been the prevailing witticism of the Highlanders on this auspicious day.

In the blind eagerness of the Highlanders for spoil, it is said that they plundered many of the inhabitants of Edinburgh and other neighbouring towns, who came, during the course of the day, to see the battle ground. Thus old Skinner says—

That afternoon, when a' was done,

I gaed to see the fray, man;

But had I wist what after past,

I'd better staid away, man.

On Seton sands, wi' nimble hands,

They picked my pockets bare, man;

But I wish ne'er to dree sic fear,

For a' the sum and mair, man.

We shall here introduce a traditionary anecdote connected with the battle of Preston, which we have derived at second hand from a descendant of the person concerned. The Highlanders, in their descent upon the low countries, had taken away all the horses belonging to a Mr. Lucas, a farmer upon the estate of Tilliebody, in the west of Fife. The unlucky proprietor followed the army, in the hope of recovering his cattle; for the better accomplishment of which he was charged by his landlord, — Abercrombie, Esq. ancestor of Sir Ralph Abercrombie, with an expostulatory message to Lord George Murray, with whom that gentleman happened to be intimately acquainted. Lucas made up to the lieutenant general on the very evening before the battle of Preston. When he had mentioned his business, and delivered his landlord's message, Lord George expressed great regret that he was unable to pay the respect he could have wished to Tilliebody's request. Such was the necessity, he said, of the army, and such the unruliness of the men, that he could not upon any account interfere in the case. "However," added his lordship, "I'll make free to tell you a way by which you may take justice at your own hands. The horses are all up yonder in Tranent churchyard. Do you watch your opportunity, and when you think you may do so with safety, just pick out your horses from the rest, and make the best of your way home with them." The farmer thanked Lord George for the hint, which he said he would follow, at whatever risk. He was about to take his leave, when the insurgent leader, pleased with the bold resolution he avowed, and observing him to be a very well made active looking man, stopped him, to ask if he could be prevailed upon to enter the Highland army, in which case he would make him sure of a commission. Mr. Lucas was a man of English extraction, and by no means disposed to enroll himself in a corps which had displayed such gallows-like conduct; he therefore respectfully declined Lord George's offer, observing, that he was very well content with the laws as administered by the present king, which he was afraid would not be much improved by men of such disorderly character as the Highlanders. He even took the liberty to say to Lord George, that he thought the sooner his lordship could get quit of the enterprise the better, as he could foresee no good as likely to come of it. Lord George owned, with an air of confidential candour, that his advice was perhaps a prudent one; but he laughed it off with the proverb, "In for a penny, in for a pound." Lucas then took his leave, and next morning found an opportunity, while the Highlanders were engaged in battle, to abstract his horses from the churchyard.

CHAPTER XV.

PRINCE CHARLES AT HOLYROOD.

What says King Bollingbroke?

Richard the Second.

The Camerons had entered Edinburgh scarcely three hours after the battle, playing their pipes with might and main, and exhibiting with many marks of triumph the colours they had taken from Cope's dragoons. But the return of the main body of the army was reserved for the succeeding day, Sunday, when an attempt was made to impress the citizens with as high an idea as possible of the victory they had achieved. The clans marched in one long extended line into the lower gate of the city, an hundred bagpipes playing at once the exulting cavalier air—"The king shall enjoy his own again." They bore, besides their own appropriate standards, those which had been taken from the royal army; and they displayed with equally ostentatious pride the vast accession of dress and personal ornament which they had derived from the vanquished. In the rear of their own body came the prisoners, at least half as numerous as themselves, and then followed the wounded in carts. At the end of all, came the baggage and cannon under a strong guard. They paraded through all the principal streets of the city, as if anxious to leave no one unimpressed with the sight of their good fortune. Charles himself did not accompany the procession, but came in the evening to Holyroodhouse, where, according to the Caledonian Mercury, he was "welcomed with the loudest acclamations of the people."

The news of the battle, which told the complete overthrow of all that force the government had been able to send against the insurgents, occasioned a violent revolution of public feeling in favour of the victor, and spread proportionate consternation among all who had any interest in the state. The whole of the Scottish state officers, as well as many inferior persons enjoying public trust, betook themselves in disguise to England, or to remote parts of their own country; and in all Scotland there soon did not remain a single declared friend of government, except those who kept the fortresses. Charles might be said to have completely recovered his paternal kingdom from the hands of the usurper; and as the British army still remained in Flanders, there seemed nothing wanting, but a descent upon England, in order to secure that portion of his dominions also. It has been the opinion of many, that, had he adopted this vigorous measure, considering the terror of his name, the rapidity with which he could have marched, and the general idea which at this moment prevailed, that there was nothing impossible to his arms, he might have dislodged his majesty from London, and changed, for a time at least, and probably for ever, the titles of king and pretender.

His own sentiments in the hour of victory were in favour of an immediate march into England. Those of his chief adherents and counsellors suggested a more cautious measure, and one perhaps less likely to ensure the success of his enterprise. It was represented that his army was considerably diminished by the slaughter at Preston, and by the desertion of those who had gone home to secure their booty; that to penetrate into England with less than two thousand men would discourage his English adherents; and that, by waiting a little longer, he would be sure to increase his force to a respectable amount, by the accession of those clans and other Scotsmen who had not yet declared themselves in his favour. By these objections, Charles permitted himself to be overruled, and was, in the mean time, amused with the state and circumstances of royalty which he enjoyed at Holyroodhouse.

It is difficult to describe the extravagant rejoicings with which the Jacobites hailed the news of Preston. They received the messengers and homeward bound Highlanders, who every where dispersed the intelligence, with the most unbounded hospitality; and they no longer made any scruple to disclose those sentiments in public, which they had hitherto been obliged to conceal as treasonable. The gentlemen drank fathom deep healths to the prince who, in their own language, "could eat a dry crust, sleep on peas straw, take his dinner in four minutes, and win a battle in five;" whilst the ladies busied themselves in procuring locks of his hair, miniature portraits of his person, and ribbons on which he was represented as "the Highland Laddie." But perhaps the most extraordinary instance of individual zeal in his behalf, was one afforded by an old episcopalian or nonjurant clergyman, who had attended his camp before Preston, as some of the violent presbyterians, on the other hand, followed that of Cope. This zealous partisan, immediately after the battle, set out on foot for his place of residence beyond Doune in Perthshire; and, having travelled considerably more than fifty miles, next morning gave out the news of the victory from his own pulpit, at the ordinary hour of worship, invoking a thousand blessings on the arms and person of the Chevalier.

The cessation of public worship in Edinburgh was not the least remarkable circumstance attending this defeat. On the evening of his victory, Charles sent messengers to the houses of the various clergymen, desiring them to preach next day as usual; but when the bells were rung at the usual hour, no clergyman appeared; and, for the first time on record, a Sunday passed in that city undistinguished by the ordinances of religion. The ministers, with a pusillanimity which was afterwards censured even by their own party, had all left their charges, and taken refuge in the country. Charles, on learning this, issued a proclamation on Monday, assuring them that he designed in no respect to disturb them in the exercise of their duties; but they persisted, notwithstanding, in their absurd terrors, and absented themselves from the city during all the time the Highlanders remained in it. A century before, their predecessors had displayed a precisely similar degree of timidity and distrust, when, having taken refuge in Edinburgh castle from the victorious arms of Cromwell, they repeatedly refused the toleration and protection offered to them by that general.

and entered into a correspondence with him, which, being printed, testifies no less to the childish imbecility and petulance of one party, than to the vigorous mind and public spirited generosity of the other. One presbyterian clergyman alone, out of all their number, on the present occasion, ventured to appear in his pulpit. His name was Hog, and his charge the inferior one of morning lecturer in the Tron church. He was himself a Jacobite, and had a near relation in the prince's army. Charles, on learning that he had performed public worship, and that in his prayers he had mentioned no names, said he would bestow a parish on the good man, should he come to his kingdom. It may be also mentioned, that the clergymen of the neighbouring parish of St. Cuthberts, having their church protected by the guns of the castle, continued to exercise their functions as usual, and also to pray for King George. One of them, a Mr. MacVicar, even went the length of saying, that, "in regard to the young man who had recently come among them in search of an earthly crown, he earnestly wished he might soon obtain, what was much better, a heavenly one." When this was reported to Charles, he is said to have laughed heartily, and to have expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the tenor of the old man's petition.

By proclaiming toleration at Edinburgh, and by expressing in his manifesto an intention of preserving the present religious establishments of Britain, Charles evidently meant to shadow forth the mild nature of his reign, in case he should succeed in his enterprise. It would be too much to say that he was altogether sincere in this profession; yet there is some probability in that conclusion, from the known indifference of his mind to forms of religion, and from his only eight years after gratuitously abjuring the catholic faith. An adherent who knew him intimately, being asked, in the expedition through England, "what religion his royal highness was of?" answered, that he believed "his religion was yet to seek;" and the Earl of Kilmarnock, when it was represented to him by a clergyman before his execution, that the tendency of the insurrection had been to restore the evils and monstrosities of popery, distinctly avowed, that he never had believed that, and that "from all the conversation he had ever had with Prince Charles, and from all he could learn of his sentiments, he was not a person who had any real concern for any outward profession of religion." This happy indifference, though perhaps disreputable in a subject, seems to be the very constitution of mind required in the British king; and it seems altogether highly probable, that had Charles obtained his object, he would have disappointed the alarmists who raised the cry of popery against him and his cause. We can relate for a certain fact, that being solicited by the Laird of Glencairnair to attend public worship, he expressed the utmost willingness to do so, but was dissuaded by the Duke of Perth, who was a zealous catholic.

While the news of the victory was elating the hearts of his father and other friends abroad, and striking alarm into the court of St. James, the people among whom it happened, unaccustomed to domestic war for so many years, thought and talked of nothing else. The zealous whigs and presbyterians in general regarded his success with consternation; but the general tone of the public mind was favourable in a high degree to Charles. Many looked upon him as a hero destined to restore his paternal country to the consequence and prosperity which it had lost at the Union; and with that national spirit which often leads men to prefer in sentiment an old tale to a present substantial good, they talked with rapture of the renewed independence of their country, and of "the Blue Bonnets" once more, as formerly, going "over the Border," and spreading terror in the rich vales of England. One of the schemes of the day made Charles king of his paternal kingdom, and the enemy of England; and they welcomed the idea of their country soon starting from its degraded condition of a province, into that of a separate monarchy, and becoming, instead of a servile appanage of England, a respectable adversary even to that powerful country. Such "devout imaginations" were inexpressibly pleasing to the public mind—pleasing though dangerous, and acceptable with all their alarming accompaniments. It is true, they were not such as could be acted upon—they could not stand the slightest inquiry on the part of reason; yet for a moment they seemed to have dazzled with a ray of romance the imagination of a commercial and peaceful people.

The Highland army was not more flattered with this emotion of the public mind, than the vanquished party was ridiculed and condemned. General Cope, now cooped up in disgrace within the walls of Berwick, was the theme of a thousand scurrilous rhymes, which were chanted and appreciated every where, and some of which, superior to the rest in bitterness of sarcasm, are yet popular in Scotland. Of those still in repute, one of the most remarkable is a ballad to the air of "Killiecrankie," which was written by an east Lothian farmer named Skirving.

From the time that he returned victorious from Preston, Charles continued, under the style of prince regent, to exercise every act of sovereignty at Holyroodhouse, the same as if he had been a crowned monarch in undisturbed possession of his kingdom. He ordered regiments to be levied for his service, and troops of horse-guards for the defence of his person. He appointed a council to meet him every morning at ten o'clock, the members of which were, the Duke of Perth, Lord George Murray, Secretary Murray, Quarter Master General Sullivan, Lord Pitsligo, Lord Elcho, and all the Highland chiefs. He also proposed to assemble a Scottish parliament, in order at once to gratify the vanity of the people, and to interest them in his proceedings, by appearing to act with their sanction.

His deportment during this brief interval of triumph was generally considered pensive. He seemed least of all men elated by his victory, and he had the air of one who is oppressed by business and care. This may be accounted for by the magnitude and hazard of his enterprise, or by the difficulty which he is said to have experienced in conducting himself with impartiality among his adherents. He nevertheless gave occasional balls to the numerous ladies who favoured his cause, and generally dined in public with his officers. On these occasions, if not uniformly cheerful, he at least exerted himself to appear pleased with the local and moral character of his paternal kingdom. He frequently said, when at dinner, that if his enterprise was successful, Scotland should be his Hanover, and Holyroodhouse his Herenhausen; a saying at once complimentary in the highest degree to Scotland, and exquisitely satirical upon King George. The ladies who attended his entertainments in Holyrood, took pleasure in contributing their plate, china, and linen, for his service; and many an old posset dish and snuff box, many a treasured necklace and repeater, many a jewel which had adorned its successive generations of family beauties, was at this time laid in pledge, in order to raise him pecuniary subsidies.

By giving these entertainments, Charles at once rewarded and secured the affection of his female partisans. It is well known that the ladies exercised prodigious influence over his fortunes. President Forbes complains somewhere, that he could scarcely get a man of sense to act with him, or even to consult in his emergencies, by reason of the necessity under which all laboured of pleasing their mistresses by favouring the Chevalier. Another writer—an officer in the army, who came to

* In this rude but clever composition, the honest farmer embodies almost the whole of the talk of the times, regarding the actors on both sides. He speaks of the bravadoes of General Cope before battle, and his pusillanimity after. He describes the brave Lochiel leading his Camerons on in clouds, and unleashing all his tremendous energies upon the enemy. He adverts to the dragoons flying, with all the circumstances of excessive terror, at first sight of the enemy they had threatened to cut in pieces, and without firing a gun. He then alludes to the childish terror of the poor volunteers, and in particular to the ineffectual pulpit valour of the sectarian preachers. Besides reproaching the Highlanders for their rapacity, he further animadverts in severe terms upon the conduct of the British officers, one of whom betrayed an especial degree of cowardice, and that under circumstances which also disgraced his humanity. This officer sent to the author to demand satisfaction. The farmer was busy forking his dung-hill when the friend approached, whose hostile intentions he no sooner learned, than he proceeded to put that safe barrier between his own person and that of the challenger; after which, he patiently waited till the gentleman disclosed his errand. When he had heard all, and paused a little to consider it, he at last replied with great coolness, "Gang awa back to Mr. Smith; tell him that I hae nae time to come to Haddington to gie him satisfaction; but say, if he likes to come here, I'll tak' a look o' him; and, if I think I'm fit to secht him, I'll secht him; and if no, I'll just do as he did—I'll rin awa'!"

Edinburgh in the subsequent January along with the Duke of Cumberland, and who published a volume of letters regarding his journey—expresses a still more painful sort of querulousness, when he gravely assures us, that it was actually impossible for a loyal soldier to win the smiles of any lady worthy of his attention; all of them being in love with the Chevalier, and not even scrupling to avow their Jacobitism, by wearing white breast-knots and ribands in their private assemblies. Charles, though said to have been at this period of his life indifferent to women, saw and seized the opportunity of advancing his interests by their means; and, accordingly, at all his balls, which he gave in the picture gallery of Holyroodhouse, he exerted himself to render them those attentions, which go so far with the female heart under any circumstances, but which must of course have been peculiarly successful coming from one of his rank. He talked—he danced—and he flattered. In his conversation, he had all the advantage of high breeding, besides that of a certain degree of talent which he possessed for witty and poignant remark. In his dancing, he had the equal advantage of a graceful person and exquisite skill, not to speak of the effect produced by the very circumstance of his dancing, at least upon the favoured individual. His flattery was of course effective precisely in proportion to the estimation in which his rank was held. In all his proceedings, he was ruled by a due regard to impartiality. As there were both Highland and Lowland ladies in the company, he called for music alternately appropriate to these various regions. Sometimes, also, he took care to appear in "a habit of fine silk tartan, (with crimson velvet breeches), and at other times in an English court dress, with the blue riband, star, and other ensigns of the Order of the Garter." We cannot easily, at this distance of time, and with the common place feelings of the modern world, conceive the effect which these scenes must have had upon all who witnessed or participated in them; but it is easy to suppose that when a prince, and one who had every external mark of princely descent,—a Stuart, moreover, and one in all respects worthy of his noble race,—moved to the sound of Scottish airs through the hall of his forefathers, an hundred of whom looked down upon him from the walls,—that effect must have been something altogether bewilderingly delightful and ecstatic.

While Charles held court in Holyrood, he revived, in one instance at least, a courtly practice which had been for some time renounced by the sovereigns of England. This was—touching for the King's evil. It is well known that not only was the superstitious belief in the efficacy of the royal touch for this disease, prevalent among the people so late as the reign of Queen Anne, but the Book of Common Prayer actually contained an office to be performed on such occasions, which has only been omitted in recent editions of that venerable manual of devotion. Queen Anne was the last monarch who condescended to perform the ceremony; on which account, it used always to be said by the Jacobites, that the usurping family dared not do it, lest they should betray their want of the real royal character. We have been informed by an ancient nonjurant still alive, that a gentleman of England having applied to King George the First, soon after his accession, to have his son touched, and being peevishly desired to go over to the Pretender, actually obeyed the command, and was so well pleased with the result of the experiment, that he became and continued ever after a firm believer in the jus divinum, and a staunch friend of the exiled family. Whether Charles believed in the supposed power of the royal touch, we cannot determine; but it is certain that he condescended to perform the ceremony at Holyroodhouse, under the following circumstances:—

When at Perth, he had been petitioned by a poor woman to touch her daughter, a child of seven years, who had been dreadfully afflicted with the disease ever since her infancy. He excused himself by pleading want of time; but directed that the girl should be brought to him at Edinburgh; to which she was accordingly despatched, under the care of a stout sick-nurse; and a day was appointed when she should be introduced to his presence in the palace. When the child was brought in, he was found in the picture gallery, which served as his ordinary audience chamber; surrounded by all his principal officers and by many ladies. He caused a circle to be cleared, within which the child was admitted, together with her attendant, and a priest in his canonicals. The patient was then stripped naked, and placed upon her knees in the centre of the circle. The clergyman having pronounced an appropriate prayer—perhaps the office above mentioned—Charles approached the kneeling girl, and, with great apparent solemnity, touched the sores occasioned by the disease, pronouncing, at every different application, the words, "I touch, but God heal!" The ceremony was concluded by another prayer from the priest; and the patient, being again dressed, was carried round the circle, and presented with little sums of money by all present. Precisely twenty-one days from the date of her being submitted to Charles's touch, the ulcers fortunately closed and healed; and nothing remained to show that she had ever been afflicted, except the scars or marks left upon the skin! We have derived this strange tale from a non-jurant gentleman, who heard the woman herself relate it, and who had touched with his own fingers the spots upon her body which had been previously honoured by contact with those of Prince Charles. The poor woman told her story with many expressions of pride, and of veneration for him whom she considered her deliverer. She also added, that she had received many valuable presents from the Jacobites, to whom, after her recovery, she had been exhibited by her parent, and who, of course, did not entertain the slightest doubt regarding the efficacy of Charles's fingers, any more than they questioned his pretensions to the throne of Britain.

While Charles endeavoured in this manner to amuse his friends with the gaieties of a court, and by exercising the functions of royalty, he did not neglect that attention to more urgent matters which his situation and new character so essentially required. On the contrary, in issuing proclamations, and in his endeavours to increase the army, he was perhaps as thoroughly occupied as any prince who had before resided within the walls of Holyrood. His proclamations were calculated to three different purposes,—the conciliation of his enemies, the encouragement of his hitherto undeclared friends, and the strengthening of his pecuniary and other resources. He demanded an unlimited surrender of all the arms and ammunition in Edinburgh and the surrounding country. He granted protections to all persons travelling upon their lawful business. He forbade all public rejoicings for the victory of Preston. He also granted an indemnity to all his father's people for their treasons, during the exile of his family, requiring only that they should promise to his secretary to live hereafter as obedient subjects. His proclamations were headed with the words,—“Charles, Prince of Wales, &c. Regent of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging; To all his majesty's subjects, greeting;” and subscribed, “By his highness's command, J. Murray.”

He also found it necessary to publish edicts, for the prevention of robberies said to be committed by his soldiers. It seems that, in searching for arms, the Highlanders occasionally used a little license in regard to other matters of property; though it is also allowed that many persons, unconnected with his army, assumed the appearance of his soldiers, and were the chief perpetrators of the felonies complained of. Whole bands, indeed, of these wretches, went about the country, showing forged commissions, and affecting to sell protections in Charles's name, for which they exacted large sums of money. The Highland army were partly blameable for these misdemeanours, because they had opened the public jails wherever they came, and let loose the culprits; and because, since their arrival at Edinburgh, the sword of justice had been completely suspended. Charles, however, who was perfectly unblameable, made every possible exertion to suppress a system which tended so much to bring his cause into bad repute; and his exertions seem to have not been altogether ineffectual.

It unfortunately happened, that while he did all he could to prevent small or individual robberies, the necessities of his own exchequer compelled him to authorize others of greater magnitude upon the public bodies of the kingdom. From the city of Edinburgh, he exacted a thousand tents, six thousand pair of shoes and a vast quantity of smaller articles, for the use of his troops. He seized all the goods in the custom houses of Leith and Borrowstonness, and immediately converted them into money, by selling them back to the smugglers from whom they had been taken. He mulcted the city of Glasgow in five thousand and five hundred pounds. He sent letters, moreover, to all the chief magistrates of burghs throughout the kingdom, requiring them to contribute certain sums for his service; as also to all collectors of the land-tax, to all collectors and comptrollers of the custom and excise, and to all factors upon the estates forfeited in 1715, demanding the money which happened to be in their hands. The penalty which he assigned to those who should neglect his summons, was military execution with fire and sword.

During this temporary paralysis of the arm of the law, the following ludicrous circumstance is said to have taken place. The landlady of a Highland sergeant, resident in the Grassmarket, one day came into his room, exclaiming loudly against a neighbour who she said owed her eight shillings, and who had taken advantage of the decrease of the laws to refuse payment. “Confound the hale pack o' ye!” she continued; “ever since ye cam here, there's been neither law nor justice in the country. Charlie may be what he likes; but he can ne'er be a gude king that prevents puir folk frae getting their ain!”—“Say ye sae?” replied the sergeant in some little indignation, “I can tell ye, though, Prince Charlie has petter law and chustice path, than ever your Chordie had a' his tays. Come along wi' me, and I'll let ye see ta cood law and chustice too!” The landlady conducted her lodger to the house of the debtor, which he entered with his drawn sword in his hand. “Mistress,” he said to the recusant dame, “do you pe awin this honest woman my landlaty ta aught shilling?”—“And what although I should?” was the answer; “what the muckle deevil bae ye to do wi't?”—“I'll show you what I have to do with it,” said the Highlander; and mounting a cutty stool, he proceeded with great nonchalance to depopulate the good woman's shelves of her shining powder plates, which he handed down one by one into his landlady's apron, saying at every successive descent of his arm, “terro's ta cood law and chustice too!” Powder plates were at that time the very penates of a Scottish housewife of the lower order; and when the woman saw her treasured bink thus laid waste, she relented incontinent, and, forthwith proceeding into another room to get the money, paid the landlady her debt; in return for which she demanded back her plates. The Highland J. P. replaced all the goods in their shelves, except a few, which he desired the landlady to carry home. “What!” exclaimed the proprietrix, “am I no to get a' my plates back when I've paid my debt?”—“‘Tat you are not,” quoth the sergeant, “unless you give me ta other twa shilling for laying ta law upon you.” This additional sum, the poor woman was actually obliged to pay; and the Highlander then went home, with his landlady, exclaiming all the way, “Tare now's ta cood law and chustice path—petter than ever your Chordie had a' his tays!”

CHAPTER IX.

GATHERING AT EDINBURGH.

But to wanton me, to wanton me,
Ken ye what maist wad wanton me?
To see King James at Edinburgh Cross,
Wi' fifty thousand foot and horse,
And the Usurper forced to flee:
Oh this is what maist wad wanton me.

Jacobite Song.

The Court at St. James's, thoroughly alarmed at Charles's progress and success, were now taking measures to present a force against him, which might be capable of at once putting a stop to his career. About the end of September, the king ordered a strong body of troops, consisting of several battalions of foot and some squadrons of horse, to march directly to Scotland, under the command of Marshal Wade. They were appointed to assemble at Doncaster, and Wade set out from London on the 6th of October, in order to assume the command. It was the 29th of October, however, before this army reached Newcastle, on their way to meet the Highland army; by which time, Charles was on the point of marching into England.

This force being still considered too small, the king, besides using every endeavour to enlist new men, ordered home a considerable portion of his veteran army from Flanders, along with its youthful commander, William Duke of Cumberland, his second son, who had already distinguished himself at the well fought, though unsuccessful battle of Fontenoy. Innumerable bodies of militia were also raised throughout the country, to oppose the progress of the insurgents; and his Majesty, the better to carry on the war, was favoured with a loan of 700,000*l.*, by the proprietors of two privateer vessels, which had recently taken upwards of that sum in specie from the French.

To oppose forces thus leisurely collected, and in such quantities, Charles exerted himself at Edinburgh, for six weeks after his victory, to raise the clans which had not at first declared themselves, and to organize his little army as well as time and circumstances would allow.

He despatched (September 24th) a messenger to the Isle of Skye, to assure Sir Alexander Macdonald and the Laird of MacLeod, that, not imputing their inactivity to disaffection, he was ready to receive them and their powerful clans as the most favoured of his father's loyal subjects. From Skye, this messenger (Mr. Alexander MacLeod, advocate) was commissioned to go to Castle Downie, the residence of the Lord Lovat, and to deliver the same message to that ancient, but incalculable adherent. The message met with no success at Skye, where Duncan Forbes had been exerting himself to confirm the two recusant chiefs in their loyalty. But with Lovat, the charm of a reported victory had a different effect. On hearing of the affair of Preston, he is said to have exclaimed in a transport, that neither ancient nor modern times could furnish a parallel to so brilliant a victory. At once throwing off the mask which he had so long worn, he descended to the court-yard in front of his castle, and, casting his hat upon the ground, drank in a bumper of wine, “Success to the White Rose,* and confusion to the White Horse and all its adherents!” He had previously been exerting himself to raise his clan, which he designed to put under the charge of his son, a youth of eighteen, then at the college of St. Andrews. He now resolved seriously and energetically to side with the prince, and, calling his son, commanded him to lead out the men. The young man was very unwilling to do so, but could not resist the orders of so arbitrary a father. Lovat contrived that he himself should still appear loyal to government, and, in a letter to the Lord President, threw all the blame of the insurrection of the clan upon his son, whom he did not scruple to represent as the most headstrong and disobedient of children. Forbes knew his lordship too well to believe his assertions, and immediately proceeded to apprehend him. He was enabled to do so, by means of a body of independent loyal militia, which he had been employed for some time in raising, and with whom he eventually contrived to over-crow the Clan Fraser so entirely, that they durst not make an attempt to join the Chevalier.

No two characters could present a greater contrast than those of Lord Lovat and the Lord President. The former, ferocious, cunning, and turbulent, was all that an ancient Feudal Baron could have been in wickedness; the latter, gentle, candid, and unambitious, was the very beau ideal of a good citizen. Lovat had spent a long life in dark political intrigues, alternately siding with each party of the state; Forbes had devoted himself, for thirty years, to the single and consistent object of advancing the pure principles of the revolution. The one was the worst of Jacobites, the other the best of whigs.

Although the president was generally successful in his negotiations, he could not prevent a certain number of the clans from marching to join the prince's standard. As he himself declares in one of his letters, rebels stalked out from families for whose royalty he could have previously staked his life; and even his own nephew, to his great astonishment and mortification, one day assumed the white cockade and joined the insurgents. It would indeed appear, that he was in some cases egregiously deceived, and that, by a policy not less finical than his own, many whom he considered his friends, had only assured him of their loyalty, in order to lead him into security, and that they might be able to circumvent him in their turn.

Edinburgh was in the mean time experiencing some of the miseries appropriate to a civil war. For a few days after the battle of Gladsmuir, the communication between the city and castle continued open. The Highlanders kept guard at the weigh-house, an old building situated in the centre of the street leading to the castle, about three hundred yards from the fortress itself; and they at first allowed all kinds of provisions to pass, particularly for the use of the officers. But the garrison soon beginning to annoy them with cohorts and cannon, orders were issued on the 29th of September, that no person should be permitted to pass. General Guest then sent a letter to the city, threatening to use his cannon against the stations of the Highland guards, unless they permitted a free communication. As that involved the safety of the town to a great extent, the inhabitants—for there were no magistrates—implored a respite for a single night, which was granted. They then waited upon Prince Charles, and showed him General Guest's letter. He immediately gave them an answer in writing, that they might show it to the governor, expressing his surprise at the barbarity of the officer who threatened to bring distress upon the citizens, for not doing what was out of their power, and at the extravagance which demanded his renunciation of all the advantages he possessed by the fortune of war. He concluded, by threatening to retaliate upon the garrison, in reprisals upon their estates, and also upon those of "all known abettors of the Government." Upon presenting this letter to General Guest, and making earnest entreaty for a further respite, the citizens obtained a promise that no shots should be fired till his majesty's pleasure should be known upon the subject, providing that the besiegers should, during that time, offer no annoyance to the garrison.

This condition was broken next day by the levity of the Highlanders, who fired off their pieces, to frighten some people who were carrying provisions up the Castle-hill. The governor then considered himself justified in firing upon the guard. Charles, on learning what had taken place, published a proclamation, exhibiting all intercourse with the castle upon pain of death, and gave orders to strengthen the blockade, by posting additional guards at several places. The garrison retaliated for this measure, by firing at all the Highlanders they could see. On the 4th of October, they commenced a regular bombardment of the city. When it grew dark, the cannonading ceased, and a party, sallying out, threw up a trench across the Castlehill, where they planted cannon, and fired balls and cartouch shot down the street. They also set fire to one or two deserted houses at the head of the street, and, on the people running to extinguish it, destroyed some innocent lives. The people, then dreadfully alarmed, began to busy themselves in transporting their aged and infirm friends to the country, along with their most valuable effects; and the streets, on which the bullets were perpetually descending with terrific effect, were soon as completely deserted by day, as they usually were by night. In running down to Leith for shelter, a great party met the inhabitants of that town hurrying for the same purpose towards Edinburgh, because a British ship, of war, lying off in the roads, and whose intercourse with the shore had been cut off by the Highlanders, was firing into their streets with the same fatal effect. All was perplexity and dismay; and the unhappy citizens stood still, wringing their hands, and execrating the cruel necessities of war.

General Guest, who commanded in the castle at this momentous crisis, has been much lauded for the spirit with which he held out against the insurgents; and as his monumental inscription of Westminster Abbey contains an eulogium upon him in reference to that passage of his life, it may be said, that the thanks of the country have been rendered to him for his good service. It is now to be for the first time disclosed, that the public gratitude has been misdirected in regard to General Guest. The person to whom in reality government was indebted for the preservation of the fortress, was General George Preston of Valleyfield, an ancient soldier of the King William school, who had been recently superseded in the command of the garrison by Guest, but who had not retired from his post when the insurrection broke out. After the defeat of Preston, on the Highlanders returning in triumph and investing the castle, General Guest, who was not free of some suspicions of Jacobitism, called a council of war, and urged that, as the fortress could not be held out, a capitulation should immediately be entered into. All the officers present assented to his proposal, except old General Preston, who, with the spirit of all the twenty campaigns he had served glowing in his bosom, solemnly protested against the measure; adding that, if it should be determined on, he would that night send off an express to London, to lay his commission at his majesty's feet, as he would consider himself disgraced by holding it an hour longer. Guest remonstrated against the old general's resolution, which was calculated to reflect so much dishonour upon the garrison; but the veteran remained inflexible. When the governor at length found it impossible to move him, he asked if he would take the responsibility upon himself, and command the garrison in his name; to which the general consented. The government of the castle then devolved upon Preston, who immediately set about those active measures, the result of which we have just described. The venerable soldier, now eighty-six years of age, seventy of which he had spent in the army, was so feeble that he could hardly walk. Nevertheless, his vigilance was incessant. Once every two hours, he caused himself to be carried round the walls in his arm-chair, in order to visit the sentries. He also took care, whenever a party of Highlanders appeared within sight, to have a cannon loaded with grape-shot discharged at them. It is said that when Charles was informed of the annoyance thus given to his men, he sent a message to the new governor, to the effect that, if it was not discontinued, he would immediately give orders to burn Valleyfield house, the seat of his elder brother. To this General Preston is said to have returned for answer, "he (the Chevalier) was at liberty to do exactly as he pleased with Valleyfield; for his part, he was resolved to do his duty, so long as he had the honour of holding the commission of his Sovereign. He only begged to add, that as soon as he received intelligence of the destruction of his brother's house, he would give orders that Wemyss Castle should share the same fate." Wemyss Castle was the paternal seat of Lord Elcho, one of Charles's principal adherents; and as it overhung the coast of Fife, and was exposed to the fire of the government vessels lying in the Frith of Forth, there could be no doubt that General Preston was able to retaliate in the manner threatened. Charles, therefore, saw fit to press his remonstrance no farther.

The distress, indeed, which the blockade of the castle had brought upon the city, was now found to be so unfavourable to Charles's cause, that he was obliged, for the sake of his reputation, to take it off. He did so by proclamation, on the evening of the day succeeding its commencement. The cannonade then ceased on the part of the castle, into which provisions were ever afterwards conveyed without molestation.

The prisoners taken at Gladsmair had meanwhile been sent to distant parts of the country—the officers to Perth, and the private men to Logierait in Athole. Some sergeants, corporals, and private men, were prevailed upon to enlist in the victorious army; but most of them afterwards deserted. The officers, who, besides their parole, had also taken an oath not to serve against the house of Stuart for a twelvemonth, held as little faith with their captors, many of them resuming their place in the king's army as soon as opportunity permitted. The wounded, being allowed to carry away their mutilated bodies as soon as they could, travelled into England, as beggars, showing their dreadful gashes wherever they went; by which means the curiosity of the English populace was at once gratified, and a salutary terror of the Highlanders spread throughout the country which they designed to invade.

The real accessions of force which Prince Charles received at Edinburgh, were, notwithstanding the counteracting of Forbes, fully as considerable as his circumstances could have led to expect. The first that joined him was Lord Ogilvie, eldest son of the Earl of Airley, who arrived in town on the 3d of October with a regiment of 600 men, most of whom were of his own name, and from the county of Forfar. Next day came Gordon of Glenbucket, with 400 men from the head of Aberdeenshire, forming a regiment, of which he and his kinsmen were the officers. Lord Pitligo arrived on the 9th, with a great body of gentlemen from the counties of Aberdeen and Banff, attended by their servants, all well armed and mounted; as also a small body of infantry. These valuable recruits were from the northern part of the Lowlands of Scotland, where nonjuration might be said to have its principal citadel, and where the Episcopalian and Roman Catholic forms of worship are still vigorously flourished. Various other gentlemen from the north, along with some inferior sept of Highland families, joined the army before the end of October, when the whole amount was somewhat less than six thousand.

The Chevalier, notwithstanding the success of Preston, found few adherents at Edinburgh, or in any part of the country south of the Forth. Even when he was in complete possession of the city, only about three hundred of the inhabitants, and those not the most respectable, did him the honour of assuming the white cockade. In fact, his enterprise was looked upon by the citizens as a thing quite foreign to their feelings and ordinary pursuits; it had the charm of romance, and the merit, perhaps, of abstract justice; but was it for them to leave their profitable counters and snug firesides, in order to swagger away into England with arms in their hands, for the purpose of acquiring military glory, and asserting the visionary claims of a hot-headed foreigner? It was easy to wish the young man well, and to form the resolution of submitting tranquilly to his authority, should he succeed; but, for thousands who had indifference enough to take that neutral ground, there was not perhaps one that had sufficient courage or enthusiasm to take a personal and active part in the cause. The great mass of people, happy in their own individual concerns and prospects, contented themselves with repeating the common adage, "Whoever's king, I'll be subject."

Besides this description of supineness, the Chevalier had to contend with another feeling of a different sort, but not less inimical to his purposes. This was the stern

Presbyterian principle of dislike to his family, originating in the religious persecutions to which his ancestor had subjected a portion of the people of Scotland. It is true, that the most rigid sect of Presbyterians had, since the Revolution, expressed a strong desire to coalesce with the Jacobites, with the hope, in case the house of Stuart were restored, to obtain what they called a covenanted king; and that a thousand of this sect had assembled in Dumfriesshire, at the first intelligence of the insurrection, bearing arms and colours, and supposed to contemplate a junction with the Chevalier. But these extravagant religionists were now almost as violently distinct from the established church of Scotland, as ever they had been from those of England and Rome, and had long ceased to play the most prominent part in the national disputes about forms of worship. The established clergy, and the greater part of their congregations, were adverse to Charles upon considerations perfectly moderate, but at the same time well-grounded, and not easily to be shaken.

Some instances have reached us which show the efficacy of these sentiments against Charles's cause, and at the same time prove the disinclination of war which an age of domestic peace and increasing commerce had produced in the Lowlands. When the Earl of Kilmarnock exerted himself, in 1715, for the defence of government, he found not the slightest difficulty in raising a large regiment among his tenants and dependents, all of whom were at once willing to attend their baronial master, and hearty in the cause for which he desired their services. But on the son of that earl coming to Kilmarnock in 1745, and requesting the inhabitants to arm themselves in behalf of the house of Stuart, there was a very different result. By this time, the people were making fortunes by the manufacture of night-caps, and had got different lights regarding feudal servitude; which, added to their prejudices against the pope, the devil, and the pretender, caused them fairly to rebel against their ancient baronial master. His lordship assembled them in the town-hall, and tried them first with entreaties, and then with threats; but not one man would consent to join his standard. He then confined his demands to their arms; for, weavers as they were, they still retained the old muskets and rusty shabbles of their covenanting ancestors, and occasionally displayed them at bloodless wappinshaws. But this requisition they were equally prepared to resist; and one of them even had the hardihood to tell his lordship, that "if they presented him with their guns, it would be with the muzzle till him!" The Earl of Kilmarnock, therefore, brought none but himself and his body-servants to the prince's army.

The Earl of Kellie was equally unsuccessful in his attempt to raise his dependents. This eccentric nobleman is described in the Mercury, as going over to Fife, in order to raise a regiment for the prince's service upon his estates in that well-affected district. He never got above three men,—himself as colonel,—an old Fife laird for lieutenant-colonel, and a serving-man who had to represent all the rest of the troop by his own single person!

This indeed, was but too common a case in the Low countries; and the saying of a cautious rustic, who was asked what side he was going to take in these troubles, may be mentioned as sufficiently indicating the sentiments of almost the whole community regarding the measure of taking up arms. "For my part," said the cool Scot, "I'm clear for being on the same side wi' the hangman. I'll stay till I see what side he's to tak, and then I'll decide."

It is common to hear the Jacobites blamed, as the cavaliers had been in the preceding century, for petulance; but the least reflection will show, that however true this charge may be, with regard to his English friends, it is very unreasonable so far as his Scottish adherents are concerned. The Chevalier, in common with other persons in distress, had many friends who would have done any thing for him but injure their fortune. They would speak in his favour, drink in his favour, write in his favour, and even perhaps lend him a little money; but they could not risk or sacrifice all; nor could they be expected. Many of them had the much stronger and dearer than those of party; the minds of many others were not of a warlike complexion; and thousands who had formerly regarded the restoration of the Stuarts as a desirable object, were now alarmed when they saw the horrors of a civil war before their eyes. The Highlanders, owing to the peculiar constitution of their society, found it easy, in the words of the song, to — leave their bonnie Highland hills,

Their wives and bairns sae dear,
To draw the sword for Scotland's lord,
The young Chevalier."

Compelled by their chiefs, who had high expectations from the enterprise, they could not remain at home with honour; and they were at the same time attracted by the prospects of a campaign in the wealthy territory of the Sassenach. These circumstances and considerations certainly did not attend the free and enlightened Lowlanders; none of whom found it possible so far to overcome their natural prudence, except those who had laboured under the influence of strong political and religious predilections, or who were in that condition when any change must bring profit and advantage.

Even in cases where the adherent possessed a considerable fortune, a prudential plan was generally adopted, by which it was at least secured to the family. Thus, when the proprietor himself went out, he made over the estate to his eldest son, who remained at home in possession; and, vice versa, when the father was averse to active partisanship, a son went out, along with all the forces, both in the way of men and money, which the house could contribute, assured that, although the youth should fall or be attained, he had still brothers to inherit the patrimonial property for the behoof of the family. Some of the Highland chiefs themselves saw fit to adopt this policy. The MacDonalds of Clanranald, and also those of Glengary, were led out by the sons of their respective chiefs. At a subsequent period of the campaign, the wife of the chief of the MacIntoshes raised the clan in behalf of Charles, while MacIntosh himself served as an officer in a militia raised for the defence of government.

It is, altogether, rather to be wondered at, that, fifty-seven years after the expulsion of the house of Stuart, when the popular feeling of loyalty might be expected to have fairly settled down in a new channel, so many honourable and prudent men should have been found to peril their lives in advocating its rights with the sword. The generation which had transacted and witnessed the revolution was completely gone; and Prince Charles was but a remote descendant of the party who suffered on that memorable occasion. If time alone could not extinguish his claims by prescription, as it does all others, the changes which had taken place upon the face of society, and upon the polity of the state, might at least be allowed to have done so. An attempt had already been made without success, and to the effusion of much blood, in the same unhappy cause; and heaven and man had long seemed to have united in affixing to it the fatality of disaster and sorrow.

One powerful cause has been assigned in recent times for the support which Charles met with in 1745,—selfishness in his adherents. Memoirs and papers lately brought to light, display the interested diplomacy of both parties, and are accepted by a portion of the public as completely subversive of the theory of romance which has gradually been reared above the simple history of this insurrection. This is by no means a liberal view of this portion of our history. From the nature of the human heart, selfish motives will mix with the purest and most generous of our emotions; and to suppose the Jacobites superior to such considerations, would be to believe them something more than mortal. After all, the chief insurgents only stipulated for prospective advantages,—for rewards which they were to win by their swords, and at the risks of their lives and fortunes. Such they would assuredly have merited, in case the enterprise had succeeded. To deny that they would not, is just as unreasonable as to say that the soldiers of the king's army were unworthy of their ordinary pay. They stood well enough as they were, without Charles; and they only proposed to better their condition, and at the same time gratify the wishes of their hearts, by endeavouring to redress his injuries.

Take it as it may, this cannot be considered the chief or even the secondary motive for insurrection. Jacobitism was a generous sentiment, arising from a natural love of abstract justice, and nourished by the disposition, equally natural, to befriend the oppressed and unfortunate. The London mob, at the revolution, however convinced of the impropriety of James's measures in the days of his power, could not behold him brought back from Rochester, a fallen and captive monarch, without tears and acclamations. No more could that part of the Scottish nation, which remained unattached to government and in possession of their ancient prejudices,—whose minds were susceptible of the more generous impressions, and who could still stand up for a friend "though his back were at the wa'"—see the youthful and gallant Charles solidifying their friendship in the way he did, without at once bestowing it. Instead of allowing the Jacobites to have been influenced by considerations of interest, it may rather be said that they were perhaps the only part of the nation over whom such things had no power. They sacrificed fortune, and favour, and all that men hold dear on earth, for the sake of a mere emotion of their feelings, for the associations of the times that were past, or at least for principle which they believed to be right; whilst the Whigs alone were the men with whom the suggestions of prudence and expediency had any weight, who could reasonably hope for advantage, national or individual, from the issue of the contest. It is true that many persons must have been deluded by the hope of place and wealth, and also that there were many men of broken fortunes, who entered into it from more recklessness, or because they had no considerations of interest to prevent them. Yet, when we think of the many honourable gentlemen who joined the Chevalier's banner on no other account but because they considered him the rightful heir of the throne—when we think upon the many high spirited youths who rushed to it with the hope of military glory and lady's love—when we consider that the great mass acted upon principles of ancient honour, and from a feeling of the most noble and generous sympathy—and, more than all, when we recall the innumerable legends, displaying in such splendid style the disinterested and devoted loyalty of the actors, we cannot help characterising the whole affair, as public sentiment seems to have already characterised it, as a transaction unprecedentedly chivalrous, and which did honour to the nation.

CHAPTER XIX.

INVASION OF ENGLAND.

When first my brave Johnnie lad came to the town,
He had a blue bonnet that wanted the crown;
But now he has gotten a hat and a feather—
Hey, Johnnie lad, cock up your beaver!
Cock up your beaver, and cock it fu' sprush,
We'll over the Border and gie'them a brush:
There's somebody there we'll teach better behaviour,
Hey, brave Johnnie lad, cock up your beaver.

Jacobite Song.

When Charles had spent six weeks at Edinburgh, without obtaining a third of the accessions which he expected, and when all hope of more seemed at rest for the present, he resolved, with the consent of his council, to prosecute the march to London, though his force was still miserably inadequate to the object, and the whole English nation was by this time hurried in arms to oppose him. He had procured several shipoards of arms and ammunition, along with some money and a few officers of experience, from France; and he still entertained hopes of a descent being made from the same quarter, upon some part of the English coast. He had great reliance upon the cavalier gentry of England, who had recently sent him assurances of their support in case he marched to London; and he placed the greatest confidence in the energies and hardihood of his present force. Upon these grounds the greater part of his council concurred with him in advising an immediate march, and some even went the length of trusting entirely to the troops which had already achieved so great a victory. But there was a strong minority who pleaded that he should remain and fortify himself where he was, holding out Scotland against England, and who only consented to an invasion of the latter country with the greatest reluctance.

Towards the end of October, orders were given to call in all the various parties which had been posted at different parts of the country, and the Chevalier had a grand review of his whole united force upon the beach betwixt Leith and Musselburgh, now known by the name of Portobello Sands, where, by a somewhat remarkable coincidence, George IV. attended a similar ceremony in 1822.

During the last half of October the army had not lain at Duddingston, but in more comfortable lodgings within and around the city. On the 26th, the main body left Edinburgh, and pitched a camp a little to the west of Inveresk church, where they had a battery pointing to the southwest. At a still later period of the month, they removed to a strong situation above Dalkeith, having that town on their left, the South Eske in front, the North Eske in rear, and an opening on the right towards Polton.

At six o'clock in the evening of Thursday, the 31st of October, Prince Charles finally left the palace and capital of his paternal kingdom, and, accompanied by his life guards, rode to Pinkie house. Having slept there that night, he rode next day at noon to Dalkeith, where he gave orders for the march of his army. In order to deceive Marshal Wade as to the point in which he designed to invade England, he had previously sent orders for quarters to all the towns upon the road to Berwick, and despatched little detachments of his men in various other directions. But he now determined his march towards the western border, at once with the view of eluding the army at Newcastle, and that he might gather the troops which he expected to come to his standard in that well affected part of the kingdom. He now also appointed his principal officers—the Duke of Perth to be general, Lord George Murray lieutenant general, Lord Elcho colonel of the life guards, the Earl of Kilmarnock colonel of the Hussars, and Lord Pittligo colonel of the Angus horse.

Though the invasion of England was a desperate measure, the army was now in the best possible condition, and provided with all the conveniences which could attend a deliberate campaign. The men were fresh by their long rest at Edinburgh, well clothed and well appointed; they carried with them provisions for four days; and their baggage was promptly transported, by about an hundred and fifty wains, and as many sumpter horses, carrying large baskets across their backs.

At the commencement of this singular march, the insurgents amounted in gross numbers to six thousand, five hundred of whom were cavalry, and three thousand Highlanders. Thirteen regiments, many of them very small, were composed of the Highland clans; five regiments, generally more numerous, of Lowlanders; and besides the two troops of horse guards, who wore a uniform already described, and commanded by Lords Elcho and Balmerino, there were bodies of horse under the orders of Kilmarnock and Pittligo, the first coarsely dressed and indifferently armed, and the last clothed in the ordinary fashion of country gentlemen, each armed with such weapons as he pleased to carry, or could most readily command. A small body of the lighter horse was selected to scour the country for intelligence, and to act as the antennæ or feelers of the marching army.

The different regiments were commanded by their chiefs, and generally officered by their kinsmen of that dignity, according to their propinquity. Each regiment had two captains, two lieutenants, and two ensigns. To adjust the claims of various persons of these ranks, the Chevalier is said to have generally found as difficult a task, as if the object contended for had been a real commission from a real government, and not a temporary place in an insurgent band, which ran the risk of utter demolition every day. The front rank of the regiments was filled by men of good birth, who in the Highlands, however poor in fortune, are constantly styled gentlemen, and who had, for pay, one shilling a day; while that of the ordinary men was only sixpence. The pay of the captains was half a crown, of the lieutenants two shillings, of the ensigns one shilling and sixpence. The gentlemen of the front rank were each completely armed, in the fashion of the Highlanders, with a musket, a broadsword, a pair of pistols, silver handled or otherwise, a dirk at the belt, to which were also attached a knife and fork; the left arm sustained a round target made of wood and leather and studded with nails; and some who chose to be armed with extraordinary care, besides the dagger at the belt, carried a smaller one stuck into the garter of the right leg, which they could use in certain situations, when the other was beyond their reach. The undistinguished warriors of the rear ranks, were in general armed in a much inferior manner, many of them wanting targets.

On the evening of Friday, the 1st of November, a considerable portion of the army, under the command of the Marquis of Tullibardine, took the road for Peebles, intending to proceed to Carlisle by Moffat. The remainder left Dalkeith on the 3d, headed by the prince, on foot, with his target over his shoulder. He had previously lodged two nights in the palace of the Duke of Buccleuch. This party took a route more directly south, affording a design of meeting and fighting Marshal Wade at Newcastle. Charles arrived, with the head of his division, on the evening of the first day's march, at Lauder, where he took up his quarters in Thirlstane castle, the seat of the Earl of Lauderdale. Next day, on account of a false report that there was a strong body of dragoons advancing in this direction to meet him, he fell back upon Channelkirk, in order to bring up the rear of his troops, who had lingered there during the night. He marched that day (the 4th) to Kelso, walking all the way on foot, in order to encourage the men. A third party assumed a middle course, by Galashiels, Selkirk, Hawick, and Moespaul.

The western division, which marched by Peebles, and which had charge of the cannon and most of the baggage, arrived at that sequestered little town on the evening of Saturday the 2d of November. The sun was setting, as the first lines descended from the hills which environ the place on every side, and, throwing back a thousand threatening glances from the arms of the moving band, caused inexpressible alarm among the peaceful townsmen, who had only heard enough about the insurrection and its agents to make them fear the worst from such a visit. "There's the Hielantmen! there's the Hielantmen!" burst from every mouth, and was communicated like wildfire through the town; while the careful merchant took another look of the cellar in which he had concealed his goods, and the anxious mother clasped her infant more closely to her beating bosom. The consternation which prevailed was not soothed by one of the dreaded band shooting a dog which happened to cross a field near him, as he was entering the town.

Contrary to expectation, the mountaineers neither attempted to cut the throats nor to violate the property of the inhabitants. They let it be known, wherever they went, that they required certain acts of obedience on the part of the people; and that if these were not willingly rendered, they had the will, as they possessed the power, of using force. The leader demanded payment of the cess, on pain of military execution; and little parties of individuals, calling upon various householders within and without the town, requested such supplies of provisions as could properly be spared, with the simple alternative of having their houses ransacked and indiscriminately plundered. But scarcely any incivility was ever shown in the outset. A farmer in the neighbourhood of the town, the great grandfather of the author of this narrative, having displayed a discreet desire to accommodate them, by killing two pet lambs, and causing his wife and servants to bake oat meal cakes for them all the ensuing Sunday, was treated with great politeness, and had his poultry and cattle scrupulously spared.

The people, in general hospitable from habit, were not perhaps so much grieved by the exactions thus made upon their winter stores of provisions, as they were scandalised by the necessity to which many of them were subjected, of working on the Sabbath day. They grudged the contents of their kirms less than the labour of kirning, and would far rather have given away the girdle, along with the bannocks, than seen it heated at such an unreasonable time. A joiner, who was compelled on that blessed day to fashion ramrods for a few muskets, which, strange to say, wanted these conveniences, would almost have as soon had the said muskets turned upon his own person, and a ball from each sent through his body; and the miller, whom they rigorously obliged to work all day long, would have willingly abjured, from that time forth, all right to break the eight commandment, could such a dire measure have spared him, for one day, the dire necessity of smashing the fourth.

This party of the insurgents, after spending a day or two at Peebles, went up Tweedsmuir to Moffat, carrying with them a horse belonging to a neighbouring farmer, who, after following them all the way to Carlisle, in the vain hope of having the animal restored, was there imprisoned for several weeks, on account of his annoying petitions for redress. Throughout the whole campaign, the insurgents were necessarily very solicitous about horses and cattle; and the people whose lands they were approaching invariably made a point of conveying away their bestial to some remote and sequestered place, so as to be either out of the probable line of march, or altogether concealed from view and inquiry. But this unfortunate farmer had neglected the precautions of his neighbours, and his horse was of course appropriated as fair prey. The Peebles party had directed their route down Annandale, and entered England near Langtown.

Charles remained at Kelso from the Monday when he arrived, till Wednesday, preserving the further direction of his march a profound secret. In order the better to perplex the army which awaited him at Newcastle, he sent orders to Wooler, a town upon the road to that city, commanding the preparation of quarters for his whole army. On Wednesday morning, however, he suddenly gave out orders for a march towards the opposite extremity of the Border.

During his brief residence at Kelso, he sent a party of about thirty men down the Tweed, to the place, not far distant, where that river becomes the boundary of the two kingdoms, with orders there to cross the water, and to proclaim his father upon English ground. The party after doing so, immediately returned to Kelso.

The column which Charles thus led in person, consisted chiefly of the Camerons and MacDonalds, who were considered the flower of his army, but who were not at this time the most willing or enthusiastic in his service. On account, probably, of their leaders having been of that party in the council which opposed the march into England, Charles is said to have sat an hour and a half on horseback that day, before he could prevail upon the men to go forward. They at last left the town, crossed the Tweed, and took the road towards Jedburgh.

The prince lodged this night in a house near the centre of the town of Jedburgh, which is, or was lately, occupied as the Nag's Head Inn. The march of that day had been only ten miles; but, as he had now to traverse a considerable tract of waste country, affording no prospect of quarters for his troops, it was necessary to resolve upon a much longer stretch for that which ensued. Setting out early in the morning, and crossing the high grounds to the south-west of Jedburgh, he led his men up Rule water, famed of old for its hardy warriors, and over the Knot o' the Gate into Liddisdale, equally noted in former times for its predatory bands, as in more recent times for its primitive yeomen and romantic minstrelsy. After a march of at least twenty-five miles, through a land abounding more in poetical associations than in substantial provan, Charles slept that night at Haggiehaugh, upon Liddel water, his men lodging upon the cold ground, or in the houses, barns, and byres of the neighbouring peasantry. Before going to rest, he purchased a small flock of sheep for provisions to his men, and had a person sent for to kill and dress them. Charles Scott, a neighbouring farmer, more commonly called in the fashion of that country Charlie o' Kirnton, was the man employed for this purpose. He was up all night killing sheep; and the prince next morning gave him half a guinea for his trouble. Two Highlanders, who had observed Charlie receive this guerdon, followed him as he was going home, and, clapping their pistols to his breast, demanded an instant surrender of "ta hauf keenie;" a command which the yeoman was obliged to obey for fear of the pistols, though his strength and resolution, celebrated to this day as far surpassing those of modern men, would have enabled him to defy double the number of assailants unprovided with those incalculable weapons.

Next day, Friday the 8th of November, Charles proceeded down Liddel water; and the middle column, which had marched by Selkirk, Hawick, and down Ewesdale, came up to him at Grit-mill Green, upon the banks of the Esk, four miles below Langholm. He entered England that evening, and took up his quarters at a place called Reddings in Cumberland. On the succeeding day, he was joined by the western column, who brought with them the unpleasant news that they had lost thirty carts of the baggage, in consequence of a surprise by the country people at Lockerby.

During this march, the Highland army lost a great portion of its numbers by desertion. The eastern column, led by Charles himself, suffered most from this cause; the disinclination to a southward march prevailing chiefly among the Camerons and MacDonalds. The Lanarkshire and Birlingshire roads are described as having for some days absolutely swarmed with the men who thus abandoned the standard; and great quantities of arms were found lying in the fields adjacent to the line of march, which the deserters had flung away, to facilitate their progress towards the north.

On the 9th of November, Charles, having concentrated his forces, approached Carlisle, the capital of Cumberland, a city which could once boast of being the bulwark of England against the Scots in this direction, but whose fortifications were now at once antiquated and imperfect. Less pains had been taken on the present occasion to fortify the cities in the west of England, than those upon the east; and, while Newcastle and Hull had been for many weeks prepared to resist the insurgents, Carlisle was invested only four or five days after having first apprehended the possibility of an attack. It was protected by an ancient castle, in which there was a company of invalids; and the city itself was surrounded by an old and somewhat dilapidated wall, manned on the present occasion by the citizens, assisted by a considerable body of militia which had been recently raised in the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland.

On the 9th, a party of the prince's hussars appeared on Stanwix Bank, and leisurely began to survey the city through glasses; but a few shots being fired at them from the walls, they were obliged to retire. Next day the insurgent army, having passed the river Eden by several fords, invested the city on all sides; and the prince sent a letter to the mayor, requiring him to surrender peaceably, in order to spare the effusion of blood, which must be the inevitable consequence of a refusal. The mayor only answered by a discharge of cannon at the besiegers. Intelligence soon after reaching the prince, that Marshal Wade was marching from Newcastle to relieve Carlisle, he judged it proper to advance against that general, in order to engage the royal army in the mountainous country which intervenes betwixt the two cities. Leaving a small portion of his army to annoy Carlisle, he reached Warwick Castle at ten o'clock in the forenoon of the 11th, and quartered next night at Brampton and the adjacent villages. He then learned that the information regarding Wade was false, and sent back the Duke of Perth, with several regiments of foot, and some troops of horse, to prosecute the siege of Carlisle with all possible vigour.

Having prepared a quantity of ladders, fascines, and carriages, out of the wood in Corby and Warwick Parks, the besieging party reappeared in full force before the city, on the afternoon of the 13th, and broke ground for a battery within forty fathoms of the walls—the Duke of Perth and Marquis of Tullibardine working in the trenches, without their coats, in order to encourage the troops. The garrison of the city kept up a continual firing during these operations, but without doing much harm. Next day, intimidated by the formidable appearance of the enemy's works, and fatigued almost beyond their natural strength by several nights of ceaseless watching, they felt disposed to resign the city; and accordingly, on the first motion of the besiegers towards an assault, a white flag was displayed from the walls, and terms requested for the surrender of the town. A cessation of hostilities being then agreed upon, an express was sent to the prince at Brampton; but his royal highness, remembering the example of Edinburgh, would assign no terms for the city, unless the castle were included. This being reported to the garrison, Colonel Durand, the commander of that fortress, consented to surrender his charge along with the city. The gates of Carlisle were then thrown open, and many a brave man passed with a rejoicing heart beneath the arches over which his head was hereafter to be stationed in dismal sentinels. The Duke of Perth, on receiving the submission of the garrison, shook them by the hands, told them they were brave fellows, and asked them to enlist in his service. He secured all the arms of the militia and garrison, besides about a thousand stand in the castle, with two hundred good horses; and, over and above all these acquisitions, a vast quantity of valuables, which had been deposited there for safety by the neighbouring gentry.

The capture of Carlisle gave additional reputation to the prince's arms, and knelled a still more dreadful note of alarm into the astounded ear of government. Hitherto, the insurgents had not met with a single instance of bad success, but had overpowered every opposition presented to them, not so much apparently through numerical force, as by individual courage, and a fatality which seemed to work in their favour. At every successive triumph, they themselves were inspired with a higher and higher confidence in their own vigour; and the nation at large became more and more persuaded that there was nothing impossible to them. They seemed to have now nothing to do but to get to London, in order to accomplish their object.

But at this period of their career, fortune seemed at length inclined to desert the side which she had espoused. Dissentions began to distract the councils of Charles, and the insane jealousies of his adherents, to dissipate and weaken the force which had till now been powerfully concentrated upon one particular point. Lord George Murray, envious of the prominent part which the Duke of Perth had taken in the siege and capitulation of Carlisle, waited upon the prince, and resigned his commission, acquainting Charles that he would serve henceforth as a volunteer. Perth, informed of this, waited upon Charles in his turn, and resigned his commission, saying that he would serve at the head of his own regiment. Charles accepted the last resignation, and soon after appointed Lord George Murray sole Lieutenant-General, an office which Lord George saw fit to accept, and which he was certainly calculated by military experience and talents to fill with better effect than his youthful rival.

On the day after the reduction of Carlisle, Marshal Wade commenced a march from Newcastle; but, hearing of the success of the insurgents, and being unable to cross the country on account of a great fall of snow, his excellency found it necessary to return to that city on the 22d, leaving the Chevalier at liberty to prosecute his march towards London.

But more effectual means were now taken by the king to suppress what was generally styled "the unnatural rebellion." Before the Scottish army set foot on English ground, the mass of the British troops had landed at London from Flanders; and, while the prince was residing in Carlisle, an army of 10,000 troops, chiefly veteran and experienced, was rendezvoused in Staffordshire, to oppose him. It seemed to the nation scarcely possible that he should either elude or vanquish so vigilant and so strong a force; and even the Highlanders themselves, with all their valour, real and adventitious, had little hope of doing so. In order, moreover, that the fate of the empire should not be perilled on such a chance, another army was raised for the protection of London, which the king was resolved to command in person. Charles himself was not intimidated by these magnificent preparations, which he trusted to overcome by the vigour of his measures, and by the assistance which he expected in England. But the greater part of his council viewed the king's proceedings with dismay, and, not trusting to the supplies which their leader expected, advocated an immediate retreat into Scotland.

At a council of war held a few days after the surrender of Carlisle, various movements were proposed and taken under consideration. It was proposed to march to Newcastle, and bring Wade's army to an action. It was proposed to march directly to London, by the Lancashire road, at the hazard of encountering the superior force under General Ligonier. A third proposal urged an immediate retreat to Scotland, as there seemed no appearance of either a French invasion or an English insurrection. Charles declared his adherence to the resolution taken at Edinburgh, of marching to London at all hazards, and desired Lord George Murray to give his opinion of the various proposals. Lord George spoke at some length, compared the advantages and disadvantages of each of the proposals, and concluded that, if his royal highness chose to make a trial of what could be done by a march to the southward, he was persuaded that his army, small as it was, would follow him. Charles instantly decided for the march.

Lord George Murray, who advocated this strong measure, was a man of almost chivalrous courage. Robust and brave, with as much of military knowledge and talent as fitted him to command this extraordinary host, he possessed the complete confidence of the Highlanders, so as to have been able to make them do whatever he pleased. Ever the foremost man in all their headlong charges, his usual speech to them was, that he did not ask them to go forward, but only to follow him. He slept little, and was perpetually engaged in calculations for the service and direction of the army. Even before the resignation of the Duke of Perth as Lieutenant-General, he had enjoyed almost the sole power of managing the army; and, throughout the rest of the campaign, his power was as arbitrary as it was well employed. There were few other persons in the army sufficiently versed in military affairs to be capable of even advising him; for Charles and the Duke of Perth, though both full of ardent courage, neither possessed, nor affected to possess, abilities or experience for such a purpose, and the rest of the leaders were acknowledgedly deficient in every quality as soldiers, except those of dauntless intrepidity, and the utmost affection to the cause.

Before marching from Carlisle, Charles sent MacLaughlan of MacLaughlan back to Scotland, with a letter to Lord Strathallan, whom he had left at Perth commander-in-chief of his forces in Scotland, ordering him to march with all his troops after the army into England. The forces lying at Perth now amounted to a considerable number, and were afterwards increased by a numerous body of recruits which Lord Lewis Gordon raised in Aberdeenshire. But Lord Strathallan did not find it convenient to obey his prince's order with the necessary promptitude, and only joined his standard at a period when his assistance was of less moment than it might now have been.

The army, on being mustered at Carlisle, was found to amount to about 4500, having decreased a thousand upon the march from Edinburgh. Yet Charles still hoped to augment it by the help of the English Jacobites; or what he might eventually want in force, when matters came to the push, he blindly trusted to make up in fortune. Leaving a small garrison in Carlisle, he sent forward his cavalry to Penrith upon the 20th of November, and next day followed in person at the head of the infantry—a march of eighteen miles.

On the 22d, the cavalry proceeded to Kendal, and the infantry, resting a day at Penrith, moved forward to join them next day. On the 24th, the cavalry passed the night at Lancaster, whilst the infantry rested at Kendal; and, on the 25th, the cavalry advanced to Preston, and the infantry passed the night at Lancaster. The whole army spent the 27th at Preston, where the prince again exerted himself to cheer the Highland chiefs with hopes of assistance from his English friends. To encourage them to proceed, he continued his former practice of walking beside his men, though he was now in "a country of post-chaises," and might easily have commanded all the luxuries of travelling. He was naturally athletic and active; but it is certain that he strained his bodily powers beyond their proper pitch, in performing this strange point of generalship. In marching over the desolate tract betwixt Penrith and Shap, he was so overcome by fatigue and want of sleep, that he was obliged to take hold of one of the clan Ogilvie by the shoulder-belt, to keep himself from falling; and he walked thus for several miles half asleep.

Though the west of England was generally supposed to be well-affected to the exiled family, Charles neither procured a single recruit upon his march, nor found the proclamation of his father at the market-towns received with any symptom of joy. The Jacobite English expected their political Messiah to come in all the pomp of a real king, and not as the pedestrian and way-worn leader of a half-savage and innumerable band. They had sufficient affection for his cause, but they required to be pretty sure of his ultimate success before risking the pains of treason. Accordingly, when Charles now called upon them to fulfil the promises they had made so often to his father, they to a man feigned excuses for non-appearance, and calmly left him to work out his own fate. The common people, previously alarmed by the reported ferocity of the Highlanders, looked upon them as they passed as a banditti, with whose object they were but imperfectly acquainted; and no more thought of joining their "tartan array," than they would have thought of going upon the highway, or entering a pirate-ship, with the danger of being seized and hanged every hour. It is an attested fact, that many of them went the length of believing the Highlanders to be cannibals, and that the women generally prepared for the approach of the army, by secreting their children.*

While most regarded the Highlanders with painful alarm, and others merely gazed upon them with stupid wonder, the whole body of the people, both citizens and rustics, were exasperated against them on account of the burden which they brought upon them for food and lodging. In Scotland, where hospitality was a virtue in daily exercise, the free quarters required by the troops formed a trifling grievance, lightened in no considerable degree by greater affinity of manners between landlord and guest, and perhaps by the affection of the former to the cause of his lodgers. But the selfish southron could see nothing but disgust, and express nothing but indignation, at having his domestic comfort invaded by a troop of persons whose manners were repugnant to him, and who so seriously injured his fortune. Except at Liverpool, however, and at Chester, no attempts were seriously made to resist the "wild petticoat men," as the English people were pleased to term the insurgents, though they might have easily raised a militia of twenty times their number, and in much smaller parties could have easily impeded, if not altogether interrupted their precipitate and irregular march.

The English people were equally astonished at the temperance and endurance of fatigue displayed on this occasion by the hardy Scots. Accustomed in their sedentary modes of life to the best of cheer, and to a thousand comforts, they could not sufficiently wonder at a body of human beings, who every day began their painful journey before day-break, with no provisions but what they carried in the shape of oat-meal, in a long bag by their sides, and which they never cooked, but merely mixed before eating with a canteen full of cold water; trusting for any variety in this wretched cheer to the accident of a bullock killed for their use, or to the hard-earned hospitality of their landlords at night. They were amazed to find that men could, upon this fare, walk from twenty to thirty miles in a winter day, exposed to the bitterest cold and the most tempestuous weather, with what appeared to them imperfect clothing, or rather rags; and that, though generally housed some hours after sunset, they invariably rose very early to prosecute their march, taking advantage of the moonlight, which then shone in the mornings before day-break. The English churls, wrapped up in their own selfish notions, could form no idea of the enthusiasm which animated the common mind of this hardy little band, making them endure the greatest personal sufferings, and brave the greatest dangers in the cause, promising themselves no obvious advantage, but which they supported, because they thought it just, and loved because it was national and romantic.

* "The terror of the English was truly inconceivable, and in many cases they seemed bereft of their senses. One evening, as Mr. Cameron of Lochiel entered the lodgings assigned to him, his landlady, an old woman, throw herself at his feet, and, with uplifted hands, and tears in her eyes, supplicated him to take her life, but to spare her two little children. He asked her if she was in her senses, and told her to explain herself; when she answered, that everybody said the Highlanders ate children, and made them their common food. Mr. Cameron having assured her that they would not injure either her or her little children, or any person whatever, she looked at him for some moments with an air of surprise, and then opened a press, calling out with a loud voice, 'Come out, children, the gentleman will not eat you.' The children immediately left the press, where she had concealed them; and threw themselves at his feet."—Johnstone's Memoirs.

After one day's rest at Preston, the Highland army marched on the 28th to Wigan, and on the 29th to Manchester; thus inclining towards the centre of England, and for the first time decidedly quitting the west coast. The prince had procured a few recruits at Preston, and been farther gratified by the acclamations and ringing of bells, which there, for the first time in England, attended his proclamations. But at Manchester, he was greeted with a still more vivid gleam of transient encouragement. One Dickson, a serjeant enlisted from the prisoners taken at Preston, with a boldness which almost surpasses belief, having got a day's march ahead of the army, entered Manchester on the morning of the 29th, with his mistress and a drummer, and immediately began to beat up for recruits. The populace at first did not interrupt him, conceiving the whole army to be near the town; but as soon as they knew that it would not arrive till the evening, they surrounded him in a tumultuous manner, with the intention of taking him prisoner, dead or alive. Dickson presented his blunderbuss, which was charged with slugs, threatening to blow out the brains of those who first dared to lay hands on himself or the two who accompanied him, and, by turning round continually, facing in all directions, and behaving like a lion, he soon enlarged the circle which a crowd of people had formed around him. Having continued for some time to manoeuvre in this way, those of the inhabitants of Manchester who were attached to the house of Stuart, took arms, and flew to the assistance of Dickson, to rescue him from the fury of the mob; so that he had soon five or six hundred men to aid him, who dispersed the crowd in a very short time. Dickson now triumphed in his turn, and putting himself at the head of his followers, proudly paraded undisturbed the whole day, with his drummer, enlisting all who offered themselves. That evening, presenting a hundred and eighty recruits to the Highland army, it was found that his whole expenses did not exceed three guineas. This adventure gave rise to many a joke, at the expense of the town of Manchester, from the circumstance of its having been taken, with all its thirty thousand inhabitants, by a serjeant, a drummer, and a girl. The circumstance may serve to show the individual enterprise and courage of the Scottish army, and the general terror with which the English were seized.

Prince Charles entered Manchester, at two o'clock in the afternoon, walking in the midst of a select body of the clans; his dress a light tartan plaid, belted with a blue sash, a grey wig, and the blue velvet bonnet which seems to have been his covering throughout the whole campaign, now adorned in the centre of the top with a white rose, to distinguish him from his officers, all of whom wore their cockades on one side. By order of the Highland army, an illumination was made this evening, and a proclamation issued, that all persons in possession of public money should render it for their use. It was now expected that they would march into Wales, and all the bridges over the Mersey in that direction had been broken down to retard their motions. But they next day directed their march towards a fordable part of the river on the road to London, marching in two columns, one towards Stockport, the other towards Knottersford. Near Stockport, the prince passed the river, with the water up to his middle. The horse and artillery passed with the other detachment at Knottersford, where a sort of bridge was made by filling up the channel of the stream with the trunks of poplar-trees. On the evening of the 1st of December, the two bodies joined at Macclesfield; from whence they resumed their march next day in two columns, one of which went to Congleton, the other to Gawsorth. By this manoeuvre, and by sending an advanced party of thirty men on the road to Newcastle-under-Line, where the advanced party of the royal army was stationed, they distracted the councils of the Duke of Cumberland, now in supreme command, and, causing him to remain where he was, under the idea that they were about to meet him, got past him on the road to London, so far as Derby, which they entered on the 4th.

The approach of the Highland army to this city, was announced by the arrival at eleven in the forenoon of the thirty horse whose motion had deceived the Duke of Cumberland. About three, Lord Elcho came in with the Life Guards and some of the principal officers on horseback; "making a very respectable appearance." The main body of the army continued during the whole afternoon to pour into the town; their bagpipes playing and colours unfurled. The prince himself arrived in the dusk of the evening, on foot, and took up his lodging in the house of the Earl of Exeter. The ordinary proclamations had been previously made in the market-place, by order of his officers.

The Highland army was now somewhat nearer the capital than that of the Duke of Cumberland, divisions of which lay at Litchfield, Coventry, Stafford, and Newcastle-under-Line, to the eastward of Derby. Only a few miles intervened between the two hosts, both of which had hopes of an immediate engagement. It was in Charles's power, either to push on to London, or to fight the superior army of his rival. The latter measure was that which his troops expected he would adopt; and the Highlanders were seen during the whole of the 5th, which they spent in Derby, besieging the shops of the cutlers, to get an edge put upon their broadswords, and quarrelling about precedence in that operation. But their adventure had now reached its crisis; and, after having penetrated England farther than any Scottish host had ever done before, or than any foreign enemy since the Norman conquest, they were at length obliged to yield to a fate which they could no longer brave.

When intelligence reached London that the Highlanders were getting past the royal army, and had reached Derby, within four days' march of the capital, a degree of consternation pervaded the public mind, of which it is impossible to convey any idea. The chevalier Johnstone, speaking from information which he procured a few months afterwards on the spot, says that all the shops were shut, and many of the inhabitants fled to the country; that the bank only escaped bankruptcy by paying in sixpences to gain time; and that the king committed his most valuable effects to yachts at the Tower-stairs, which he ordered to be ready for sailing at a moment's notice. Fielding, in a number of the True Patriot, avers, from personal observation, that, "when the Highlanders, by a most incredible march, got between the duke's army and the metropolis, they struck a terror into it scarce to be credited." It was not only this army they had to fear; but a descent was hourly expected upon the coast from France, and the well-affected part of the community had to apprehend an immediate declaration in favour of the enemy from thousands of their own body, who even already were taking little pains to conceal their sentiments, but openly exulted in the prospect of a restoration. The proceedings of the Highland army had already been so wonderful, and so entirely beyond calculation, that nothing seemed impossible for them to accomplish. The very elements of heaven were favourable to their cause. The majesty of England himself, alarmed in the highest degree, had ordered his own flag to be erected upon Blackheath; thereby personally imploring assistance from his subjects, and signifying his intention of disputing the crown with his formidable rival; but it was generally supposed that, had the Highland army defeated that of the Duke of Cumberland, which it might have done, and then continued its march to London, the last reserve of the king would have melted from his side, and he would have been obliged to quit the kingdom, as King James had done before him. [Swarthstone Bridge, six miles beyond Derby, on the road to London, and ninety-four miles from that city, was, in reality, the extreme point of this singular invasion: because the insurgents posted an advanced guard there, which kept possession of the pass till the retreat was determined on. No former host from Scotland penetrated beyond the Tees, or overrun more than the frontier counties; but this last, and it may be added least of all the armies Scotland ever sent against the Southron, had thus reached the Trent, traversed five counties in succession, and insulated the very centre of England.]

CHAPTER XX.

RETREAT TO SCOTLAND.

The games are done, and Caesar is returning.—Julius Cæsar.

Providence ordered differently a case so pregnant with the fate of Britain. The councils of Charles at Derby have never been distinctly divulged; but it is scarcely necessary that they should. It is sufficient to know that the five thousand warriors who had hitherto displayed so much audacious courage, now began, like the magician, to tremble at the storm they had raised, and to see that the venture which lay before them was too much for mortal man to dare; that retreat gave them a chance of prolonging the war to advantage; but that to advance, was staking ten chances of utter annihilation against one of doubtful success. The Chevalier here received despatches from Scotland, informing him that a regiment of royal Scots, and some picquets of the Irish brigade, had landed at Montrose, under the command of Lord John Drummond, and that, these being united to the troops of Lord Strathallan, he had now on the way to join him, a supplementary army of three thousand men. To fall back a little, and thus reinforce his host, seemed a most desirable object; and the whole council, led by Lord George Murray, after ample deliberation and much keen debate, voted unanimously for this course. Charles alone, ever the advocate of strong measures, and to whose ardour, indeed, the whole war seems to have been indebted for its chivalrous character, continued to urge the expediency of an onward march. He represented this measure in the strongest language he was master of, and, when he saw his council obstinate, is said to have condescended to use entreaties, and even tears. But nothing could move the minds of his councillors; and, before the evening of that last day of their glory, a retreat was finally and firmly determined upon.

The resolution of the council next being made known that night to the army at large, the common men, and many of the officers, on commencing their march next morning before day-break, thought they were going to fight the Duke of Cumberland, and displayed the utmost cheerfulness and alacrity. But, as soon as day-light allowed them to see the surrounding objects, and they found, from marks they had taken of the road, that they were retracing their steps, nothing was to be heard throughout the whole army but expressions of rage and lamentation. "If we had been beaten," says the Chevalier Johnstone, "our grief could not have been greater."

The vexation of the army on this account was nothing to the bitter disappointment of its unhappy leader. Vestigia nulla retrorsum had been his motto from the beginning, and so long as he was going forward, no danger, and far less any privation or fatigue, had given him the least concern. But now, when at length compelled to turn back from the glittering prize which had almost been within his grasp, he lost all his former spirits, and, from being the leader of his hardy bands, became in appearance, as he was in reality, their reluctant follower. In the march forward, he had always been first up in the morning, had the men in motion before break of day, and generally walked, in dress and arms similar to their own, at the head of their body; but now, all his alacrity gone, and evidently considering his case desperate, he permitted the whole army to march before him (except a rear-guard, whom he often compelled to wait for him a long time); and, on coming out of his lodgings, dejectedly mounted a horse and then rode on, without intercourse with his men, to the quarters assigned for him in the van.

The retreat of the army was concerted with so much secrecy, and conducted with so much skill, that it was two days' march a-head of the royal forces, ere the Duke of Cumberland could make himself certain of the fact, or take measures for a pursuit. When he at length ascertained that they were retiring, he changed the defensive system which he had hitherto pursued, for one of active annoyance. Putting himself at the head of his dragoons, and having mounted a thousand foot on horses provided by the gentlemen of Staffordshire, he started from Meriden Common, a place near Coventry, to which he had retired; and, passing by very bad roads through Uttoxeter and Cheadle, came to Macclesfield on the evening of the 10th, full two days after the insurgents had reached the same point. He here received intelligence that, after retreating with wonderful expedition through Ashburne, Leek, and Macclesfield, the enemy had just that morning left Manchester and set forward to Wigan.

One of the schemes of the Highland army in the advance had been, to march into Wales, where the people were well-affected to the house of Stuart, and the nature of the ground promised to be favourable to their desultory mode of warfare. It is a fact well known in Wales, that many of the gentry, in expectation of a visit from the Chevalier, had actually left their homes, and were on the way to join him; but that, when they heard of his retreat from Derby, they returned peaceably each to his own home, convinced that it was now too late to contribute their assistance. The Welsh gentry at that time had the peasantry almost as completely under their power as those of the Scottish Highlands, and their country has ever been noted for the facility with which the common people enlist; so that, it is probable, the Chevalier might here have received a prodigious accession of force. But his retreat kept the country completely quiet; and the Jacobite squire, instead of having their estates confiscated and their blood spilt or attainted, had all their lives afterwards the cheap satisfaction of only boasting in their cups, how far each of them had gone in testimony of his valour and loyalty.

The Highlanders managed their retreat in such a manner as to unite expedition with perfect coolness, and never to allow the enemy to obtain a single advantage. Though on foot, and pursued by cavalry, they kept distinctly a-head of all danger or annoyance for twelve days, two of which they had spent in undisturbed rest at Preston and Lancaster. The troops of the duke were reinforced, on the 12th, by a body of horse which Marshal Wade, now with the army in the centre of Yorkshire, sent with all imaginable haste over Blackstone Edge to intercept the retiring host, but who only reached Preston after it had been several hours evacuated, and in time to join the pursuing force of the Duke of Cumberland. After a halt of one day, occasioned by the false alarm of an invasion on the southern coast, the pursuing army, amounting to three or four thousand horse, continued their course from Preston, through roads which had been rendered almost impassable, partly by the weather, and partly by the exertions of men. Orders had been communicated by the duke to the country people to break down bridges, destroy the roads, and attempt by all means in their power to retard the insurgent army. But, while the hardy mountaineers found little inconvenience from either storm in the air or ruts in the ground, these very circumstances served materially to impede the English dragoons, and to place the two armies upon what might be considered a more equal footing than they could otherwise have been.

The prince, with the main body of his troops, was at Penrith on the evening of the 17th; but his rear-guard, which throughout the retreat was commanded by Lord George Murray, owing to the breaking down of some ammunition waggons, was this night with great difficulty brought only the length of Shap. The delay thus occasioned, allowed the lightest of the duke's horse to overtake the rear of the retiring army. Early in the morning of the 18th, soon after it had commenced its march from Shap, some of the English chassours were seen hovering on the adjoining heights; and about mid-day, as the Highlanders were approaching the enclosures around Clifton Hall, a body of light horse seemed to be forming for attack upon an eminence a little way in front. Lord George Murray ordered the Glengary clan to go forward against these; but, without waiting for an engagement, they immediately retreated.

The rear-guard consisted of Colonel Roy Stuart's regiment of two hundred men, of the Glengary clan, and a few companies which attended the ammunition waggons; but it was reinforced on the present occasion by the Camerons, Stewarts of Appin, and Cluny Macpherson's regiment. Lord George, proud of the post of honour which he held, was the last man in the line. Determined to check the pursuit, he despatched Roy Stuart forward to Penrith, requesting that a thousand men might be sent to him from the main body there stationed. With this force he intended to have gained the flank of the Duke's army, now approaching obliquely from the left, and to have attacked them under favour of the approaching night. But Charles returned Stuart with an order, requiring him to march with all speed forward to Penrith, without taking any offensive measures against the duke. Lord George desired the messenger not to mention this order to any other person; and, resolving to engage the enemy with such force as he had, drew up his troops upon a moor to the right of the road. Just as the sun was setting, the whole body of the duke's army came up and formed within the opposite enclosures; when there was only the road with its two hedges intervening between the two hosts.

Before ordering the attack, Lord George went backwards and forwards along the ranks, speaking to every individual officer, and endeavouring to animate his little host. He then placed himself at the head of the Macpherson regiment (which was on the left of the line,) with Cluny by his side. Daylight was gone, and the moon only now and then broke out from the dark clouds. By this light, Lord George saw a body of men—dismounted dragoons, or infantry who had resumed their proper mode of warfare—coming forward upon the enclosures beyond the road. He ordered the two regiments near him to advance; in doing which, they received a fire from the enemy. At this, Lord George exclaimed, "Claymore!" an ordinary war-cry among the Highlanders, and rushed on sword in hand. The whole left wing then making a direct and spirited attack, forced the dismounted dragoons back to their main body with considerable slaughter, and shouted to let the right wing know their success. They then retired in order to their original position; while the Macdonalds, with equal intrepidity, repulsed the dragoons opposite to their body. A severe check having thus been given to the pursuing army, Lord George drew off his men towards Penrith, where they rested and refreshed themselves. He had lost only twelve men in this action, and left an hundred and fifty of the enemy slain behind him. The only prisoner he took was the Duke of Cumberland's footman, who declared that his master would have been killed, if the pistol with which a Highlander took aim at his head, had not missed fire. The prince had the politeness to send the man instantly back to his master.

The whole of the Highland army spent the night of the 19th December at Carlisle, where it was thought necessary, on evacuating the town next morning, to leave a garrison consisting of the Manchester regiment, some men from the Lowland regiments, and a few French and Irish, in all 300, as a sort of forlorn hope, to keep the English army in play till the insurgents should get clear into Scotland. This small garrison, animated with a greater share of courage and fidelity to the cause they had embraced, than of prudence or foresight, resolved obstinately to defend the city, and took every measure for that purpose which the time and season would allow.

Charles left Carlisle on the morning of the 20th, after having publicly thanked the garrison for their devoted loyalty, and promised to relieve them as soon as he could. The men, drawn up in order to hear his address, saw him depart with acclamations, and, gazing from the walls, soon beheld their comrades draw near the beloved land to which they were never to return. The army reached the Esk, which forms the boundary of the two kingdoms, about two o'clock in the afternoon. The river, usually shallow, was swollen by an incessant rain of several days to the depth of four feet. Yet it was resolved to cross immediately, lest a continuation of the rain, during the night, should render the passage totally impracticable. A skilful arrangement was made, which almost obviated the dangers of the flood. The cavalry was stationed in the river, a few paces above the ford, to break the force of the current; and the infantry having formed themselves in ranks of ten or twelve abreast, with their arms locked in such a manner as to support one another against the rapidity of the river, leaving sufficient intervals between the successive lines for the water to flow through, the whole passed over in perfect safety. Cavalry were placed farther down the river, to pick up all who might be carried away by the violence of the stream. None were lost, except a few girls, who, for love of the white cockade, had followed the army throughout the whole of its singular march, with an heroic devotion which deserved a better fate. The transit of the river occupied an hour, during which, from the close numbers of the men, it appeared to be crossed by a paved street of heads and shoulders. When they got to the other side, and began to dry themselves at the fires lighted upon the bank for that purpose, they were overjoyed at once more finding their feet upon native heath; and, for a moment, they forgot the chagrin which had attended their retreat, and lost in present transport the gloomy anticipations of the future.

An expedition was thus completed, which, for boldness and address, is entitled to rank with the most celebrated in either ancient or modern times. It lasted six weeks, and was directed through a country decidedly hostile to the adventurers; it was done in the face of two armies, each capable of utterly annihilating it; and the weather was such as to add a thousand personal miseries to the general evils of the campaign. Yet such was the success which will sometimes attend the most desperate case, if conducted with resolution, that, from the moment the inimical country was entered, to that in which it was abandoned, only forty men were lost out of five thousand, by sickness, marauding, or the sword of the enemy. A magnanimity was preserved even in retreat, beyond that of ordinary soldiers; and, instead of flying in wild disorder, a prey to their pursuers, these desultory bands had turned against and smitten the superior army of their enemy, with a vigour which effectually checked it. They had carried the standard of Glenfinnan a hundred and fifty miles into a country full of foes; and now they brought it back unscathed, through the accumulated dangers of storm and war.

In their descent upon England, when, in the height of their expectations, private rapine had few charms, the Highlanders conducted themselves with tolerable propriety; and, as the public money was every where raised, they had been able to pay for food with some degree of regularity. But, in their retreat, when their pay was more precarious, and they knew they were going home to their own poor country, it must be acknowledged, that they did not abstain from making reprisals upon the proud Southron. At first they were like the torrent which carries all before it; but latterly they resembled the receding wave, which draws back a thousand little things in its voluminous bosom.

The unhappy garrison of Carlisle saw their fortifications invested by the whole force of the Duke of Cumberland, on the very day following the departure of their fellow-soldiers. They fired upon all who came within reach of their guns, and showed an intention of holding out to the last extremity. But the duke, having procured cannon from Whitehaven, erected a battery upon the 28th, and began to fire with superior effect at the crazy walls of the town and castle. On the morning of the 30th, a white flag appeared upon the walls, and the governor signified a wish to enter into a capitulation. The cannon then ceased, and a message was sent by Governor Hamilton to the duke, desiring to know what terms he would be pleased to give them. His Royal Highness replied, that the only terms he would or could grant, were, "that they should not be put to the sword, but reserved for his Majesty's pleasure." These terms were accepted, and the royal army immediately took possession of the city and castle, placing all the garrison under a strong guard in the cathedral. The fate subsequently meted out to them was such as might have been expected from an enemy smarting under the effects of recent terror, and who was incapable of appreciating generosity in others, as he was of displaying it in himself.

The Duke of Cumberland now thought it unnecessary or dangerous to pursue the insurgents any farther; and, accordingly, on the 5th of January returned to London, leaving his troops under the command of General Wade and Lieutenant-General Hawley, the last of whom was ordered to conduct a portion of the army into Scotland, while Wade remained at Newcastle.

The Chevalier meanwhile pursued his march towards the north. On crossing the Esk, he divided his army into two parties, one of which went by Ecclefechan and Moffat, with Lord George Murray, the Marquis of Tullibardine, and Lords Ogilvie and Nairn. He himself led the other, with the Duke of Perth, Lords Elcho and Pittsligo, Lochiel, Clanranald, Glengary, and Keppoch. He lodged the first night at Annan. Next day, Lord Elcho advanced with four or five hundred men to take possession of Dumfries. The rest went forward with himself, on the day following. Dumfries had reason, on this occasion, for the most alarming apprehensions. The thirty wagons which the insurgents left at Lockerby on their march southward, had been brought into the town by a party of fanatical dissenters, whose zeal for the Protestant succession had caused them to take up arms; and it was to be supposed that the Highlanders would, now that they had it in their power, exact most ample retribution. Besides, the whole country laboured under the reputation of disaffection to the prince—a cause at any time sufficient to excite the cupidity of the adventurers. They accordingly marched into Dumfries, as into a town where they expected resistance, or at least no kindly reception; and, on an idiot being observed with a gun in his hand behind a grave-stone in the church-yard, which they apprehended he was about to fire upon them, it was with the greatest difficulty that the poor creature's life was spared. The prince lodged in a house, now the Commercial Inn, near the centre of the market-place. He had ordered the citizens to contribute the sum of 2000*l.* for his use; some of his men adding, that they might consider it well that their town was not laid in ashes. Nearly eleven hundred pounds of the levy were paid; and two hostages, Provost Crosbie and Mr. Walter Riddel, were carried off for the remainder. On the morning of the 23d, the Highland army directed its march up Nithsdale; and the Chevalier spent the night at Drumlanrig, the seat of the Duke of Queensberry. His reason for lodging in that mansion, was one which governed him in such matters throughout the whole of his expedition. The proprietor of Drumlanrig was strongly opposed to the views of the house of Stuart; and Charles thought proper to put him to the expense of his lodging and that of his men, as an excusable mode of vengeance. A vast number of Highlanders lay upon straw in the great gallery, and he himself occupied the state-bed. Before departing next day, it must be regretted that the Highlanders took that opportunity of expressing their love of King James, by slashing with their swords a series of portraits representing King William, Queen Mary, and Queen Anne, which hung in the grand staircase, a present from the last of these sovereigns to James Duke of Queensberry, in consideration of his services at the Union.

From Drumlanrig, Charles proceeded through the wild pass of Dalveen into Clydesdale, designing to march upon Glasgow, though still endeavouring to conceal his intentions from the members of government at Edinburgh. He spent the night in Douglas Castle. He next day proceeded along the uplands of Clydesdale towards the western capital, and halted at Hamilton, where he lodged in the palace of the Duke of Hamilton. He spent the next day in hunting through the princely parks attached to that house, shooting two pheasants, two partridges, and a deer. It has been recorded by tradition, that, at neither of these ducal mansions, did he follow the absurd fashion of the time, by leaving vails to the servants.

It was with great difficulty that, in this last day's march, his men were prevented from sacking and burning the sweet little village of Lesmahago. During the absence of the army in England, the people of this place, whose ancestors had distinguished themselves in resisting the house of Stuart when in power, committed an act of hostility to Charles's cause, which was calculated to excite their indignation to no common degree. The circumstances, as gathered from tradition, were as follows. The youthful and gallant Kinlochmoidart, in a journey from the Highlands, with despatches for Charles, passed through Lesmahago on his way to England, and was recognised by a young student of divinity, whose religious prepossessions led him to regard the prince's adherents with no friendly eye. As the insurgent gentleman was attended by only a single servant, this zealot conceived a design of waylaying and capturing him, which he immediately proceeded to put in execution. Taking to himself arms, and having roused the country people, he set out after the two travellers, by a path which he knew would enable him to intercept them as they proceeded along the road. He came up with them upon a waste called Brokenscross Moor, within two miles of the village, and, showing his arms, commanded them to surrender in the name of King George. Kinlochmoidart's servant, on first seeing the rabble at a distance, with their old guns and pitchforks, unslinging his piece, and proposed to arrest their progress by a well-directed brace of bullets. But the generous youth resolved rather to surrender at discretion, than thus occasion an unnecessary effusion of blood. He accordingly gave himself up to the daring probationer, who immediately conducted him, under a strong guard, to Edinburgh Castle, from which he was only removed some months afterwards to the shambles of Carlisle. So malicious an act of hostility, in the estimation of most readers, would have almost excused the vengeance which the Highlanders were with such difficulty prevented from executing upon the village.

The city of Glasgow, upon which Charles was now in full march, had much greater reason than Dumfries, or even Lesmahago, to expect severe treatment from the insurgents, while its wealth gave additional cause for alarm, without in the least degree supplying the possibility of defence. This city, newly sprung into importance, had never required nor received the means of defence, but was now lying with its wide-spread modern streets and well-stored warehouses, fully exposed to the license of the invaders. It had distinguished itself, ever since the expulsion of the house of Stuart, by its sincere and invariable attachment to the new government; and, since the Highlanders entered England, had, with gratuitous loyalty, raised no fewer than twelve hundred men for the suppression of the insurrection. Obnoxious by its principles, and affording such prospects of easy and ample plunder, it was eagerly approached by the predatory bands of the Chevalier, who viewed it with feelings somewhat akin to those of the wolf in the fable. By one of their most rapid marches, the first body entered Glasgow on Christmas day, and on the following the prince came up with the rest of the army.

The simple peasantry of Dumfriesshire and Clydesdale viewed the tartan warriors, as they passed along, with sensations different from those with which the men of Teviotdale and Tweeddale had regarded them in their descent upon England. To the latter they seemed brave men going on to a splendid fate, and were gazed at, in their deliberate transit, with a wonder allied to pity. But now, as they tramped wildly on through the quiet vales, and over the bleak uplands of the west—degraded by retreat, and desperate in their circumstances—they had acquired that formidable respectability which invests a strong animal when goaded, and were contemplated with a feeling strangely compounded of fear and awe. In the former case, people had permitted them to enter familiarly into their houses, and mingle in the domestic circle; but now, anxious to have as little intercourse as possible, and almost afraid even to behold them, they were fain to place all the food they could be supposed to possess out of doors upon the way-side, glad to propitiate them at any expense, and trusting, by this means, to induce them to go past without entering their dwellings.

The necessities of the army are described as having been at this time greater than at any other period of the campaign. It was now two months since they had left the land of tartan; their clothes were of course in a most dilapidated condition. The length and precipitation of their late march had destroyed their brogues; and many of them were not only bare-footed, but bare-legged. Their hair hung wildly over their eyes; their beards were grown to a fearful length; and the exposed parts of their limbs were, in the language of Dougal Graham, tanned quite red with the weather. Altogether, they had a way-worn savage appearance, and looked rather like a band of outlandish vagrants, than a body of efficient soldiery. The pressure of want compelled them to take every practicable measure for supplying themselves; and, in passing towards Glasgow, they had regularly stripped such natives as they met of their shoes and other articles of dress. After their arrival at Glasgow, a joiner, in going home from work, was required by a Highlander to throw off and deliver up his shoes. The young man, having a pair of silver buckles at his insteps, showed great reluctance to comply, when the Highlander stooped down and attempted to take them by force. As he was thus employed, the joiner, in a transport of rage, struck him a blow on the back of the head with a hammer which he held in his hand, and killed him on the spot.

Immediately upon his arrival at Glasgow, Charles took measures for the complete refitting of his army, by ordering the magistrates to provide 12,000 shirts, 6000 cloth coats, 6000 pairs of stockings, and 6000 waistcoats. He is also said to have sent for Provost (Buchanan), and sternly demanded the names of such as had subscribed for raising troops against him, threatening to hang the worthy magistrate in case of refusal. The provost is said to have answered, that he would name no person but himself, and that he was not afraid to die in such a cause. He was forced to pay a fine of 500*l*.

Charles took up his residence at what was then considered the best house in the city—one belonging to a wealthy merchant of the name of Glassford, which stood at the western extremity of the Trongate, and was afterwards taken down for the extension of that noble street. At his arrival, he is said to have caused his men to enter this house by the front gate, go out by the back door, and then, making a circuit through some by-lanes, reappear in front of the mansion, as if they had been newly arrived. But this ruse, practised in order to magnify the appearance of his army, was detected by the citizens of Glasgow, whose acute eyes recognised the botanical badges of the various clans, as they successively reappeared. The real numbers of the army, when it reached Glasgow, were only about 3600 foot and 500 horse. Of the latter, which were all much jaded, sixty were employed in carrying the sick; whilst about six hundred of the infantry neither had arms, nor seemed to be able to use them.

During his residence in Mr. Glassford's house, Charles ate twice a day, in public, though without ceremony, accompanied by a few of his officers, and waited upon by a small number of devoted Jacobite ladies. "But nothing could a charm impart," to make the whigs of Glasgow regard him with either respect or affection. Previously hostile to his cause, they were now incensed in the highest degree against him, by his severe exactions upon the public purse, and by the private depredations of his men. To such a height did this feeling arise, that an insane zealot snatched a pistol at him as he was riding along the Saltmarket. He is said to have admired the regularity and beauty of the streets of Glasgow, but to have remarked with bitterness, that nowhere had he found so few friends. During the whole week he spent in the city, he procured no more than sixty recruits—a poor compensation for the numerous desertions which now began to take place, in consequence of the near approach of his men to their own country.

After having nearly succeeded in refitting his army, he held a grand review upon the Green. "We marched out," says one of his adherents, (John Daniel, a native of Lancashire, who has left a manuscript journal of the campaign), "with drums beating, colours flying, bagpipes playing, and all the marks of a triumphant army, to the appointed ground, attended by multitudes of people, who had come from all parts to see us, and especially the ladies, who, though formerly much against us, were now charmed by the sight of the prince into the most enthusiastic loyalty. I am somewhat at a loss," continues this devout cavalier, "to give a description of the prince, as he appeared at the review. No object could be more charming, no personage more captivating, no deportment more agreeable, than his at that time was; for, being well mounted and princely attired, having all the best endowments of both body and mind, he appeared to bear a sway, above any comparison, with the heroes of the last age; and the majesty and grandeur he displayed were truly noble and divine." It may be worth while to contrast, with this flattering portraiture, the description which has been given of Charles by a sober citizen of Glasgow. "I managed," says this person, quoting his memory after an interval of seventy years, "to get so near him, as he passed homewards to his lodgings, that I could have touched him with my hand; and the impression which he made upon my mind shall never fade as long as I live. He had a princely aspect, and its interest was much heightened by the dejection which appeared in his pale fair countenance and downcast eye. He evidently wanted confidence in his cause, and seemed to have a melancholy foreboding of that disaster which soon after ruined the hopes of his family for ever."

CHAPTER XXI.

PRELIMINARIES OF THE BATTLE OF FALKIRK.

The Highlandmen cam owre the hill,
And owre the knowe, wi' richt aude will,
Now Georgie's men may brag their fill,
For woe but they were braw, man!
They had three generals o' the best,
Wi' lairds and lords, and a' the rest,
Chieftains that were bred to stand the test,
And could na rin awa, man!

Jacobite Song.

Having recruited the spirits of his men, and improved their appointments by ten days' residence in Glasgow, the prince departed on the 3d of January, and sent forward his troops in two detachments, one to Kilsyth, and the other to Cumbernauld. The inhabitants of Edinburgh, who, on the return of the Highland army from England, had apprehended a second visit, and who had resolved, in such a case, to defend the city, now set seriously about preparations for a siege. After Charles had left Edinburgh in the beginning of November, the Whiggish part of the community had gradually resumed the courage which, for six weeks, they were compelled to wear in their pockets; and on the 13th of the month, when the insurgents were at the safe distance of Carlisle, the state officers had returned in a triumphant procession to their courts and chambers, saluted by a complete round of cannon from the castle, and a most valiant performance of "Up and Waur them a', Willie," upon the music bells of St. Giles. Next day Hamilton's and Gardiner's dragoons, with Price's and Ligonier's regiment of foot, boldly took possession of the city, probably assured of the safety of the measure, by their avant couriers the judges. These men with the Glasgow regiment, after having guarded the passes of the Forth for more than a month, to prevent the southward march of the host stationed at Perth, retreated to Edinburgh on the 26th of December; when it was determined, with the assistance of a number of rustic volunteers, and the wreck of the Edinburgh regiment, to hold out the city at all hazards against the approaching insurgents. Their courage fortunately did not require to be put to so severe a proof; for, ere the Highlanders had left Glasgow, the English army, beginning to arrive, strengthened the city beyond all danger.

The command of the army, in the absence of the Duke of Cumberland, who was engaged at court, had been bestowed upon Lieutenant-general Henry Hawley, an officer of some standing, but ordinary abilities; who, having charged in the right wing of the king's army at Sheriffmuir, where the insurgents were repulsed with ease by the cavalry, entertained a confident notion that he would beat the whole of Prince Charles's army with a trifling force, and did not scruple to stigmatise the conduct of those who had hitherto been beat by the Highlanders as rank pusillanimity. It happened, in his approach to Edinburgh, that Hamilton's and Gardiner's dragoons, coming out to meet and congratulate him on his accession to the command, encountered him near Preston, the scene of their recent disgrace; which being pointed out to him, he sharply commanded the men to sheathe their swords, and see to use them better in the campaign about to ensue than they had hitherto done. He did not anticipate that the next week was to see himself a beaten and disgraced fugitive, even more contemptible than the objects of his insolence.

The march of the English army was facilitated by the people of the Merse, Teviotdale, and Lothian, who brought horses to transport the baggage, and provisions to entertain the men. At Dunbar, at Aberlady, and other places, they were regularly feasted by the gentlemen of East Lothian, each soldier getting a pound of beef, a pound of bread, a glass of usquebaugh, and bottle of ale. The first division, consisting of the Scots royals and Batareau's foot, reached Edinburgh on the 2d of January. Fleming's and Blakeney's regiments arrived on the 3d; Major-general Huske on the 4th; and Hawley himself came to town on the 6th, when the music bells were played in his honour, and he was permitted to lodge in the palace so recently vacated by Prince Charles. The regiments commanded by Colonels Cholmondeley and Wolfe—the last afterwards so renowned as the hero of Quebec—arrived next day: Howard's and Monro's foot on the 8th; and Barrel's and Pulteney's on the 10th. The loyal part of the inhabitants of Edinburgh beheld the assembling of this army with the highest satisfaction, and entered into an association to provide them with blankets. The city was also illuminated in honour of the occasion; when a great number of windows belonging to recusant Jacobites and to houses which happened to be unoccupied, were indiscriminately broken by the mob.

In his march from Glasgow, Prince Charles slept the first night at the mansion of Kilsyth, which belonged to a forfeited estate, and was now in the possession of Mr. Campbell of Shawfield. The steward had been previously ordered to provide for the prince's reception, and told that all his expenses would be accounted for. He had accordingly provided every thing suitable for the entertainment of his royal highness and suite, confidently believing that he would not be permitted to act the part of an innkeeper without some solid remuneration. Next morning, however, on presenting his bill, he was told that it should be allowed to him on his accounting (after the restoration) for the rents of the estate, and that in the mean time he must be contented that the balance was not immediately struck and exacted.

On the succeeding day, Charles proceeded to Bannockburn house, where he was a more welcome guest, without the promise of pecuniary remuneration, than he had been at Kilsyth with the prospect of a good reckoning; this house being, as already mentioned, the residence of Sir Hugh Paterson, one of the most zealous of his friends. His troops lay this evening in the villages of Bannockburn, Denny, and St. Ninian's, while Lord George Murray occupied the town of Falkirk with the advanced guard of the army. In order to employ the time till he should be joined by his northern allies, Charles now resolved to reduce Stirling, which, commanding the principal avenue to the Highlands, had long been felt as an annoying barrier to his proceedings, and to subjugate which would have given an additional lustre to his arms.

Stirling, then a town of four or five thousand inhabitants, was imperfectly surrounded by a wall, and quite incapable of holding out against the insurgents; yet, by the instigation of the governor of the castle, who had resolved to die before surrendering his charge, a sort of attempt was made to defend it. A small body of militia, consisting chiefly of the townsmen, was provided with arms from the castle; and the Reverend Ebenezer Erskine, founder of the sect of dissenters already mentioned, and who was a clergyman in Stirling, did all he could to inspire them with courage, and even it is said assumed an active command in their ranks. By means of these men, the wretched defences of the town, which consisted on one entire side of only garden walls, were provided with a sort of guard, which Governor Blackney endeavoured to animate by an assurance that, even in case of the worst, he would keep an open door for them in the castle.

On Sunday, the 5th of January, the town was completely invested by the insurgents, and about nine o'clock that evening a drummer approached the east gate, beating the point of war which indicates a message. The sentinels, ignorant of the forms of war, fired several shots at this messenger; upon which he found himself obliged to throw down his drum, and take to his heels. The garrison then towed the deserted instrument in over the walls, as a trophy; and it was not without considerable difficulty they could be afterwards assured that they had not gained a great victory over the besiegers.

On Monday, the insurgents having raised a battery within musket shot of the town, and sent a more unequivocal message to surrender, the magistrates implored a respite till next day at ten o'clock, which was granted. The whole of Tuesday was occupied in deliberations and in adjusting the terms of surrender. The town, however, being stimulated that evening by the discharge of twenty-seven shots from the battery, a capitulation was concluded next morning, by which it was agreed to deliver up the town, under assurance of protection for the lives and property of the townsmen, whose arms, moreover, were permitted to be restored to the castle. The insurgents entered the town about three in the afternoon.

Charles was now joined by the troops under Lord Strathallan and Lord John Drummond, which increased his numbers to nine thousand. He also received a considerable quantity of stores, which had been landed from France upon the northeast coast of Scotland, including some battery cannon; besides some Spanish coin, which had been brought to the island of Barra, and safely transported through the Highlands by a party of recruits.

The Highland army broke ground before Stirling castle on the 10th, and summoned Governor Blackney to surrender. That officer gave for answer that he would defend his post to the last extremity, being determined to die, as he had lived, a man of honour. They first attempted to convert a large old building at the head of the town, called Marr's Work, into a battery; but, finding themselves to be there peculiarly exposed to the fire of the garrison, they were soon obliged to cast about for new ground. Meanwhile, they shut the gates of the town upon themselves, as if resolved to battle with their enemy to the last extremity, and not again to come forth upon the world till the conflict was decided.

On the day that Charles thus commenced the siege of Stirling, Hawley had been joined at Edinburgh by all the divisions of the army which he could immediately expect. As his force consisted of nearly eight thousand men, of whom thirteen hundred were cavalry, he considered himself fully a match for the insurgents, and now determined to offer them battle, though he knew that there were several other regiments on the march to Scotland, which would soon join him. He was perhaps induced to take this rash step, partly by observing that the Highland force was every day increasing, and partly by a wish to relieve the garrison of Stirling; but a blind confidence in the powers of the army, especially the dragoons, and an ardent desire of distinguishing himself, must certainly be allowed to have chiefly instigated him to the measure. He had often been heard to reflect upon the misconduct of Cope; (who, in his turn, had taken bets, it is said, to the amount of ten thousand pounds, that this new commander would have no better success than himself.) He therefore went on to battle under the influence of a sort of hallucination, and altogether without that considerate coolness which properly forms so conspicuous a part of modern generalship.

On the morning of the 13th, five regiments, together with the Glasgow militia, and Hamilton's and Ligonier's (late Gardiner's) dragoons, left Edinburgh, under the command of Major-general Huske, and reached Linlithgow, where, meeting with a party of Highlanders under Lord George Murray, who had advanced to lay waste the country, they induced that desultory band to retire to Falkirk, though without coming to active collision. Next day other three regiments marched westwards to Borrowstounness, to be ready to support General Huske in case of an engagement; on the following morning the remainder of the army, with the artillery, pursued the same route. Hawley himself marched on the 16th, with Cobham's dragoons, which had just come up. The army was accompanied by a North of England Squire, named Thornton, whose zealous loyalty had induced him to raise a band called the Yorkshire Blues, who were maintained and commanded by himself.

The whole of this well disciplined and well appointed force encamped to the northwest of Falkirk, upon the same field where, four centuries before, Sir John D. Graham, and Sir John Stuart of Bonkill, the friends of Wallace, had testified their patriotism in the arms of death.

On the morning of the 17th, Lieutenant-colonel Campbell, afterwards Duke of Argyll, who had been hitherto exerting himself to keep the West Highlands quiet, joined the English camp with upwards of a thousand Highlanders, forming the only force which the great Whig Clan Campbell, then supposed able to bring six thousand men into the field, thought fit on this occasion to contribute for the service of government.

On this morning General Hawley was spared the necessity of marching forward to raise the siege of Stirling, by intelligence that the Highlanders were in motion; for Prince Charles, learning the near approach of the English general, had resolved, with his usual ardour, to meet him half way; and was now drawing out his men, as for a review upon the Plean Moor, two miles to the east of Bannockburn, and about seven from Falkirk. The English army did not, therefore, strike their camp, but judged it necessary to remain where they were till the intentions of the enemy should be revealed.

When the English lay upon the field of Falkirk, and the Highlanders were drawn up upon the Plean Moor, their respective camp lights were visible to each other over the level tract of country which intervened. The whole scenery was worthy of the events about to take place, and was calculated to give additional poignancy to that tumult of anxious and agitating feeling which must ever pervade the breasts of men before engaging in deadly strife. Upon the site of the English camp, an army of Edward I. had, in 1298, gained a bloody though not decisive victory, over the desultory troops of the Scottish Chiefs; slaying two of the most noble and disinterested warriors that ever attempted to defend their country, and compelling the indomitable Wallace to retreat. The Highlanders were, on the other hand, drawn up upon a field where the arms of England received the most decisive overthrow they ever before or since experienced, and which might be considered as opening peculiar favour to Charles, who was the representative, and not an unworthy one, of the hero of that memorable day. Betwixt the two armies lay the straggling remains of the one extensive Torwood, in whose gloomy recesses Wallace used to find a refuge suited to his dismal fortunes, and where a tree was yet shown, which had afforded immediate shelter to his person, when deserted by his associates, and closely pursued by the English. Other associations conspired to heighten the interest of the scene. Here was supposed to be the extreme limit of the Roman power in Britain; and the neighbouring country might be considered as one great battle field—a landscape on which nature had lavished all its grandeur and beauty, but which man, from the earliest times, had made the theatre of his blackest and bloodiest work.

On this occasion, as on almost all others throughout the campaign, Charles found himself able to out-general the old and experienced officers, whom the British government had sent against him. Though he had drawn out his men, and seemed ready for an immediate encounter with Hawley's army, he kept his real intentions a profound secret from even his own officers, making the main body believe that the evolutions in which they were engaged, were only those of an ordinary review; and it was not till mid-day, that, having suddenly called a council of war, he announced his determination to march in the direction of the enemy.

The conduct of Hawley displayed as much of negligence on this occasion, as that of Charles displayed calculation and alacrity. He was inspired, we have already said, with an infinite contempt for the Highlanders, or "Highland militia," as he himself was pleased to term Charles's troops. Having come to drive the wretched rabble from Stirling, he could not conceive the possibility of their coming to attack him at Falkirk. Being apprised on the 16th, by a Mr. Roger, who had passed through the Highland army, and conversed with some of the officers, that there was a proposal amongst them to march next day against him, he treated the informant with great rudeness, and contented himself with giving vent to a vain expression of defiance. On the morning of the day of battle, such was his continued security, that he obeyed an insidious invitation from the Countess of Kilmarnock, by retiring from the camp to breakfast with her at Callander house, although quite aware of that lady's relationship to an insurgent chief, and even perhaps of her own notorious attachment to the cause of Prince Charles. The ruse of the countess was attended with complete success. She was a woman of splendid person and manners; and Hawley, completely fascinated by her well acted blandishments, spent the whole of this important forenoon in her company, without casting a thought upon his army.

Charles, observing the wind to come from the southwest, directed the march of his men towards a piece of ground considerably to the right of Hawley's camp, in order that, in the ensuing encounter, his troops might have that powerful ally to support them in rear. He took care, at the same time, to despatch Lord John Drummond, with nearly all the horse, towards the other extremity of Hawley's lines, so as to distract and engage the attention of the enemy. In order to produce still further uncertainty among the English regarding his intentions, he caused a body to retire to Stirling, with colours displayed in their sight; and upon the Plean Moor, which was thus entirely deserted, he left his great standard flying, as if that had still been his head quarters.

Completely perplexed by the various objects which they saw dispersed over the country, the English army remained in their camp, not altogether unapprehensive of an attack, but yet strongly disposed, like their commander, to scout the idea that the Highlanders would venture upon so daring a measure. While they were still ignorant of the insidious advance which Charles was making, a countryman, who had perceived it, came running into the camp, and exclaimed, "Gentlemen, what are you about? The Highlanders will be immediately upon you!" Some of the officers cried out, "Seize that rascal—he is spreading a false alarm!" But they were speedily assured of the truth of the report, by two of their number, who had mounted a tree, and, through a telescope, discovered the Highlanders in motion. The alarm was immediately communicated to a commanding officer, who, in his turn, lost no time in conveying it to Callander house. Hawley received the intelligence with the utmost coolness, and contented himself with ordering that the men might put on their accoutrements, without getting under arms. The troops obeyed the order, and proceeded to take their dinner.

It was between one and two o'clock, that several gentlemen, volunteer attendants on the camp, coming in upon the spur, gave final and decisive intelligence of the intention of the enemy. They reported that they had seen the lines of the Highland infantry evolve from behind the Tor Wood, and cross the Carron by the Steps of Dunnipace. The drums instantly beat to arms; an urgent message was despatched for the recreant Hawley; and the lines were formed, in front of the camp, by officers on duty. The negligence of their general was now bitterly reflected on by the men, many of whom seemed impressed with the idea that he had sold them to the enemy.

The people dwelling between the present positions of the two armies, in the dreadful expectation of being speedily involved in the horrors of a battle, were at this moment, as may easily be conceived, in a state of great alarm; and though such circumstances are generally overlooked in the narrative, as they are disregarded in the reality of warfare, this is not perhaps the least interesting matter connected with the conflict of arms. The people might be seen, as we are informed by tradition, hurrying to and fro across the country, equally uncertain where danger was to be avoided, or safety to be sought, and betraying, by their looks, how dreadful a thing the presence of war is to the generality of a peaceful people. Some were attempting to transport articles of property upon which they placed a value, and others seemed only anxious to save their children and aged relations. A number of the citizens of Falkirk stationed themselves upon the fortified bartizan of the steep which then surmounted their town house, uniting the gratification of curiosity with a desire of safety, and giving a peculiar liveliness to the general scene of flight and fear.

The family of a farmer named Muirhead, who lived about a mile to the west of Falkirk, was sent to take refuge in the house of a friend at that town; and one of the children, who survived till recent years, used to tell that in this short but dismal journey, she well remembered crossing the lines of the royal army, near the entry to Bantaskine house, where it stretched across the road, apparently extending from the low grounds on the north a good way up the park towards the south. As the men were giving way, to allow a passage for the children, a hare started up near the place, and ran through the lines; upon which, the soldiers raised a loud viere-hollo, and one, more ready witted than the rest, exclaimed, "Halloo, the Duke of Perth's mother!"—it being a general belief that that zealous old catholic lady was a witch, and therefore able to assume the disguise of a hare, which, in the present case, she could not be supposed to do, but for the purpose of spying the English army. The soldier's exclamation was received with shouts of laughter, as a capital joke upon the distinguished insurgent leader, against whom it was directed.

The last message which had been despatched to Callander, succeeded in bringing Hawley to a sense of the exigency of his affairs, and he now came galloping up to his troops, his head uncovered, and other marks about his person betraying the haste with which he had left the hospitable table of Lady Kilmarnock. The day, which had hitherto been calm and cloudless, became at this moment overcast with heavy clouds, and a high wind beginning to blow from the southwest, seemed about to bring on a severe winter storm. The seventeenth of January, old style, being in reality the twenty-eighth, it may be necessary to remind the reader, that the weather must have been now beginning to exhibit rather the austere character of a Scottish February, than the comparatively serene temperance of the preceding month; and, extrinsic as the circumstance may appear, it is certainly supposable, that the dismal appearance of the western sky, and the terrors with which it seemed to be charged, must have proved no small addition to the obstacles which the English army, unused to such a climate, was about to encounter.

While they stood in the position already mentioned, Charles was eagerly leading forward his desultory bands to a wild upland, of irregular surface, called Falkirk Moor, two miles southwest of the English camp. In crossing the Carron at Dunnipace Steps, and thus making for a rising ground where he could overlook Hawley's position, he precisely acted over again the very course he had pursued four months before, in crossing the Esk at Musselburgh, and ascending the heights above Cope's station at Preston; and it may be added, that there is a remarkable resemblance in the corresponding localities. Hawley, on learning the direction Charles was taking, seems to have immediately suspected that he was in danger of becoming the victim of a similar course of measures to that which occasioned the defeat of Cope; and, having the bad effect of that general's caution before his eyes, he appears to have immediately adopted the resolution of disputing the high ground. He therefore gave a hasty command to the dragoons to march towards the top of the hill, in order, if possible, to anticipate the Highlanders; and the foot he commanded to follow at a quick pace with their bayonets inserted in the musket. To this precipitate measure, by which he placed his army on ground he had never seen, and which was the unfittest possible for the movements of regular troops, while it was proportionally advantageous for the Highlanders, the disasters of the day are altogether to be attributed.

The dragoons galloped up a narrow way called Maggie Wood's Loan, by the eastern extremity of Bantaskine Park, where a man, who only died lately, heard them swearing, as they went along, with all their proverbial fury, and venting the most ferocious threats against the men they were about to encounter. The foot followed, with a similar show of promptitude and courage; and the artillery, consisting of ten pieces, came last of all, driven by a band of Falkirk carters, who, with their horses, had been hastily pressed into King George's service that forenoon. Whether from accident, or from the design of these fellows, who were all rank Jacobites, the artillery stuck in a swampy place at the end of the Loan, beyond all power of extrication; and the drivers then cut the traces of their horses, and galloped back to Falkirk. The sudden southwest, against which the army was marching, now let forth its fury full in their faces, blinding them with rain, and rendering the ascent of the hill doubly painful. Still they struggled on, encouraged by the voice and gesture of their general, whose white uncovered head was every where conspicuous as he galloped about, and who, to do him justice, seemed ardently desirous to recover the effects of his negligence.

Before Hawley commenced this ill-starred march, Charles had entered Falkirk Moor at another side, and was already ascending the hill. His troops marched in two parallel columns, about two hundred paces asunder; that which was nearest the king's army consisting of the clans that had been in England, and the other comprising all the late accessions, with some low country regiments. The former was judiciously designed to become the front line in ranking up against the enemy.

A sort of race now commenced between the dragoons and clans, towards the top of the moor; each apparently esteeming the preoccupation of that ground as of the most essential importance to the event. The clans attained the eminence first; and the dragoons were obliged to take up somewhat lower ground, where they were prevented from coming into direct opposition with the Highlanders by a morass on their left.

The three MacDonald regiments, according to the right of the great Clan Colla to that distinguished position, marched at the head of the first column, in order to form eventually the right wing of the army in battle array; but, on the present occasion, Glencairn's minor regiment of MacGregors, exerting greater speed in the race with Hawley's dragoons, and being therefore the first to reach the top of the hill, took that post of honour, which they retained throughout the ensuing conflict. The first line of the insurgent army was therefore formed by the following regiments, reckoning from right to left: MacGregor, Keppoch, Clanranald, Glengary, Apin, Cameron, the Frasers under the Master of Lovat, and the MacPhersons under Cluny, their chief. At the right extremity, Lord George Murray had the chief command, fighting as usual on foot. On the left there was no general commander, unless it was Lord John Drummond, whose attention, however, was chiefly directed to his French regiment in the rear. The second line was chiefly composed of low country regiments, which stood in the following order:—Athole, Ogilvie, Gordon, Farquharson, Cromarty and the French. The prince stood on an eminence behind the second line, with the horse; having been implored by the army not to hazard his person by that active collision with the enemy, for which, as at Preston, he expressed his ardent desire.

Opposite to the Highland army thus disposed, but rather inclining to the north on account of the morass and of the declivity, the English foot were drawn up also in two lines, with the horse in front, and a reserve in the rear. The first line comprised the following regiments from right to left:—Wolfe, Cholmondeley, the Scots Royal, Price, and Ligonier; the second, Blakeney, Monro, Fleining, Barrel and Batterau. The reserve was composed of the Glasgow Regiment, Howard's, and the Argyll Militia.

Falkirk Moor, an upland now covered with thriving farms, and intersected by the Union Canal, was then a tract of the most rude and savage character, irregular in its surface without rising into peaks, and bearing no vegetation but a shaggy species of heath. It was upon its broad ridge at the top, that the two armies were disposed. Charles's army, from its precedence in the race, occupied the most elevated ground, facing the east. The English stood upon ground a little lower, with their backs towards the town of Falkirk. The country was not encumbered by enclosures of any kind; but a sort of hollow, or dean, as it is called in Scotland, commenced nearly opposite to the centre of the Highland lines, and ran down between the two armies, gradually widening towards the plain below, and opening up at one place into a spacious basin. By this ravine, which was too deep to be easily passed over from either side, two thirds of the English were separated from about one half of the Highland army. Owing to the convexity of the ground, the wings of both armies were invisible to each other.

To conclude this account of the disposition of the English, the Argyll Highlanders and Ligonier's regiment were stationed in the hollow just mentioned: the Glasgow regiment was posted at a farm house behind the other extremity; and the horse stood a little in advance of the foot, opposite to the right wing of the Highlanders, without any portion of the ravine intervening. General Hawley commanded in the centre, Brigadier Cholmondeley on the left, and Major-general Huske on the right. The horse were immediately under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Ligonier, who, stationed on the left, with his own regiment (lately Gardiner's), had Cobham's and Hamilton's on his right, and personally stood almost opposite to Lord George Murray.

In numbers, the two armies were nearly equal, both amounting to about eight thousand; and as they were alike unsupplied by artillery (for the Highlanders had also left theirs behind), there could scarcely have been a better match, so far as strength was concerned. But the English had disadvantages of another sort, such as the unfitness of the ground for their evolutions, the interruption given to so much of their lines by the ravine, the comparative lowness of their ground, and the circumstance that they had the wind and rain full in their faces, while the Highlanders were rather impelled than retarded by that powerful auxiliary.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE BATTLE OF FALKIRK.

Up, an' rin awa, Hawley,
Up, an' rin awa, Hawley!
Tak' care, or Charlie's gude claymore
May gie's your lugs a claw, Hawley!—Jacobite Song.

It was near four o'clock, and the storm was rapidly bringing on premature darkness, when Hawley ordered his dragoons to advance, and commence the action. As already mentioned, he had an idea that the Highlanders would not stand against the charge of a single troop of horse; much less did he expect them to resist three regiments, amounting to thirteen hundred men. The result showed, however, that he was completely mistaken, and that there was not a greater fallacy in military science than one then prevalent throughout Europe, that cavalry were indispensable and tantamount in an army. Colonel Ligonier himself is said to have expressed his surprise at Hawley's order; and the men showed most unequivocally that they thought it the height of rashness. Advancing slowly and timidly towards the Highland lines, they no sooner received the fire of their opponents, than, without discharging a single piece, or staining a single sword with blood, they wheeled about with one consent, and retreated. Ligonier's and Hamilton's—the cravens of Preston—rushed headlong over the left wing of their own foot, who lay upon their faces; bawling as they went along, "Dear brethren, we shall all be massacred this day!" Cobham's, with only a lesser degree of cowardice, galloped in a body down the ravine between the two armies, so as to receive the fire of the whole Highland line as they went along.

The Highlanders, according to an order from Lord George Murray, having only fired at the dragoons when they were within half pistol-shot, the volley they gave brought a considerable number to the ground, including several officers of distinction, and, in the graphic language of Dougal Graham, caused many others to swing in their saddles. It would appear also, that this sudden firing when so near the dragoons, had the good effect of staggering and turning the raw horses of at least Ligonier's and Hamilton's; an effect not extended to Cobham's, because that regiment had previously stood fire in Flanders.

From this general disgrace, there was but one small, though honourable exception, in the conduct of a portion of the troops who happened to be near Lieutenant-colonel Whitney; a brave officer, who had remained behind his retreating horse at Preston, though wounded in the sword-arm. Inspired probably by the courage of this officer, and with him at their head, this little band made the charge with great spirit. As the colonel was going forward to the attack, he recognised John Roy Stuart, a former friend, and cried out, "Ha! are you there? we shall soon be up with you." Stuart exclaimed in reply, "You shall be welcome when you come, and, by G—, you shall have a warm reception!" Almost at that moment, the unfortunate leader received a shot, which tumbled him lifeless from the saddle. His party rushed resistlessly through the front line of the Highlanders, trampling down all that opposed them. But their bravery was unavailing. The Highlanders, taught to fight in all postures and under every variety of circumstances, though thrown upon their backs beneath the feet of the cavalry, used their dirks in stabbing the horses under the belly, or, dragging down the men by their long-skirted coats, engaged with them in mortal struggles, during which they seldom failed to poniard their antagonists. The chief of Clanranald was overwhelmed by a dead horse, from which he could not extricate himself, when one of his own clan tumbled down beside him in the arms of a dismounted dragoon. From this situation he could not well make his condition known to any more distant clansman, and it almost appeared that his existence depended upon the success which this man might have with the dragoon. After a brief but dreadful interval, the Highlander contrived to stab his foe, and then sprang to relieve his prostrate chief.

The dragoons being thus disposed of, Lord George Murray, who from his situation did not see much of the English army, ordered the Keppoch regiment to keep their ranks, and sent the same command to the rest of the MacDonald corps. But nothing could restrain the impetuous bravery of these men, who, running forward, and loading their pieces by the way, were immediately ready to attack the royal infantry, now disordered by the retreat of the dragoons. Receiving one imperfect fire from the front line of the English, or rather from the confused mass into which the flank had been thrown, they rushed down hill, firing their pieces as they went along; and then fell on, sword in hand. The fury with which they made this charge was such as nothing could resist; and in a moment the whole upper or southern half of the army simultaneously gave way, having already found their pieces almost useless with the rain, and being apparently convinced that it was impossible to oppose both the Highlanders and the storm.

The individuals, who from the steeple of Falkirk beheld this extraordinary spectacle, used to describe the main event of the battle as occupying an amazingly brief space of time. They first saw the English army enter the misty and storm-covered moor at the top of the hill; then saw the dull atmosphere thickened by a fast-rolling smoke, and heard the pealing sounds of the discharge; immediately after, they saw the discomfited troops burst wildly from the thunder-cloud in which they had been involved, and rush, in far-spread disorder, over the spacious face of the hill. From the commencement till what they picturesquely styled "the break of the battle," there did not intervene more than ten minutes;—so soon may an efficient body of men, for whose united strength no feat might seem impossible, become, by one transient emotion of cowardice, a feeble and contemptible rabble.

Immediately on ascertaining the fortune of the day,

This unaccountable pantomime astonished the prisoners, and they entreated an explanation from one of the insurgent officers who stood near. He answered, that the soldier was not in reality what he seemed, but a Cameron, who had deserted his regiment (the Scots Royals) during the conflict, to join the company of his chief; when he had been permitted to retain his dress and arms till he could be provided with the uniform of the clan. The Highlander who interposed was his brother, and the crowd, that had rushed in, his clansmen the Camerons. Lord Kilmarnock, in presuming to interfere, even through ignorance, in the affairs of a clan, had excited their high displeasure; "nor, in my opinion," continued the officer, "can any person in the Prince's army take that cockade out of the man's hat, except Lochiel himself."

During the stay of the Highlanders at Falkirk, they treated the inhabitants with extraordinary lenity, on account of their connection with the Earl of Kilmarnock, and the readiness which they displayed in serving the cause of the "yellow-haired laddie." An old woman who still lives (1827) at the age of ninety-seven, and was of course fifteen years of age at the time of the battle, informed the writer of these sheets, that the Highlanders were considered a merciful enemy compared with the dragoons. There was at that time a number of receptacles in Falkirk, called "girnals," where the meal which the various neighbouring landlords received for rent, was retained to the common people. These, during the occupation of the town by the Highlanders, were carefully locked up, so that the poor soon found it impossible to procure their ordinary food. A complaint to this effect being made by an old woman to a Highland officer, he proceeded to break open one of the sequestered stores, sold off all the meal it contained to the common people at a reduced price, and then deliberately marched off with the money. The inhabitants of Falkirk to this day cherish the memory of these brave men and of their gallant leader, with enduring fondness.

The general lenity of the Highlanders was not without numerous exceptions; many of them displaying just as much rapacity in Falkirk, as they would have done in a town of less favourable sentiments. A small party of them, on the day after the battle, laid violent hands on a flaming Jacobite named David Watt, then the principal inn-keeper of Falkirk; brought him out to the street in front of his own door, and setting him down squat upon the causey, deliberately eased his feet of a pair of new shoes with silver buckles. He protested his Jacobitism, to save them; but the spoilers, perhaps accustomed to such shallow excuses, totally disregarded his declaration; ironically observing, "Sae muckle ta better—she'll no grumble to shange a progue for the prince's guid." It is needless to add that David's principles were a good deal shaken by this unhappy incident.

It is also remembered at Falkirk that it was the general practice of the Highlanders, to enter the houses of the inhabitants about the time when meals occurred; seizing, if at breakfast time, the dishes of porridge prepared for the family, and, if at dinner time, searching the kail-pots with their dirks for what solids they might contain. Whenever they found the porridge dishes arranged on the outside of the windows to cool, they emptied them into their own canteens and went away, looking back and laughing at the owners, who might come out of doors to express their consternation at the event. To these acts of felony the people never dared to make any resistance, aware of the vengeance which it might have excited. One old woman only, out of all the inhabitants, was known on any occasion to protect her property. On their making advances to her kail-pot, this heroine courageously mounted guard upon it, seized the ladle, and threatened to scald the first that approached her, with the boiling liquid. They were staggered by her boldness, which seemed to promise them the fate awarded by Robinson Crusoe to the Cochise Chinese; and, partly from amusement at her ludicrous attitude, thought proper to retire.

The old lady already mentioned, as having, when a child, gone through the lines of the English army before the battle, also remembered that the Highlanders came next day to her mother's house, near Falkirk, in search of provisions. Colonel Campbell, of the Argyle militia, had previously taken up his abode here, and, on learning the approach of the enemy, caused his baggage to be buried in the farm-yard, leaving only a French valet behind, to take charge of it. The Highlanders seized this man, and, by pinching his body, obliged him to discover his precious charge. It was immediately appropriated; and our venerable informant had a picturesque recollection of the rude mountaineers sitting round the fire, and drinking the colonel's wine out of parritch luggies.

The gudewife had taken similar precautions in regard to her own valuables and provisions, burying some things in the fields, and concealing part of her meal in pillow-slips, which were inserted into the insides of as many sacks of chaff. But by pinching herself and her children, and by thrusting their dirks and swords into the sacks, they succeeded in getting possession of almost every thing that had been put out of the way. It is needless to observe that this want of gallantry was entirely occasioned by the attempt which they saw had been made to deceive them; for when people displayed a willingness to supply provisions, or trusted to their generosity, they were almost invariably kind. One favourable circumstance is recorded of them—they were never fastidious about their food. The ordinary humble fare of the cottagers of that time—meal, milk, cheese, and butter—they accepted with thankfulness. Oat-meal was what they generally demanded; and if supplied with a modicum of that, suitable to the apparent circumstances of the family, they went away contented. Nothing, moreover, seems to have ever given them so much pleasure, as to fall upon a churn in the process of butter making. Numerous instances are remembered throughout the country, of their rioting over such an article with the most extravagant expressions of satisfaction. If, in the course of their searches, they asked for bread, and were told that there was none in the house, they have been known to say, "Och, her nain sel will take a butter or cheese, till a bread be ready." It was their custom in a march, for small parties of from three to ten persons, to digress from the main body, towards the farms which lay within sight of the road, and there to satisfy their hunger. Thus, in the course of a day's march, every individual in the army procured at least one meal. They seem to have behaved very fairly, in regard to each other, throughout these transactions. On a farmer's wife in Tweedsmuir giving a cheese to a party of four, they immediately cut it with their dirks into quarters, of which each took away one.

It is perhaps unnecessary to offer any apology for the rapine which distinguished this singular campaign. The prince, though supplied with considerable sums from his father, from the French government, and from his friends in Britain, was unable to give his men a pay sufficient for their travelling expenses; and they were therefore obliged to levy contributions on the country. Charles did not openly sanction their proceedings; but, well knowing he could not ask them to starve, was under the necessity of passing them over without punishment. He perhaps justified himself in his own eyes, by the consideration that all he was doing was for the good of the country, and that, after the electors of Hanover had so long subsisted upon his father's subjects, there was comparatively little harm in his thus quartering upon them for a single winter. The same reasoning applied, with still greater force, to the levies he made upon the public tax-offices throughout the kingdom.

It cannot be denied, that, in so large a body of men, there were many, who, unable to resist the temptations presented to them, abused the power of their arms in a way which admits of no palliation. As one instance for all, we may mention the conduct of an officer of the MacGregor corps, as reported to us, at only second-hand, from one of the regiment, who survived till recent times. It often happened, in the course of the march, that the private soldiers of this corps entered the houses of the country people, and began to help themselves. The unhappy rustics would come running out, and make as pathetic an appeal as they could to the officer; and he used then to go up to the door, and roar in at the passage, "Come out this minute, you scoundrels, or I'll send a pistol-shot in amongst you." But immediately after he would add in Gaelic, "Only, if you see any thing worth while, you may bring it along with you." At this period of the campaign, the mountaineers had become better acquainted than they were at first with the commodities of civilised life, and among the numerous desertions which took place for the purpose of securing their spoil, few were occasioned by the desire of depositing such things as military saddles. Money had now become an object with them; and it is really amazing what large sums some of them had amassed about their persons. At the battle of Falkirk, a private Highlander having pursued one of Barrel's regiment down the hill, and in his turn fled on the man turning about to oppose him, was shot through the head by Brigadier Cholmondeley, and left to be rifled by the soldier. To the man's astonishment, no less a sum than sixteen guineas was found in the sporran or purse of this miserable looking savage!

It does not, however, after all, appear, that the people of Scotland felt much annoyed by the exactions made upon them by the Highlanders; for, although the traditions regarding their custom of demanding free quarters are innumerable, they are rarely accompanied with any very vehement expressions of indignation. The citizens of Glasgow alone, whose treatment, for reasons good, was peculiarly severe, seem to have displayed a generous feeling; incited by which, their militia behaved with singular firmness at Falkirk, and permitted a number of their body to be slain before following the prudent example of their general. Altogether, it may be said, that, either from habitual hospitality, or from affection to their cause, the Scottish people expressed far less displeasure than might have been expected at the behaviour of the mountain-warriors; and what was expressed generally proceeded from the most evil conditioned of the whigs, or from those miserable churls who would have grudged a meal to any stranger.*

Prince Charles returned to Bannockburn on the evening of the 18th, leaving Lord George Murray, with a portion of the army, at Falkirk. It was certainly to be regretted by his adherents, that he did not rather follow up the success of the preceding day, by an active pursuit of the English army, which was now so dispirited, that he might easily have had the glory of driving

* Soon after the battle of Preston, two Highlanders, in roaming through the south of Midlothian, entered the farm-house of Swanston, near the Pentland Hills, where they found no one at home but an old woman. They immediately proceeded to search the house, and soon finding a web of coarse home-spun cloth, made no scruple to unroll and cut off as much as they thought would make a coat to each. The woman was exceedingly incensed at their rapacity, roared and cried, and even had the hardihood to invoke divine vengeance upon their heads. "Ye villain!" she cried, "ye'll ha'e to account for this yet! ye'll ha'e to account for this yet!"—"And whan will we pe account for't?" asked one of the Highlanders—"At the last day, ye blackguards!" exclaimed the woman. "Ta last tay!" replied the Highlander: "tat pe cood long chredit—we'll e'er pe tak a waistcoat too!" at the same time cutting off a few additional yards of the cloth.—Tradition in Edinburgh.

The Lowlanders were often highly amused by the demands of their Highland guests, or rather by the uncouth broken language in which these demands were preferred. It is still told by the aged people of Dumfries, as a good joke, that they would come into houses and ask for "a pread, a putter, and a sheese, till something petter be ready." It is remembered, in another part of the country, that some of them gave out their orders for a morning meal, to the mistress of the house, in the following language: "You'll put down a pread, matam—and a putter, matam—and a sheese, matam—and a tea, matam—shentleman's preckfast, matam—and you'll kive her a shilling, to carry her to the next town, matam!"

The Highland insurgents of 1715 seem to have taken precisely similar methods of supplying the wants of a regular commissariat. The following anecdote, which is derived from most respectable authority, the grand-niece of an eye-witness, will perhaps illustrate the fact.—A party of recruits, marching down from their native mountains to join the earl of Mar and passing through the parish of Arngask (Perthshire) on a Sunday forenoon, suddenly discovered that their shoes were in great necessity of repair, or rather of renewal; and complained to their commander, that, unless provided with a supply of these necessary articles, they did not believe they should be able to proceed. The officer felt the dilemma to be extreme, as it was at once necessary that his party should lose no time in getting to head-quarters, and impossible that they should procure the means of transporting thither; the day being one upon which the tradesmen of the Lowlands would transact no secular business. He had the shrewdness, however, or rather perhaps the good luck, to bethink himself of an expedient, by which the whole difficulty might be got over. He observed the parish church hard by; he also heard the whole assembled musical powers of the parish making it ring with psalmody. Confound them! he thought, if they will not sell us new brogues, or mend our old ones, but sit drowsing there, we'll make them put us to rights another way. He accordingly marched his men up to the church, led them in, commanded every man to help himself according to his necessities; showing the example, by seizing the shoes of the precentor. His precept and practice together had such effect, that, in less than three minutes, the shoes of the congregation were transferred to the feet of the Highlanders, and the unfortunate worshippers left to walk home barefooted as best they might.

it out of Scotland, if not that of totally annihilating it. Ignorance alone of the real extent of his victory, and of the condition to which he had reduced the enemy, must have induced him to take this retrograde movement, so dishonourable to his arms, and so favourable to the designs which were now laying for his total overthrow.

Among other articles which the prince had brought away with him from Glasgow, was a printing-press, with its accompaniments of types, workmen, &c. Sensible of the advantage which the other party had over him in their command of the public press, and no doubt incensed at the lies they had employed it in propagating against him, he had employed his first leisure at Glasgow in publishing a Journal of his march into England, which, if not free of a little gasconade, was certainly quite as faithful as the Gazette of government. He had brought the press along with him, in order to continue his publications occasionally; and he now issued, from Bannockburn, a quarto sheet, containing a well penned and not inaccurate account of his victory at Falkirk. This, however, was destined to be the last of his Gazettes, as the rapidity of his subsequent evolutions rendered it impossible to transport so large and complicated an engine without more trouble than it was worth.

He now resumed the siege of Stirling Castle, having first sent a summons of surrender to General Blakeney, which that officer answered with his former firmness. He had been advised, by an engineer of the name of Grant, who had conducted the siege of Carlisle, to open trenches in the church-yard, which lies between the castle and the town; but was induced to abandon that position by the citizens, who represented that it must ensure the destruction of their houses. There were two other points from which the castle might be stormed, though not nearly so advantageous as that pointed out by Mr. Grant—the Gowan Hill, an irregular eminence under the castle walls on the north side, and the Ladies' Hill, a small bare rock facing the south east. The prince, anxious to save the town, consulted with a French engineer, who had recently arrived in Scotland, if it would be possible to raise an effective battery upon either of these eminences. The person thus consulted was a Mr. Gordon, styling himself Monsieur Mirabelle, a chevalier of the order of St. Louis; but a man so whimsical both in his body and mind, that the Highlanders used to parody his nom de guerre into Mr. Admirable. It is the characteristic of ignorance never to think any thing impossible; and this wretched old Frenchified Scotsman at once undertook to open a battery upon the Gowan Hill, though there were not fifteen inches depth of earth above the rock, and the walls of the castle overlooked it by at least fifty feet.

After many days of incessant labour, a sort of battery was constructed of bags of sand and wool, and a number of cannon brought to bear upon the fortress. General Blakeney had not taken all the advantage he might have done of his position to interrupt the works, conceiving that it was best to amuse the Highland army with the prospect of taking the castle, and thus give government time to concentrate its forces against them. But when the cannon well opened against him, he thought proper to answer them in a suitable manner. Such was the eminence of his situation, that it is said he could see the very shoe-buckle of the besiegers as they stood behind their entrenchments. Their battery was of course pointed upwards, and scarcely did the least harm either to his fortifications or his men. The besieged, on the contrary, were able to destroy a great number of their opponents, including many French piqueurs, who were, perhaps, the best soldiers in their army. The works were demolished at leisure; and the siege was then abandoned as a matter of course, after a considerable loss of men.

CHAPTER XXIII.

ARRIVAL OF THE DUKE OF CUMBERLAND.

The remnant of the royal blood
Comes pouring on my like a flood—
The princesses in number five—
Duke William, sweetest prince alive!—

Swift.

When the news of Hawley's manœuvres at Falkirk reached the court of St. James's, where a drawing-room happened to be held on that particular day, every countenance is said to have been marked with doubt and apprehension, excepting those only of the king himself, the earl of Stair, and Sir John Cope. It was now thought necessary to send a general against the insurgents, the best and most popular of whom the country could boast, and who, by one decisive effort, might at length be certain of success. The Duke of Cumberland, who, after tracking their course to Carlisle, had thought them only fair game for an inferior hand, was now requested to resume the command which he then abandoned, and immediately to set out for the north. He lost no time in obeying his father's orders: and was so expeditious as to arrive unexpectedly at Edinburgh early in the morning of the 30th of January, after a journey performed in the short space of four days.

This young general, whose name is still so much exalted in Scotland, and of whom it must be confessed that he never was victorious any where else, was a man of great personal intrepidity, firmness, and enthusiasm in his profession, though almost entirely destitute of talent, and a stranger, as it afterwards appeared, to the more praiseworthy qualification of humanity. He had a good humoured jolly face, which procured him the epithet of "Bluff Bill;" but, although it was hoped that his presence in Scotland might counteract the charm which Prince Charles had exercised over the public mind, his personal graces could never bear any comparison with those of his cousin and rival; and while his rank perhaps dazzled the people a little, he failed entirely in exciting the high interest and deep affection which had been bestowed so liberally upon that equivocal son of royalty. He was, however, entirely beloved by the troops, who wished nothing so ardently as to have him at their head instead of Hawley, and, notwithstanding their late disgrace, are said to have been inspired with the utmost confidence when they learned that he was to take the command.

On his arriving at Holyroodhouse, he immediately went to bed—occupying the same couch of state which Charles had used four months before. After reposing two hours, he rose, and proceeded to the great business of his mission. Before eight o'clock, and before he had taken breakfast, he is said to have been busy with General Hawley and Huske, and other principal officers, whom he summoned so hastily that they appeared in their boots. During the course of the forenoon, he received visits from the State-officers, the Professors of the University, and the principal citizens, all of whom had the honour of kissing his hand. Meanwhile, the music-bells were rung in his honour, and the magistrates prepared to present him with the freedom of the city. His royal highness, in the midst of matters of state, did not neglect those of war. He descended to the large court in front of the palace, where a train of artillery had been collected, and made a careful and deliberate inspection of all the pieces. In the afternoon, according to appointment, a number of ladies, chiefly belonging to whig families of distinction, paid their respects to him in the same hall where Charles had so lately entertained his fair adherents. They were dressed in the most splendid style; and one of them, Miss Ker, did him the peculiar honour to appear with a busk, at the top of which was a crown, done in bugles, surrounded by the words, "William Duke of Cumberland, Britain's Hero." He kissed the ladies all round, made a short speech expressive of his satisfaction, and then retired to hold a council of war.

The army had received various reinforcements since its retreat from Falkirk, and been prepared to march for some days before the duke's arrival. The council, therefore, determined that it should set forward next morning towards the position of the insurgents, with his Royal Highness at its head. So prompt a resolution gave new courage to the troops, and raised the hopes of the friends of government, hitherto very much depressed. In the same degree it damped the spirits of the insurgents, who had already determined to retire to the Highlands, but whose resolution was materially accelerated by so vigorous a measure on the part of their enemies.

The duke set out from Holyroodhouse, at nine o'clock in the morning of Friday, the 31st of January, after having been only thirty hours in Edinburgh. An immense crowd had collected in the court-yard and around the exterior porch of the palace, brought together to see a prince of the blood, and that they might compare his person and apparent fitness for war with their recollections of his rival. A whig historian has recorded that, as he stepped into his coach, an old man exclaimed "God bless him—he is far bounier than the Pretender;" and there are said to have been some others, who, borne away by the enthusiasm of the moment, attempted to greet him with a huzza. But his looks elicited no expressions of admiration from the softer sex; and the general feeling rather was one of pity for the gallant youth against whom he was bending what appeared so powerful and irresistible a force. They saw him depart with sensations acutely painful and agitating; for it was the general impression that this singular struggle for the empire was soon to be determined, and that, as it were, by a personal conflict between two persons immediately representing the great parties concerned.

The army had departed early this morning in two columns; one by Borrowstounness, led by General Huske, the other by Linlithgow, of which the duke was to take command in person. Ligonier's and Hamilton's dragoons, patrolled the roads in advance, to prevent intelligence reaching the insurgents. The army comprised altogether fourteen battalions of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, the Argyle militia, and a train of artillery. The whole might amount to ten thousand men.

The Duke of Cumberland had been presented by the Earl of Hopetoun with a coach and twelve horses; and, thinking it necessary to make his departure from Edinburgh with as much parade as possible, he used this splendid equipage in passing through the town. As he passed up the Cannongate and the High Street, he is said to have expressed great surprise at the number of broken windows which he saw; but, when informed that this was the result of a recent illumination, and that a shattered casement only indicated the residence of a Jacobite, he laughed heartily, remarking, that he was better content with this explanation, ill as it seemed to himself and his family, than he could have been with his first impression, which ascribed the circumstance to national poverty or negligence. His coach was followed by a great number of persons of distinction, and by a vast mob. He went through the Grass-market, and left the city by the West Port. When he got to a place called Castlebarrow, he left the coach, and mounted his horse. The state-officers and others then crowded about him to take leave, and the mob could no longer abstain from raising a hearty huzza. He took off his hat, and, turning round, thanked the people for this pleasing expression of their regard; adding, that he had had but little time to cultivate their friendship, but would be well pleased when fortune gave him opportunity of doing so. "I am in a great haste, my friends," he cried, "but I believe I shall soon be back to you with good news. Till then adieu." So saying, he shook hands with those nearest to him; paused a moment; and then exclaiming, "Come, let us have a song before parting," began to sing a ditty which had been composed in his own honour:

"Will ye play me fair?
Highland Laddie, Highland Laddie."

Then stretching forth his hand, as if addressing the object of his hostility, he set forward at a gallop, to put himself at the head of the army.

He lodged this evening at Linlithgow, and it was the general expectation that he would engage the Highlanders next day. Straggling parties had been seen hovering on the hills between Falkirk and Linlithgow, which, on the morning of the 1st of February, had fallen back to the Torwood, giving out that they would there await the royal army. But as he proceeded towards Falkirk, stray Highlanders were brought before him, who reported that they were in reality conveying their baggage over the Forth, with the intention of retreating to the Highlands; and the intelligence was soon confirmed by the noise of a distant explosion, occasioned by the blowing up of their powder magazine in the church of St. Ninian's. The duke walked all the way from Linlithgow to Falkirk on foot, at the head of the Scots Royals, to encourage the men after the manner of his rival; but he now thought it unnecessary to pursue the march with extraordinary speed, and therefore rested this evening at Falkirk, where he found the soldiers who had been wounded in the late engagement, deserted by their captors.

When his royal highness arrived in Falkirk, and it was debated what lodging he should choose, he is said to have inquired for the house which "his cousin had occupied," being sure, he said, that that would not only be the most comfortable in the town, but also the best provisioned. He accordingly passed the night in the same house and the same bed, which have been already described as accommodating Charles on the evening of the battle. He next morning marched to Stirling, which he found evacuated by the insurgents, and where General Blakeney informed him, that, but for his seasonable relief, he must have speedily surrendered the fortress for want of ammunition and provisions. A considerable number of straggling adherents of the Chevalier were here taken prisoners, including a lady whom popular report assigned to Charles as a mistress—the celebrated Jeanie Cameron. The prisoners were all sent to Edinburgh Castle.

Charles had not in reality fled to the Highlands from fear of the duke. This motion was the result of a determination entered into before his royal highness arrived in Scotland. So lately as the 20th, it had been Charles's intention to engage the royal army, and, in that resolution, he held a review on the field of Bannockburn, when it was found, from the losses sustained in the siege, and the numerous desertions which had taken place since the battle of Falkirk, that the number of the army was reduced to five thousand. Lord George Murray and the principal chiefs, therefore, framed an address to their leader on the 29th, representing the impossibility of meeting the royal army on fair terms at present, and counselling a retreat to the north, which, while it disconcerted the enemy, would enable them to recruit their diminished bands. With great reluctance Charles assented to this measure, so much in opposition to his general wishes, which always ran in favour of active warfare at whatever hazard. On the same day, therefore, that the Duke of Cumberland marched from Linlithgow, the Highlanders having spiked their heavy cannon, and blown up their magazine, left Stirling for the Firth, where they crossed the river that evening, carrying all their prisoners along with them.

The explosion of the prince's magazine at St. Ninian's has been already mentioned. This circumstance afforded his now triumphant enemies an excellent opportunity of traducing him. About ten of the country people had been killed by the accident; and it was studiously represented by the Whigs, that the destruction of these innocent persons had been an object with the prince—that, indeed, the whole affair was a conspiracy against the natives. Notwithstanding that nearly as many of the insurgents had perished, this absurd calumny was made the subject of serious discussion, not only in conversation, but in pamphlets and magazines; and as Charles did not remain to vindicate himself, it gained universal credit among his enemies. The religious alarmists of that day even affected to believe it a piece of sacrilege, representing the case as a sort of plea—the church of Rome versus the church of St. Ninian's. The people of a succeeding age are often astonished at the absurd beliefs which have obtained among parties during an agitating crisis; and there are few of a domestic nature, in the history of our country, which could astonish a modern more than that which asseverated Prince Charles to have spent six thousand pounds weight of powder in blowing up a country parish church, for the purpose of destroying a few unoffending individuals.

But while Charles is so easily exculpated from the charge of inhumanity and sacrilege, the cowardly ruffians who formed the host of his adversary, and who helped to propagate this calumny against him, are not to be so easily acquitted of one far more savage and fiendish—the conflagration of the palace of Linlithgow. The spacious halls of this beautiful old pile, where many a noble and many a royal heart formerly reposed—where the chivalrous James projected his terrible though hapless inroad upon England, and where his beauteous descendant drew her first breath—these venerable apartments, consecrated to every bosom in Scotland by national feeling and historical association, were on this occasion spread with straw to receive the vile persons of a brutal foreign soldiery; and the hallowed echoes were awakened to rude profanity and laughter, which had slept since the lamentations of Flodden and the love-strains of Mary. When the inglorious crew arose to depart, they resolved to show their contempt of the country which they invaded, by desecrating this favourite shrine of national feeling; and they accordingly, with the greatest deliberation, raked the live embers of their fires into their straw pallets, so as immediately to involve the apartments in flames. They then left the building to its fate, and it soon became, what it now is, a desolate and blackened ruin.

CHAPTER XXIV.

MARCH TO THE NORTH.

Now great Hawley leads on, with great Huske at his tail,
And the duke in the centre—this sure cannot fail.

Jacobite Song.

The last meal which Prince Charles partook upon the Lowland territory, which he had now kept possession of for five months, was at Boquhan, on the 1st of February, immediately before crossing the Forth. He arrived here a little after mid-day, along with his principal officers, and sat down to a dinner which had been prepared for him. His march across the river was attended by a circumstance, which seems to prove that the peasantry of Scotland were not uniformly adverse or indifferent to his cause. On the preceding evening, Captain Campbell, of the king's service, had come, with a party of soldiers, to the farm of West Frew, upon the north side of the river, and asked for a person who might show him the fords. The farmer was a staunch Jacobite, and, suspecting no good to his prince from the captain's enquiries, directed him, not to the regular and accustomed ford, but to one which was seldom used, a little farther up the river. Campbell then took from a cart several sacks full of caltrops, which he threw into the stream. Having thus prepared, as he thought, for the annoyance of the insurgent army, he and his party withdrew. The farmer, secretly rejoicing at the service he had done to the prince, crossed the water next day, along with his sons and servants, and remained near his royal highness all the time he was at dinner. When their meal was finished, the party took the proper ford, all except Charles, who, not thinking any information necessary regarding fords which he had used, rode through by one different from either of the above-mentioned, and in which the farmer had seen one of Campbell's men deposit a single caltrop. By ill luck, the prince's horse picked up this, and was of course wounded. This information was derived from one of the farmer's sons, who survived till recent times, and who never could speak of the circumstance without great emotion. He used to say, that he had at first entertained a boyish apprehension, lest he should find no body to point out the prince at Boquhan house, and that he should thus be unable in after life to say that he had beheld so interesting a person. "But," he would continue, with the fervour of a true Jacobite, "my anxiety on this point was quite unnecessary;—there was something in the air of that noble young man, which would have pointed him out to me, as the son of a king, among ten thousand!"

The army spent the evening of that day (February 1st), at Dumbane, while the prince rode forward a few miles and lodged at Drummond Castle, the princely seat of his friend the Duke of Perth. The roads were now found so bad, that they were obliged to leave some of their baggage behind. They persisted, however, in a resolution which had been made, to take all their prisoners along with them to the north. These persons, after the battle, had been confined in the Castle of Doon, near Dumbane, a strong old fortress, of which the Laird of Glegyle had been made governor; and they now joined the army in its retreat. Many of them took the earliest opportunity of making their escape, notwithstanding that they were treated with all possible civility, and had pledged their honour not to take advantage of any indulgences which might be shown to them.

The Highland army reached Crieff next day, and the prince slept at a place called Fairnton. A council of war was there held on the 3d; when it was determined that, for the sake of subsistence, the march to the north should be performed in two parties; one of which, consisting of the clans, under Charles's command, should take the ordinary military road which General Cope had assumed in his northern expedition; while the low country regiments and horse should be conducted by Lord George Murray, along the roads by the coast of Angus and Aberdeenshire. Inverness was to be the rendezvous. At the time this resolution was taken, the Duke of Cumberland was busy, thirty miles behind, in repairing the bridge of Stirling for the passage of his troops; one arch of that ancient and important structure having been destroyed, at an early period of the campaign, by Governor Blakeney, to prevent the transmission of supplies to Charles from the Highlands.

Nothing could more distinctly prove the individual superiority of the insurgent army over the king's troops, or rather perhaps the superiority of their desultory system over the formal and foolish rules of regular warfare, than the way in which they performed their retreat to the north. While the Duke of Cumberland had to wait a day for the repair of a bridge, and then could only drag his lumbering strength over the post-roads at the rate of twelve or fourteen miles in as many hours, Charles forded rivers, crossed over moors, and dared the winter dangers of a hilly country with the utmost alacrity and promptitude. The present generation has seen the same system revived with effect by the great modern soldier of the continent; and it is impossible to give a better idea of the surprise with which the duke, on the present occasion, beheld the incalculable movements of his antagonist, than by recalling the perplexity of the old Austrian generals on observing the first movements of Bonaparte in Italy.

At the commencement of the pursuit, the duke had been little more than a single day's march behind the retreating host. But, on the sixth day, he found this interval to have increased threefold. The Highland army had been passing through Perth, in straggling parties, during the whole of the 2d and 3d of February; he did not arrive there till the 6th; when he learned that one party had passed Blair in Athole on the direct road to Inverness, while the other was just evacuating Montrose, on the route to Aberdeen. He then saw fit to discontinue the chase for the present; the weather being the most unfit possible for the movements of his army, and the Highland hills which now rose to his view, presenting but few inducements for an advance. He contented himself with fishing up, from the bottom of the Tay, about fourteen guns which the insurgents had spiked and thrown into the bed of that river, and with sending out parties to lay waste the lands and seize the unprotected relations of the Perthshire insurgents.

Before he had been many days in Perth, intelligence was brought to him, that his brother-in-law, the Prince of Hesse, had entered the Frith of Forth, with those auxiliary troops which, as already mentioned, his majesty had called over from the continent, to assist him in suppressing the insurrection. This armament cast anchor in Leith Roads on the 8th of February. The prince landed that night at Leith harbour, and was immediately conducted to Holyroodhouse, where apartments had been prepared for his reception. He was attended by the Earl of Crawford, so famous in the wars of George the Second, by a son of the Duke of Wolfenbuttle, and by various other distinguished persons. The castle greeted his serene highness with a round of great guns; and next day, notwithstanding that it was the Sabbath, the people flocked in great numbers to see and congratulate him. His troops, which amounted to five thousand in number, landed on that and the succeeding day, and were cantoned in the city.

The Duke of Cumberland judged it necessary, on the 15th, to leave his camp at Perth, and pay a hurried visit to the prince at Edinburgh. On his arrival in that city, he was hailed with the loudest acclamations of the loyal inhabitants, as having already cleared the country of its disturbers, and restored peace where he had lately found civil war. It was at this time the general impression, that the insurgents, dismayed at his approach, had retired into the north only to disperse themselves, as Mar and his army had done in 1716, on the advance of the Duke of Argyle, and that, in imitation of his father's conduct at that time, Charles had left the country by one of the ports on the east coast. The whig writers of the time, at a loss to flatter the royal soldier sufficiently, assured the public that his face had acted like the rising sun, and fairly dispersed the clouds of rebellion which lately hovered over their country;—a somewhat unlucky comparison, however, as a Jacobite afterwards remarked, in so far as his royal highness's countenance bore an unfortunate resemblance to the round unmeaning visage usually given to that luminary on a sign-post.

On the evening of his arrival at Edinburgh, the duke and the prince held a council of war in Milton Lodge, the house of the lord justice clerk, to determine their future operations. The generals who attended this meeting, imposed upon by the popular report, and disposed to flatter the duke, gave it unanimously as their opinion that the war was now at an end, and that his royal highness had nothing to do but send a few parties into the Highlands, as soon as the season would permit, who should exterminate all that remained of the insurgent force. When these persons had delivered their sentiments, the duke turned to Lord Milton, and desired to hear his opinion upon the present state of affairs. The worthy man begged to be excused from speaking in an assembly where his profession did not qualify him; but his royal highness insisted that he should speak, as he knew the Highlands and Highlanders better than any man present. His lordship then declared it as his opinion, that the war was not at an end, but that the insurgents would again unite their scattered forces, and hazard a battle before abandoning the enterprise. The duke, who had already seen the bad results of giving up the chase too soon, and of decommitting the suppression of the insurrection to inferior hands, adopted this opinion; and immediately set out to rejoin his army, having previously given orders that the Hessian troops should follow him with all convenient speed.

The propriety of Lord Milton's opinion was proved by what followed. Notwithstanding the weather, and the desolation of the country, Charles succeeded in leading his force, without diminution, over the Grampians, to the shore of the Moray Frith; and Lord George Murray easily reached the same point, by the more circuitous route which he had adopted through Angus and Aberdeenshire. In his march through Badenoch, the prince reduced the small government fort of Ruthven; and Lord George, in passing Peterhead, was reinforced by a troop of dismounted French picquets, which had just been landed at that port. The duke pursued Lord George's route at a leisurely pace, leaving the Hessians to guard the passes at Perth, and having sent on a body of troops under Sir Andrew Agnew to garrison the castle of Blair.

It was perhaps unfortunate for Scotland that the commander of the royal army should have marched to Culoden through Angus and Aberdeenshire; because the symptoms of disaffection which he saw in these districts, must have given him an extremely unfavourable impression of the kingdom in general, and had a strong effect in disposing him to treat it, after his victory, as a conquered country. All the gentlemen throughout Angus, at least, he found absent with the insurgent army; others paid him so little respect as to recruit almost before his eyes. In the town of Forfar, a small party of Charles's forces beat up for new adherents on the day before he entered the town; and, being concealed by the inhabitants till he had gone past, continued to do the same immediately on his back being turned. When he lodged at the Castle of Glamis, another incident occurred, which must have not a little exasperated his temper. On his troop preparing to depart in the morning, it was found that all the girths of his horses had been cut during the night, in order to retard his march. But a more unequivocal proof of the hatred in which he was held by the Anguscians, occurred at the ancient, episcopal, and truly Jacobite city of Brechin, which was his first stage beyond Forfar. As he was slowly parading through the principal street, hemmed closely in, and retarded by an immense crowd which had collected to see him, he observed a singularly pretty girl standing on a stair-head, gazing, among many others of her sex, at the unusual spectacle; and it pleased his royal highness to honour this damsel with a low bow and an elevation of the hat. To his great mortification, and to the no less delight of the spectators, the object of his admiration returned the compliment by a contemptuous gesture which does not admit of description. The duke might have laid little stress upon the trick of a stable-boy, or upon the daring of a country gentleman; but when he found the principles of rebellion revolutionising the female heart so far as to render it impervious to flattery, he was certainly justifiable in considering the case desperate.

Having resolved, on reaching Aberdeen, to await the return of spring before proceeding farther, he marked his sense of the disaffection of this part of the country, by subjecting part of it to the terrors of military law. A man of the name of Ferrier had raised about two hundred men for the service of the Chevalier throughout the Braes of Angus, where, establishing a sort of camp, he laid the country under contribution even to the very ports of Brechin. The duke despatched a party, which, not satisfied with expelling Ferrier, treated the country with excessive severity, mulcting all whom they could convict of Jacobitism, and burning the whole of the episcopal meeting-houses. "It cost many pains," observes the Scots Magazine very gravely, "to save Glenesk from being burnt from end to end, being a nest of Jacobites."

Charles reached Moy Castle, about ten miles from Inverness, on Sunday the 16th of February. Inverness was at this time possessed by the Earl of Loudoun, a lieutenant-general in the royal service, who had early in the campaign raised several independent companies in the north, and had now a force of about two thousand men. The prince intended to await the arrival of Lord George Murray with the other column of his army, before making any attempt upon that formidable body; and he now repented, after his fatiguing march over the Grampians, a welcome and honoured guest, in the house of an adherent. Moy was the principal seat of the Laird of MacIntosh, whose clan had been led out by his wife, while he himself remained in a command under Lord Loudoun. The laird was at this time upon duty with the royal forces, and Lady MacIntosh alone remained at Moy, to dispense the duties of hospitality. Charles, apprehending no danger from his vicinity to Lord Loudoun, allowed his men to straggle about the country, and had only a few with him at the time when a remarkable incident took place.

Lord Loudoun, learning the security in which Charles was reposing, formed a project of seizing his person by surprise. At three in the afternoon, he planted guards and a chain of sentinels completely round Inverness, both within and without the town, with positive orders not to suffer any person to leave it, on any pretext whatever, however high the rank of the person might be. At the same time he ordered fifteen hundred men to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning; and, having assembled this body of troops without alarming the inhabitants, he set off at their head, as soon as it was dark, planning his march so as to arrive at the Castle of Moy about eleven o'clock at night.

How his lordship's well-laid scheme came to be discovered by the enemy, is not very well known. There are at least two accounts. One avers, that Fraser of Gorthleck despatched a letter to Lady MacIntosh, warning her of the design; and that another epistle to the same effect was communicated by her ladyship's mother, who, though a whig, was unwilling that the prince should be taken in her daughter's house. The other account is most consistent with probability. Some English officers being overheard in a tavern discussing the project, the daughter of the landlady, a girl of thirteen or fourteen years of age, found means to escape from the town, and, running as fast as she could to Moy, without shoes or stockings, which she had taken off to accelerate her progress, gave Lady MacIntosh a breathless narrative of the plot. Charles immediately left the house, and took refuge among the hills. The high-spirited lady at the same time despatched five or six of her people, under the command of a country blacksmith, to watch the approach of Loudoun's troops.

The man intrusted with this duty was one of singularly intrepid and enterprising spirit. Guessing the probable effects of a counter surprise, he resolved to check Loudoun's march to Moy; and though his little party seemed so ill adapted to such a purpose, he carried through his design with all the vigour which might have been expected from a better matched commander. Having planted his men at considerable intervals along the road, with the orders which he considered necessary, he no sooner heard the noise of the approaching troops, than he fired his piece in that direction, his men doing the same at brief intervals. The party then made as much noise as they could, calling upon the Camerons and MacDonalds to advance, and shouting out orders that no quarter should be given to the villains who designed to murder their prince. His ruse had all the effect that could have been expected. Without waiting for a second fire, the army turned tail en masse, convinced that the whole of the Highland army was upon them; and a scene of confusion ensued which it would be difficult to describe. Those who had been first in the advance were also the first to retreat; but the rear, not so quickly apprehending the matter, did not fly exactly at the same time, and many were therefore thrown down and trode upon, to the imminent danger of their lives. The panic, fear, and flight continued till they got near Inverness, where it was found, that, though none of the army were slain, except a sifer by the blacksmith's shot, the whole were in a state of the utmost distress, with bruises, wounds, and mortification. The Master of Ross, one of the unhappy band who survived until recent times, used to say, that he had been in many situations of peril throughout his life, but had never found himself in a condition so grievous as that in which he was at the route of Moy.

Charles assembled his men next morning, and advanced upon Inverness, to take revenge for the alarm into which he had been thrown; but Lord Loudoun, wisely judging himself no match for two or three thousand men after he had been discomfited by half a dozen, retired across the Moray Frith into Ross; by which motion he was prevented, during the whole campaign, from ever forming a junction with the royal army, and his whole force, indeed, from which so much had been expected by government, rendered completely hors de combat.

Inverness, now a flourishing town of nine or ten thousand inhabitants, where all the refinements, and many of the elegances of city life are to be met with, appears, from a publication of the period, to have been then only such a town as could be expected in the vicinity of a Highland and half civilised territory—a royal burgh, yet not emancipated from feudal domination; a sea port, but possessing only a slight local commerce; confined in its dimensions, limited in population, and poor in its resources. While the town bore every external mark of wretchedness, in people—even its shopkeepers—wore the Highland dress in all its squalor and scantitude, and generally spoke Gaelic. A coach had never, at this time, been seen at Inverness; nor was there a turnpike road within forty miles of its walls. The only advancement which it could be said to have made in civilisation, was occasioned by the English garrison maintained in its fort by government, and by a certain degree of intercourse which its disaffected neighbours maintained through its port with France. A few indeed of the Highland gentry resided in it during the winter, shedding a feeble and partial gleam of intelligence over the minds of the kilted burghers; and it was in the town house of one of these, Lady Drummair, mother to the Lady MacIntosh,—which, as appears, was then the only house at Inverness that had a room ungraced by a bed,—that the Young Chevalier took up his residence.

Though Charles thus easily obtained possession of Inverness, his triumph could not be called complete so long as the fort held out against him. Fort George, for such was its name, had been established at the revolution, upon the site of the ancient castle of Inverness, which we need not remind the reader, has been rendered classical by Shakspeare. A tall massive tower, reared upon an eminence, the sides of which were protected by bastions,—commanding the town on one hand, and the bridge over the Ness on another,—formed the whole of this trifling place of strength, which had cost government altogether about fifty thousand pounds, in its construction and maintenance. On the present occasion, it was garrisoned by a company of Grants under Rothiemurchus,* a company of MacLeods, and eighty regular troops; and had sufficient store of ammunition and provisions.

The Highlanders, who held the chain of forts which government had planted throughout their country in very small respect, received a gratification of the highest order, when, after a siege of two days, this fortress fell into their hands. Their joy was of such a nature, as to receive little addition from the sixteen pieces of cannon, or even the hundred barrels of beef, which accompanied the rendition. But it was sensibly increased, when they learned that the prince had resolved to destroy the hated fortress. This was done immediately after it surrendered, though not without the loss of life. The French engineer, who was charged with the duty of blowing it up, thinking the match was extinguished, approached to examine it, when the explosion took place, and carried him up into the air, along with the stones of the bastion. He was thrown quite over the river, and fell upon a green at least three hundred yards from the castle. It is said, that though he himself was found dead, his dog, a little French poodle, which went up into the air along with him, fell unhurt by his side, and was able immediately to run away.

Before the capture of Fort George, which took place on the 20th of February, the column led by Lord George Murray joined the prince, and rendered the army once more complete. The whole of the Lowland territory on the shore of the Moray Frith, besides all the adjacent Highlands, to the distance of an hundred miles from Inverness, was now in the hands of the insurgents; but the duke interposed on one side, and the Hessians on another, to prevent all communication with the south; and Lord

* The Grants are always instanced as a Whig clan, and one of their chieftains is here seen in the command of a fortress belonging to the government. There could not be a better instance of the political duplicity which has ever so strongly prevailed since the termination of the legitimate line of British monarchy; both the clan and this chieftain were in reality rank Jacobites. The following anecdote illustrative of Rothiemurchus's personal Jacobitism, is derived from an excellent source, the Scottish bishop so often referred to.

When General Wade first came into the Highlands, upon his road making expeditions, he frequently took up his abode with Rothiemurchus, under the idea that he, as an officer of government, could not confer a greater honour upon a gentleman who was understood to be so well affected. This species of patronage he carried to such a length, as sometimes to stay whole weeks and even months at a time. Rothie, for such was Mr. Grant's most popular name, only detested the general and all his tribe, and, though obliged to treat the emissary of his monarch with civility, could have seen him any where rather than at his dining table. The plan which he took to get rid of the annoyance, was desperate, but ingenious. One day, after dinner, when all the rest of the company had retired, he rose, went to the door, cautiously locked it, and then coming back to the table, with all the slyness and emphasis of a true Jacobite, addressed his guest in these words:—"General, it's needless for you and me to play fause to one another any longer. We baith ken very weel what one another is in reality, whatever he may see fit to pretend. I propose that we now drink the health of King James the Eighth on our bended knees!" Thunderstruck at such a discovery, the general took an early opportunity of leaving the hospitable table of Rothiemurchus, which from that day forward he patronised no more.

Loudoun, banging with his native troops still nearer upon the north, their position was by no means an agreeable one. Money and provisions were in danger of exhaustion in the mean time; and the return of spring seemed only necessary to permit the three armies to narrow their circle, and crush the insurgents by an overpowering force.

CHAPTER XXV.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE NORTH.

The North!—What do they in the North!

Richard the Third.

Whatever were the advantages or disadvantages of a position which had only been chosen as the best that could be obtained, the Highland army displayed no symptom of depression under their unfortunate circumstances, but on the contrary, maintained all that show of energetic courage and alacrity which had so strikingly distinguished the more brilliant era of the campaign. They projected a number of expeditions, sieges, and surprises, almost all of which they executed with promptitude and success, notwithstanding the season was uncommonly severe, and the Highlands a country as ill suited as might be for the evolutions of a winter campaign. Lord Loudoun having annoyed them a good deal by invasions upon their side of the Frith, a party under the Duke of Perth at last succeeded in surprising and dispersing his army, taking several hundred prisoners, without the exchange of a shot. Another party reduced Fort Augustus with equal ease; while Lochiel laid siege to Fort William, which, during his absence, had proved a grievous annoyance to the country of his clan. Lord John Drummond was despatched with a considerable body, to fortify the passage of the Spey against the advance of the Duke of Cumberland; and several minor adventurers even went so far as to skirmish with the advanced parties of the royal army, some of whom were surprised and taken prisoners with a dexterity and ease which struck terror into the main body, and confirmed them in their previous impression of the activity and vigour of the Highland warriors.

The most remarkable of all these expeditions was one projected by Lord George Murray upon his native district of Athole. It has already been said that the Duke of Cumberland subjected Angus to military execution; it remains to be stated, that his detachments in the upper part of Perthshire treated that country with even greater severity. The mother of the Duke of Perth and the wife of Viscount Strathallan, for the crime of having relations in the insurgent army, were seized in their own houses, and hurried to Edinburgh castle, where they remained prisoners for a twelvemonth in a small and unhealthy room. All the houses whose proprietors had gone with Prince Charles, were burnt, or retained for quarters to the military; the unhappy tenants being in either case expelled to starve upon the snowy heath. When Lord George heard this at Inverness, he resolved to succour his country from its oppressors. Having taken care to secure all the passes, so as to prevent his intentions from becoming known to the enemy, he set out about the middle of March, with seven hundred men, none of whom knew the precise object of the expedition. On the evening of the 10th, having reached a place called Dalnaspidal, upon the confines of Athole, a halt was called, and the whole body divided into a number of small parties. Lord George then informed them, that he wished to surprise all the different posts of the royal troops before daylight, and as nearly as possible at the same time; for which purpose, each party should select a post for whose strength it might be proportioned; and the general rendezvous, after all was done, was to be the bridge of Bruar, two miles from Blair. The chief posts to be attacked were Bun-Rannoch, the house of Keyn-nachin, the house of Blairfettie, the house of Lude, the house of Faskally, and the inn of Blair; besides which, there were a great number of less strength and importance.

The parties set out immediately, each taking the shortest way to its respective post; and most of them reached the point of attack before daybreak. At Bun-Rannoch, where there happened to be a late wake that night, the garrison (a party of Argyllshire men) were surprised in the midst of their festivity, and made prisoners without exchange of shot. The sentinel of Keyn-nachin being more vigilant, and having alarmed the party within, that house was not taken till after a short resistance, and the slaughter of one man. At Blairfettie, the whole party was surprised, inclusive of the sentinel, and made prisoners after a brief but ineffectual resistance. The garrisons of Lude and Faskally were taken in the same manner; and only at the inn of Blair, did the party attacked baffle the Highlanders, or succeed in making their escape.

This last party taking refuge in the castle of Blair, Sir Andrew Agnew immediately got his men under arms, and marched out to see who they were that had attacked his posts. It was now nearly daybreak, and Lord George Murray stood at the place of rendezvous, with only four and twenty men, anxiously awaiting the arrival of the various parties. Fortunately he received intelligence by a countryman, of the approach of Sir Andrew; otherwise he must have been cut off, to the irreparable loss of the insurgent army. He hastily consulted with his attendants, as to the best course they could pursue in such a dilemma; and some advised an immediate retreat along the road to Dalwhinnie, while others were for crossing over the hills, and gaining a place of safety by paths where they could not be pursued. The genius of this excellent soldier suggested a mode of procedure, not only safer than either of these, (by which all the parties, as they successively reached the place of rendezvous, must have been sacrificed,) but which was calculated to disconcert and perhaps to disarm the approaching enemy. Observing a long turf wall in a field near the bridge, he ordered his men to ensconce themselves behind it, lying at a considerable distance from each other, and displaying the colours of the whole party at still greater intervals. Fortunately, he had with him all the pipers of the corps; these he ordered, as soon as they saw Sir Andrew's men appear, to strike up their most boisterous pibroch. All the rest, he commanded to brandish their swords over the wall.

The Blair garrison happened to appear just as the sun rose above the horizon; and Lord George's orders being properly obeyed, the men stood still, seriously alarmed at the preparations which seemed to have been made for their reception. After listening half a minute to the tumult of bagpipes, and casting one equally brief glance at the glittering broadswords, they turned back, (by order of their commander, however,) and hastily sought shelter within the walls of their castle. The Highland leader, delighted with the success of his manœuvre, kept post at the bridge till about the half of his men had arrived, and then proceeded to invest Blair.

When rejoined by all his men, Lord George found that no fewer than thirty different posts had been surprised that morning between the hours of three and five, without the loss of a single man. The same success, however, did not attend his deliberate siege; which he was obliged to raise on the 31st of March, after having only reduced the garrison to great distress for want of provisions.

One of the principal reasons for the retreat into the north, had been the hope of their procuring uninterrupted supplies from France; by which means Charles expected to prolong the war at his pleasure, and not to fight till he knew his advantage. But it soon appeared that this hope was grievously fallacious. Out of all the supplies which were despatched to him from France—and, to do Louis justice, they were neither few nor far between—very few ever reached their destination: being generally picked up by the English war vessels, which cruised in great numbers round the coast. One vessel of supply, containing about £13,000, besides other valuable matters, was taken under circumstances peculiarly distressing.

During Charles's march into England, the Highland party stationed at Montrose were grievously annoyed by the Hazard sloop of war of eighteen guns, which lying near the shore, never permitted any of them to appear without firing. They were incensed beyond measure at this annoyance, and the more so that their peculiar mode of warfare was such as to prevent the possibility of reprisal. At last an intrepid and ingenious officer, whose name has unfortunately been forgotten, formed a project of seizing this vessel, which he carried into effect in the following manner. One day, when a heavy fog favoured his purpose, he prevailed upon his men to accompany him in a few fishing boats towards the sloop, under the pretext of examining it. Before they were aware, he had approached very near, so as to be espied by the men on board. But there was no occasion to retire, or even to fear. The sailors, at sight of the Highlanders fell down upon their knees, and, with uplifted hands, implored the quarter which they might have so easily caused the enemy to beg from them. The Highlanders immediately got on board, and compelled the sailors, with pistols at their breasts, to steer the vessel into port.

This vessel was afterwards despatched to France as a snow, under the name of "the Prince Charles," and was returning to Scotland with the valuable cargo above mentioned, when she was taken up and chased by the Sheerness man of war. The place where the rencontre happened was near the northern extremity of Scotland, where a dangerous sea perpetually boils round a bold high coast, affording no port or place of shelter. The crew, unwilling to hazard their cargo by an action, made all sail to escape the guns of the Sheerness, which, however, kept so close as to kill thirty-six of the men. After a day's chase, the Prince Charles ran in upon Tongue Bay, where she was safe from the Sheerness, but not, as it soon appeared, from a more deadly enemy.

After the Duke of Perth had surprised and dispersed Lord Loudoun's troops, some of them retired to what is called Lord Reay's country, a wild district, but recently emerged from the condition of a forest, at the very northern extremity of Scotland. They were there residing with Lord Reay, when the crew of the Prince Charles landed with their treasure near that nobleman's house. Lord Reay, on learning the fact of the disembarkment, sent a person with a boat to ascertain their numbers; and finding them not above his strength, drew out his men early next morning, and went in pursuit. He came up with them about two hours after daybreak (March 26th), and, after they had given a few fires, succeeded in capturing the whole party, which consisted of twenty officers, and a hundred and twenty soldiers and sailors. His factor disposed of the treasure in a very remarkable way. Having persuaded those about him that the boxes in which it was stowed contained only shot, he appropriated it to himself, and founded, by its means, what is now a very wealthy and respectable family.

But this mishap was only a presage of the darker woes which now closed fast around the fortunes of the Chevalier. The last act of this dreadful drama was approaching, when heroism, generosity and devotion, were all to meet one common fate of death and sorrow; sad hearts, which had hitherto beat high with the noblest sentiments, were either to be stilled in despair, or utterly quieted upon the bloody heath. It is painful to approach this part of our narrative; but, as the Highland bard somewhere expresses it, nature demands the night as well as the day, and so must the pibroch of triumph occasionally give way to the coronach of lament.

The failure of supplies from France soon reduced the insurgent army to a condition of great distress. Charles himself had not above five hundred louis, nor could his officers procure any subsidies from their tenants in the south, by reason of the strict blockade under which the Highlands were lying. What was worst of all, the country under their command, though extensive, and comprising a considerable proportion of Lowland territory, was soon exhausted of provisions; inasmuch, as a fugitive prisoner reported to his own army, the best officers among them were glad when they could procure a few blades of raw cabbage from the farmers' gardens. Charles endeavoured to remedy this evil by dissipating the army, as much as he considered prudent, over the face of the country; but this had only the additional evil effect of weakening his force numerically while the day of conflict arrived.

While Charles lay at Inverness, the Duke of Cumberland had his head quarters at Aberdeen, which is upwards of one hundred miles distant from that town. The weather continued, till the beginning of April, to be unfavourable for the march of regular troops. But, about that time, a few days of dry cold wind, sweeping away the snow from the hills, and drying the rivers, rendered it possible to proceed without much difficulty; and the duke accordingly ordered a march upon the 8th. He had been by this time supplied with a fleet of victualling ships, which were to sail along the coast, and send provisions on shore as required by the army. His host comprising fifteen foot regiments, two of dragoons, with Kingston's horse, a body of Argyllshire Highlanders, and a detachment of Lord Loudoun's regiment, which had been shipped over from Ross, amounted altogether to about nine thousand men.

His Royal Highness reached Banff upon the 10th, encamping in the neighbourhood of the town. Two Highland spies were here seized, one of them in the act of notching the numbers of the army upon a stick, according to a fashion which also obtains among the primitive Indians of America. They were both hanged. On the 11th, the army moved forward to Cullen, where the Earl of Findlater testified his loyalty by distributing two hundred guineas among the troops. Strict orders were here issued to them not to stir out of the camp upon pain of death. During this day's march, the army, keeping constantly upon the shore, were closely accompanied by the fleet. The weather was also good, and the men were cheered by the prospect of crossing the Spey without difficulty.

This great mountain-stream, so remarkable for its depth and rapidity, had hitherto been esteemed by Charles's army as almost a sufficient barrier between them and the Duke of Cumberland, and as indeed completely protecting their country upon the east. Charles had, several weeks before, despatched Lord John Drummond with a strong party to defend the fords; and some batteries were raised, which it was expected might accomplish that object. But, on the duke approaching, with a quantity of cannon sufficient to force the passage, Lord John very properly judged it wise to abandon a position which he had not the power to maintain; and he accordingly fell back upon Inverness, where his appearance did not fail to excite considerable alarm.

The royal army forded the Spey, upon the afternoon of Saturday the 12th of April. For this purpose the troops were divided into three bodies, one of which crossed at Gormach, another near Gordon Castle, and a third close by the church of Belly. The men had the water up to their waists; but such was the ease with which the operation was conducted, that only one dragon and four women were swept away by the stream. In the earlier ages of Scottish history, the Spey had occasionally proved a better defence, and more deadly destroyer, to the various hostile parties which it happened to separate.

The duke encamped this evening upon the banks of the river, opposite to Fochabers, himself lodging in the manse of Belly. He marched next day (Sunday) through Elgin to the muir of Alves, where he was little more than thirty miles from Inverness. The march of next day brought him to Nairn, which was only sixteen miles from the position of the insurgents. On arriving at the bridge which gives entrance to this town from the east, the vanguard found it not yet evacuated by the rear-guard of the party which had attempted to defend the Spey. Some firing took place from both ends of the bridge; but at last the insurgents retired without much harm having been done on either side. The advancing party gave chase for several miles; but the prince coming up unexpectedly with a reinforcement, the other in its turn retreated.

During the 15th, which was the duke's birth-day, the army lay inactive in their camp at Nairn; and, as each man had an allowance of brandy, cheese, and biscuit, at the duke's expense, the day was spent with appropriate festivity. This circumstance gave rise to a motion on the part of Prince Charles, which is allowed to have had a strong effect in deciding the fate of his enterprise.

CHAPTER XXVI.

PRELIMINARIES OF THE BATTLE OF CULLODEN.

The day approached, when Fortune should decide
The important enterprise. Dryden.

On Monday, the 14th, when intelligence reached Inverness of the royal army having crossed the Spey, Charles rode out, towards Nairn, to support his retiring party; but returned to Inverness before the evening. He then commanded the drums to be beat, and the pipes to be played through the town, in order to collect his men. When they had assembled in the streets, he walked backwards and forwards through their lines, and endeavoured to animate them for the action which seemed impending.

They hailed his appearance, and received his addresses with all their usual enthusiasm; and, in the midst of the huzza which ensued, many voices exclaimed, "We'll give Cumberland another Fontenoy!" He then mounted his horse, and, with colours flying and pipes playing, led them out to the parks around Culloden House, three or four miles from the town, where they prepared to bivouac for the night.

At six o'clock in the morning of the 15th, the army was led forward to Drumossie Muir, (about a mile still farther from Inverness, in an easterly direction,) and there drawn up in battle order to receive the Duke of Cumberland, who was expected to march this day from Nairn. Charles's force, at this time, was much smaller than it had been at Falkirk, amounting to only about six thousand men. He had issued orders, some time before, to the parties dispersed throughout the country, commanding them immediately to join; but the Frasers, the Keppoch MacDonalds, Cluny's MacPhersons, Glengyle's MacGregors, some recruits of Glengary, and a large body of MacKenzies, which had been raised by the Earl of Cromarty, were still absent. Under these circumstances, it was with some satisfaction that Charles learned the delay made by the enemy at Nairn, which seemed to promise time for the augmentation of his host.

The scarcity of provisions had now become so great, that the men were, on this important day, reduced to the miserable allowance of only one small loaf, and that of the worst kind. Strange as the averment may appear, we have beheld and tasted a piece of the bread served out on this occasion to the unfortunate heroes of the Forty-Five; being the remains of a loaf or bannock, which having, in all probability, been found at first upon the person of one of the slain, has been carefully preserved ever since—a period of eighty-one years—by the successive members of a Jacobite family. It is impossible to imagine a composition of greater coarseness, or less likely either to please or satisfy the appetite; and perhaps no recital, however eloquent, of the miseries to which Charles's army was reduced, could impress the reader with so strong an idea of the real extent of that misery, as the sight of this singular relic. Its ingredients appear to be merely the husks of corn, and a coarse unclean species of dust, similar to what is found upon the floors of a mill.

During the afternoon of this day, many of the troops, unable to subsist upon provisions at once so small in quantity, and so wretched in quality, left their position, and either retired to Inverness, or roamed abroad through the country in search of more substantial food. Before the evening, those who remained had the mortification of seeing the victual-ships of the enemy enter the narrow arm of the sea which skirted their position, as if to tantalize them with the sight of a feast which it was not in their power to taste.

Drumossie Muir is a vast heathy flat, two miles inland from the south shore of the Moray Frith, five miles distant from Inverness, and ten or twelve from Nairn. When the insurgents stood with their faces towards the Duke of Cumberland's camp at Nairn, they had Inverness behind them, a barrier of mountains, with the river Nairn intervening, on the right hand, and the sea, with the parks of Culloden, on the left. There is a remarkable similarity between the ground and that on which the battle of Preston took place; each being an elevated flat parallel with, and adjacent to, an arm of the sea. But the comparative positions of the armies were reversed in the present case, in so far as the Highlanders awaited the shock of battle upon ground corresponding to the station of Sir John Cope, and the enemy approached, as they had done in the former case from the east. It was more unfortunate for the Highlanders that they should have thus stood upon the defensive, than it had been for the army of Sir John Cope, because the advantage of their peculiar mode of warfare lay solely in the wild onset which they could make upon a passive body, while the regular troops were better fitted to sustain an attack with the necessary fortitude; and Charles may thus be said to have virtually renounced the chances which had hitherto won him so many victories, and put a corresponding advantage in possession of the enemy.

Many things, however, which appear imprudent to a superficial observer, or upon which that stigma has been fixed by an unfortunate event, would, if strictly inquired into, and judged without regard to the issue, be found to have been in reality either the result of necessity, or the most prudent course of action, which under the circumstances could be pursued. This applies, we are persuaded, to the deeds of individuals as well as of public bodies, and ought to be constantly kept in mind, as a reason why we should judge leniently and with caution of what appear to be the failings of our fellow-creatures. But it applies with particular force to the actions of a military leader, whom we are perhaps too apt to consider prudent when successful, and who is, on the other hand, scarcely ever called in question but when unfortunate.

The leader of the insurgent army has hitherto been censured with unsparring rigour for meeting his enemy upon ground so favourable to the action of cavalry and artillery, and where he himself could bring so little of his own peculiar strength into play. It has appeared unaccountable to every observer of the ground, that he did not rather pursue a measure which was suggested to him, of retiring into the hills to the right, and there either harassing the royal forces by a protracted mountain warfare, or at once cutting him off by one of those wild attacks, which, upon such ground, the Highlanders could so easily have executed. He has been blamed for listening to the councils of his Irish tutor Sheridan, and to the wishes of his foreign and Low-country adherents, who avowed themselves unable to bear the fatigues of a hill campaign.

The historians and others who urge this charge of imprudence against the prince, do not seem to have taken into consideration the condition of the Highland army at this interesting crisis; nor do they allow for the weight of the motives which actuated Charles in determining upon the course he did. The men, it must be remembered, were on the point of starving. There was no reason to suppose that delay would improve their circumstances. Had they retired to the hills, and permitted the Duke to advance to Inverness, they must have perished before reaching any place where provisions or shelter could be obtained. Even Lord George Murray, who is said to have chiefly advocated a retreat into the hills, allows, in a letter written after the battle, that the army were reduced to such a condition by famine, as only to have the alternatives of fighting or dispersing. The reasons which remained for their meeting the royal army on the moor, were in reality very strong. It seemed to be essentially necessary that Inverness should be protected, as a defensible position, and as it contained their magazine and baggage. It was also obvious, that the men would fight better under the privations they were enduring, than when their misery had become aggravated by the fatigue of a mountain warfare. To have adopted, moreover, any expedient by which battle was to be avoided, was justly esteemed by his royal highness as calculated to dispirit the men—as likely to diminish that high confidence in their superiority to the king's troops, and unnerve them for that extravagant exertion of courage, in which hitherto their chance of victory seemed altogether to lie.

Besides the prudential considerations which determined his conduct, there was probably another, arising from his feelings, which, if not holding a primary place in his mental councils, may at least be allowed to have seconded and confirmed them. The victories hitherto achieved by his Highlanders, had been so astonishing in their nature, and had been so uninterrupted by the least share of bad success, that he began to join the nation at large in believing nothing impossible to them. He had seen them already successful over a body of troops as great as that of the Duke of Cumberland; and he was certainly justifiable in expecting them to do again what they had done before. He, moreover, seems to have entertained a wish—more worthy perhaps of an ancient than a modern leader—to fight a battle with his enemies upon what they would consider fair grounds, and where they should not have it afterwards to say that he had been favoured by adventitious and extraneous circumstances. He was ambitious of displaying the capabilities of his adherents, and perhaps his own also, in a pitched battle. Such an emotion was not, we confess, consistent with the duties of true generalship; but it ought to be recollected, that the campaign had hitherto been conducted upon principles which set modern tactics at defiance. The most chivalrous of those knightly kings from whom Charles drew his descent, had once given way to a similar impulse, and expiated it with his life. While we yield to James the admiration naturally excited by his romantic disinterestedness, let us not visit with too severe reprehension an hereditary ardour for glory in his descendant. Better, Charles would think, and it is not easy to condemn the sentiment, stake the whole fortune of the enterprise upon one fair and honourable battle, with the chance of a more brilliant triumph than any yet achieved, than skulk away to escape immediate danger, and after all die unsoldierly deaths in a prison of our own choosing.

There yet remained, however, before playing the great stake of a pitched battle, one chance of success, by the irregular mode of warfare to which his army was accustomed; and Charles, however actuated by the motives we speak of, had the good sense to put it to trial. This was a night attack upon the camp of the Duke of Cumberland. He rightly argued, that if his men could approach without being discovered, and make a simultaneous attack in more than one place, the royal forces, then probably either engaged in drinking their commander's health, or sleeping off the effects of the debauch, must be completely surprised and cut to pieces, or at least effectually routed. On the proposal being agitated among the chiefs and officers, it was agreed to, without much demur, though some could not help pointing out the extreme hazard of the attempt, and the evil effects which must result from it in case of failure. The time appointed for setting out upon the march, was eight in the evening, when daylight should have completely disappeared; and in the mean time, great pains were taken to conceal the secret from the army.

This resolution was entered into at three in the afternoon, and orders were immediately given to collect the men who had gone off in search of provisions. The officers dispersed themselves to Inverness and other places, and beseeched the stragglers to repair to the muir. But, under the influence of hunger, they told their commanders to shoot them if they pleased, rather than compel them to starve any longer. When the time came, therefore, little more than half of the army could be assembled. Charles had previously declared, with his characteristic fervour, that though only a thousand of his men would accompany him, he would lead them on to the attack; and he was not now intimidated, when he saw twice that number ready to assist in the enterprise; though some of his officers would willingly have made this deficiency of troops an excuse for abandoning what they esteemed at best a hazardous expedition. Having giving out, for watchword, the emphatic phrase, King James the Eighth, he embraced Lord George Murray, who was to command the foremost column, and putting himself at the head of that which followed, gave the orders to march.

The greatest care had been taken to conceal the object of this expedition from the mass of the army, lest, being communicated by them to the country people, it might reach the ears of the enemy. But the Duke of Cumberland, like a prudent general, taken measures, ever since he approached the Highlanders, to watch their slightest motions, was by no means ignorant of their march towards his position, though he did not apprehend a nocturnal attack. He had commissioned various country people, and some of his own Highland militia men, to mingle with their columns, and inform him from time to time of the progress they were making; and though he permitted his men to sleep, they were instructed to have their arms beside them. He did not suppose that the insurgents would be daring enough to fall upon his camp; but he had taken measures to give them battle in its vicinity, as soon as ever they should demand it.

Among the instructions issued to the officers of Charles's army, to be communicated in proper time to the troops, one was, that no fire-arms should be used, but only sword, dirk, and bayonet. It was also enjoined, that, on entering the camp, they should immediately set about cutting down or overturning the tents, and wherever a swelling or bulge was observed in the fallen canopy, "there to strike and push vigorously." As the camp was only nine miles distant from their position, it was expected that they would reach it soon after midnight, and thus have sufficient time to execute the whole of their project before daylight.

The night of the 15th of April was as dark as if Providence had designed to favour their daring purpose. But this circumstance, so advantageous in one respect, was unfortunate in another, in so far as it impeded their progress. Their march lay, not in the public road, where their motion would have been so easily detected, but through waste and generally wet ground, considerably removed from both roads and houses, and where want of light was peculiarly disadvantageous. On this account their progress was very slow, and attended with much fatigue; and, while many of the men dropped aside altogether, the rear column fell considerably behind the front. Lord George Murray, vexed at the slowness of the march, sent repeated requests, expressed in the most urgent terms, for the rear to join the van; but they were either disregarded, or could not be executed.

It was two in the morning before the head of the first column had passed Kilravock, or Kilrauk, an ancient residence three miles from the duke's camp; and Lord George then halted and called a council of officers, in which he declared it impossible for the army to reach the point of attack before daylight should expose them to the observation and fire of the enemy. Many officers, among whom was Mr. Hepburn of Keith, so remarkable for the way in which he joined Prince Charles at Holyroodhouse, spoke violently in favour of the original design; even asserting that the Highland broadsword would not be the worse of a little daylight to direct its operations. But Lord George, with more prudence, insisted upon the evils which must result to the whole army, and of course to the general cause, should their approach be observed and prepared for, as in all probability it would; and, hearing a drum beat in the distant camp, he expressed his conviction that the enemy were already alarmed. The urgency of the case demanding immediate determination he took it upon his responsibility as general, to turn back the men, Charles being so far in the rear that it would have required some time to procure his orders. As they were marching back, Charles, apprised of the resolution by his secretary, came galloping up, and had the mortification to find the army, from which he expected so much, in full retreat. He is said, upon very slight authority, to have been incensed in a high degree at Lord George. It is more probable, that, if he gave way to any expressions of regret, he must have been immediately made sensible of the necessity of the measure.

That the measure was indeed necessary, in opposition to those who afterwards continued to assert the contrary, seems to be put beyond dispute, by the circumstance, that the day was fully dawned before the Highland army had proceeded two miles in the retreat, and that although they now marched by the straightest and best paths.

The Highlanders returned, fatigued and disconsolate, to their former position, about seven o'clock in the morning: when they immediately addressed themselves to sleep, or went away in search of provisions. So scarce was food at this critical juncture, that the prince himself, on retiring to Culloden House, could obtain no better refreshment than a little bread and whisky. He felt the utmost anxiety regarding his men, among whom the pangs of hunger, upon bodies exhausted by fatigue, must have been working effects the most unpromising to his success; and he gave orders, before seeking any repose, that the whole country should now be mercilessly expiated for the means of refreshment. His orders were not without effect. Considerable supplies were procured, and subjected to culinary processes at Inverness; but the poor famished wretches were destined never to taste these provisions—the hour of battle arriving before they were prepared.

The Moor of Culloden stretches away so far to the east, with so little irregularity and so few incumbent objects, that its termination escapes the eyesight, and the horizon in that direction resembles that of a shoreless sea. It was about eleven in the forenoon, when the Highland guards first observed the dim level outline of the plain to blacken with the marching troops of the Duke of Cumberland; which seemed gradually to rise above and occupy the horizon, like the darkness of a coming storm dawning in the mariner's eye upon the distant waters. Notice of their approach being carried to the prince, he instantly rose, and descended to put himself at the head of his troops. As he was quitting the house, the steward made up to him, with information that a dinner, consisting of a roasted side of lamb and two fowls, was about to be laid upon the table. But he asked the man if he would have him to sit down to eat, when the troops so immediately required his presence, and, hungry though he must have been, hurried out to the field. He there exerted himself to collect his men from the various places to which they had straggled, ordering a cannon to be fired as a signal for their immediate assemblage. MacDonald of Keppoch and the Master of Lovat had joined that morning with their men, to the great joy of the army; and it was in something like good spirits that they now prepared for battle.

When all had been collected that seemed within call, the prince found he had an army of about five thousand men, and these in very poor condition for fighting, to oppose to a force reputed as numerous again, supported by superior horse and artillery, and whose strength was unimpaired either by hunger or fatigue. It seemed scarcely possible that he should overcome a host in every respect so much superior to his own; and various measures were proposed to him by his officers, for shunning battle in the mean time, and retiring to some position where their peculiar mode of warfare would avail against a regular army. But Charles, for reasons already stated, insisted upon immediate battle; pointing out that the groes of the army seemed in the highest degree anxious to come to blows, and that they would probably fall off in arduous—perhaps altogether disperse—if the present opportunity were not seized.

Active preparations were now, therefore, made for that desperate and important conflict, upon which the issue of this singular national contest was finally to depend. The insurgents were drawn up by Sullivan (at once their adjutant and quarter-master-general) in two lines; the right protected by the turf-enclosures around a rude farmstead, and their left extending towards a sort of morass in the direction of Culloden House. The front line consisted of the following clan regiments, reckoned from right to left:—Athole, Cameron, Appin, Fraser, MacIntosh, MacLauchlan and MacLean (forming one), John Roy Stuart, Farquharson, Clanranald, Keppoch, Glengary. The second, for which it was with difficulty that enough of men were found, comprised the Low Country and foreign regiments, according to the following order:—Lord Ogilvie, Lord Lewis Gordon, Glenbucket, the Duke of Perth, the Irish, the French. Four pieces of cannon were placed at each extremity of the front, and as many in the centre. Lord George Murray commanded the right wing, Lord John Drummond the left, General Stapleton the second line. Charles himself stood, with a small body of guards, upon a slight eminence in the rear.

While the insurgent army laboured under every kind of disadvantage, and were actuated by impulses of the most distracting and harassing nature, that of the Duke of Cumberland moved with all the deliberation and security proper to a superior and more confident force. They had struck their tents at five in the morning, when, the commanders of the various regiments having received their instructions in writing, the general orders of the day were read at the head of every company in the line. These bore, in allusion to the misbehaviour of Falkirk, that if any persons intrusted with the care of the train or baggage absconded or left their charge, they should be punished with immediate and certain death, and that if any officer or soldier failed in his duty during the action, he should be sentenced. Another and more important order was then given to the army. The superiority of the broadsword over the bayonet at Preston and Falkirk had given rise to much discussion among military men; and, during this winter, the magazines and newspapers had teemed with projects and hypotheses, by which it was proposed to put the weapons of the regular troops upon a par with those of the insurgents. It was reserved for the Duke of Cumberland effectually to obviate the supposed superiority of the claymore and target. He had perceived that the greatest danger which the regular troops ran in a charge with the Highlanders, arose from the circumstance, that the latter received his antagonist's point in his target, swayed it aside, and then had the defenceless body of the soldier completely exposed to his own weapon. The duke conceived, that if each man, on coming within the proper distance of the enemy, should direct his thrust, not at the man directly opposite to him, but against the one who fronted his right hand comrade, the target would be rendered useless, and the Highlander wounded in the right side, under the sword arm, ere he could ward off the thrust. Accordingly, he had instructed the men, during the spring in this new exercise. When they had taken their morning meal, they were marched forward from the camp; arranged in three parallel divisions of four regiments each, headed by Huske, Sempill, and Mordaunt; having a column of artillery and baggage upon one hand, and a fifth of horse upon the other.

After a march of eight miles, through ground which appeared to the English soldiers very boggy and difficult, they came within sight of the insurgents, who were posted about a mile and a half in advance. The duke then commanded his lines to form; having learned that the Highlanders seemed inclined to make the attack. Soon after, on its being ascertained that no motion was perceptible in the Highland army, he ordered the lines to be restored to the form of columns, and to proceed in their march. Calling out, at the same time, to know if any man in the army was acquainted with the ground, he commanded the individual who presented himself, to go a little way in advance, along with some officers of rank, to conduct the army, and especially the artillery, over the safest paths. When he had got within a mile of the enemy, he ordered the army once more and finally to be formed in battle array.

The royal army was disposed in three lines; the first containing from left to right, the regiments of Burrell, and Munro, the Scots Fusiliers, Price's, Cholmondeley's, and the Scots Royals, under the command of the Earl Albemarle; the second, in the same order, Walsby's, Sempill's, Bligh's, Ligonier's, and Fleming's, commanded by General Huske; the third, Blakeney's, Battersea's, Pulteney's, and Howard's, led by Brigadier Mordaunt. The centres of all the regiments of the second line being behind the terminations of those of the first, and those of the third line occupying a similar position in regard to the second, the various bodies of which the army consisted were in a manner indented into each other. Between every two regiments of the first line were placed two cannon. The left flank was protected by Kerr's Dragoons, under Colonel Lord Ancrum; the right by a bog; and Cobham's Dragoons stood in two detachments beside the third line. The Argyll Highlanders guarded the baggage.

* The loyalty of the Clan Campbell, or, more properly speaking, their attachment to Revolution principles, has been externally conspicuous since the time of the great Civil War, and may in some measure be considered a settled matter in history. It is, however, to be now sub-

The disposition thus made was allowed by the best military men of the period to have been altogether admirable; because it was impossible for the Highlanders to break one regiment without finding two ready to supply its place. The arrangement of the insurgent army was also allowed to be very good, upon a supposition that they were to be attacked.

Duke William, full of anxiety for the event of the day, took the opportunity afforded by the halt, to make a short speech to his soldiers. The tenor of his harangue, which has been preserved in the note-book of an English officer, shows, in the most unequivocal manner, how apprehensive his royal highness was regarding the behaviour of his troops. Without directly adverting to Preston or Falkirk, but evidently having those disgraceful events in his eye, he implored them to be firm and collected—to dismiss all remembrance of former failures from their minds—to consider the great object for which they were here, no less than to save the liberties of their country, and the rights of their master. Having read a letter to them, which he said he had found upon the person of a straggler, and in which sentiments of the most truculent nature were breathed against the English soldiery, he represented to them, that, in their present circumstances, with marshy ways behind them, and surrounded by an enemy's country, their best, indeed their only chance of personal safety, lay in hard fighting. He was grieved, he said, to make the supposition that there could be a person reluctant to fight in the British army. But, if there were any here who would prefer to retire, whether from disinclination to the cause, or because they had relations in the rebel army, he begged them in the name of God to do so, as he would rather face the Highlanders with one thousand determined men at his back, than have ten thousand with a tythe who were lukewarm. Catching enthusiasm from the language of the ardent young soldier, and shouting "Flanders! Flanders!" the men found their courage screwed to the proper point, and impatiently desired to be led forward to battle.

It was suggested to the duke at this juncture, that he should permit the men to dine, as it was now nearly one o'clock, then the usual time for that meal, and as they would not probably have another opportunity of satisfying their hunger for several hours. But he decidedly rejected the proposal. "The men," he said "will fight better and more actively with empty bellies; and, moreover, it would be a bad omen. You remember what a desert they got to their dinner at Falkirk."

The army now marched forward in complete battle array, their fixed bayonets glittering in the sun, their colours flying, and the sound of a hundred drums rolling forward in defiance of the insurgents. Lord Kilmarnock is said to have remarked, on seeing the army approach, that he felt a presentiment of defeat, from the cool, orderly, determined manner in which they marched. When within six hundred yards of the Highland lines, they found the ground so marshy as to take most of the regiments up to the ankles in water; and the artillery horses then sinking in a bog, some of the soldiers along their carabines, and dragged the carriages on to their proper position. Soon after, the bog was found to terminate upon the right, so as to leave that flank uncovered; which being perceived by the all-vigilant duke, he ordered Pulteney's regiment to take its place beside the Scots Royals, and a body of horse to cover the whole wing in the same manner with the left. The army finally halted at the distance of five hundred paces from the Highlanders.

The day, which had hitherto been fair and sunny, jected to some doubt. By information, derived through a channel of the most unquestionable nature, from Campbell of Dunstaffnage, one of the inferior chiefs in command on this occasion, we are enabled to state a fact, which at least shows they were not altogether free of the mania which had seized so many of their countrymen. On the night before the battle of Culloden, the heads of the clan held a meeting, unknown to the rest of the army, for the purpose of deliberating upon the line of conduct which it was eligible for them to pursue in the action which seemed pending. The resolution was, that the clan should give the royal army one chance more of suppressing the insurrection—that is to say, should continue faithful for one other battle; but that, if the Highlanders beat them again, as they had so often done before, then should the clan declare for Prince Charles. We anticipate the astonishment and incredulity with which this statement will be received; but can only aver, that, from the way in which the information has reached us, we are induced to give it implicit credit.

was now partially overcast, and a shower of snowy rain began to beat with considerable violence from the north-east. The Highlanders, who had found the weather so favourable to them at Falkirk, were somewhat disconcerted on finding it against them at Culloden; and the spirits of the regulars were proportionally raised by the circumstance. Charles saw and felt the disadvantage, and made some attempts, by manœuvring, to get to windward of the royal army; but Duke William, equally vigilant, contrived to counteract all his movements; so that, after half an hour spent in mutual endeavours to outflank each other, the two armies at last occupied nearly their original ground.

Whilst these vain manœuvres were going on, an incident took place, which serves to show the exalted heroism and devoted loyalty of the Highlanders. A poor mountaineer, under whose ragged exterior a baughty Southron would have deemed that nothing but the meanest sentiments could dwell, resolving to sacrifice his life for the good of his prince and clan, approached the lines of the English, demanded quarter, and was sent to the rear. As he lounged backwards and forwards through the lines, apparently very indifferent to what was going on, and even paying no attention to the ridicule with which the soldiers greeted his uncouth appearance, Lord Bury, son of the Earl of Albemarle, and aid-de-camp to the Duke, happened to pass in the discharge of his duties, when all at once the Highlander seized one of the soldiers' muskets, and discharged it at that officer; receiving, next moment, with perfect indifference, and as a matter of course, the shot with which another soldier immediately terminated his own existence. He had intended to shoot the Duke of Cumberland, but fired prematurely, and without effect, at an inferior officer whose gaudy apparel seemed, in his simple eyes, to indicate the highest rank. The incident somewhat resembles one which occurred at the battle of Bannockburn; when Henry de Bohun attempted to slay King Robert Bruce. But the daring of the English knight was not equal to that of the Highlander; his chance of success having been great, and of his escape still greater, while the Highlander was, in either event, certain of destruction.

There is an interesting historical print, in which the beginning, middle, and end of the battle of Culloden are simultaneously represented, and which therefore conveys a remarkably distinct idea of the whole scene. This draught is calculated to be of material service in portraying the various successive events of the action, and also in enabling a writer to give a picturesque idea of the ground, and of the positions and appearance of the armies. The spectator is supposed to stand within the enclosures so often mentioned, and to look northward along the lines towards Culloden House and the Moray Frith. In the fore ground, rather for the sake of giving a portrait of the hero of the day, than because this was his position, the artist has represented the duke on horseback, with a walking-stick extended in his hand, a star upon the breast of his long gold-laced coat, and his large good-humoured head, with its close curls and tri-cocked hat, inclined towards an aide-de-camp, to whom he is giving orders. The long compact lines of the British regiments, each three men deep, extend along the plain, with narrow intervals between; the two flags of each regiment rising from the centre; the officers standing at the extremities, their spontoons in their hands; and the drummers a little in advance, beating the proper points of war. The men have all tri-cocked hats, long coats resembling the modern surcoat, sash-belts from which a sword depends, and long white gaiters buttoned up the sides. The character of the whole dress is one of voluminous sufficiency, strongly contrasting with the trim and concise outline of the present military costume, which has almost reduced a soldier to the primitive "forked animal" of King Lear. The dragoons exhibit, if possible, still more cumbersome superfluity of attire; their long loose skirts flying behind them as they ride, whilst their vast trunk square-toed boots, their prodigious stirrup-leathers, their huge holster-pistols and carabines, give altogether an idea of dignity and strength, fully as much in contrast with the light fantastic huzzar uniforms of modern times.

The Highlanders, on the other hand, stand in lines equally compact, and, like the regular regiments, each three men deep. The only peculiarity in their dress, which is so well known as to require no general description, seems to be, that the philabeg, or kilt, is pulled through betwixt the legs, in such a way as to show more of the front of the thigh than is exhibited by the modern specimens of that peculiar garment. They have muskets over their left shoulders, basket-hilted broadswords by their left sides, pistols stuck into their girdles, and a small pouch hanging down upon the right loin, perhaps for holding their ammunition. By the right side of every piece of ordnance, there is a cylindrical piece of wickerwork, for the protection of the artillerymen, all of whom appear to wear kilts like the rest.

The ground upon which the armies stand, is the plain swelling moor already described, out of which Culloden House raises its erect form, without any of the plantations which now surround it. The spires of Inverness are seen upon the left, close to the sea-shore. Upon the Moray Frith, which stretches along the back ground of the picture, the victualling ships ride at anchor, like witnesses of the dreadful scene about to ensue; and the magnificent hills of Ross raise their lofty forms in the remoter distance, as if also taking an interest in the impending fate of the day.

Such were the aspect and circumstances of the two armies, upon whose conduct, during the next little hour, the eternal interests of Britain might in some measure be considered to depend. The hopes and fears of both parties may be supposed to have been, on such an occasion, truly agitating—quite as much so, indeed, as if each individual had staked his own life and fortune upon the issue. The soldiery on both sides, aware of the danger, as well as dishonour, which would attend a defeat, and deriving confidence from the merits of their respective causes, must have been wrought up to a pitch of the highest resolution—it may almost be said, of desperation. Never, perhaps, was there a battle commenced before, with so high a stake depending upon its issue, and in which a greater struggle was therefore to be expected.

CHAPTER XXVII.

BATTLE OF CULLODEN.

Fair lady, mourn the memory
Of all our Scottish fame;
Fair lady, mourn the memory
Even of the Scottish name!
How proud were we of our young Prince,
And of his native swag,
But all our hopes are past,
Upon Culloden day.

There was no lack of blood,
No spare of blood or bone,
For, one to two, our force
For freedom or for home,
The bitterness of grief
Of terror and dismay—
The die was risk'd and fought,
Upon Culloden day.

Jacobite Song.

The action was commenced by the Highlanders, who fired their cannon for a few minutes without being answered by the Royal Artillery. They had brought them to bear upon a point where, by means of glasses, they thought they could perceive the duke. But the shot went clear over the heads of the king's troops, and for a long time did no other mischief than carrying off a leg from one of Blyth's regiment.

A few minutes after one o'clock, soon after the Highlanders had opened up their battery, Colonel Belford got orders to commence a cannonade, chiefly with a view to provoke the enemy to advance. The colonel, who was an excellent engineer, performed his duty with such effect, as to make whole lanes through the ranks of the insurgents, besides tearing up the ground at their feet, and stripping the roofs of the neighbouring cottages, in a manner almost as terrific. He also fired two pieces at a body of horse amongst whom it was believed the prince was stationed; and with such precision did he take his aim, that that personage was bespattered with dirt raised by the balls, and a man holding a led horse by his side was killed.

Meanwhile, the duke rode about, calling upon his men to be firm in their ranks—to permit the Highlanders to mingle with them—to let them feel the force of the bayonet—to "make them know what men they had to do with." He also ordered Wolfe's regiment to form en potence at the extremity of the left wing—that is, to take a position perpendicular to the general line, so as to be ready to fall in upon and enclose the Highlanders, as soon as they should attack that division of his army. He also ordered two regiments of the rear line, or reserve, to advance to the second. Finally, he himself took his position between the first and second lines, opposite to the centre of Howard's regiment, and of course a little nearer the left than the right wing.

Prince Charles, before the commencement of the battle, had rode along the lines of his little army, endeavouring, by the animation of his gestures, countenance, and language, to excite the Highlanders to their highest pitch of courage. They answered him with cheers, and with many an expression of devotion, which he could only understand by the look with which it was uttered. He then again retired to the eminence which he originally occupied, and prepared with an anxious mind to await the fortune of the day.

The great object of both parties at the battle of Culloden seems to have been, which should force the other to leave its position and make the attack. Charles for a long time expected that the duke would do this, because he was favoured with the wind and weather. But the duke, finding his cannon rapidly thinning the Highland ranks, without experiencing any loss in return, had no occasion whatever to make such a motion; and it therefore became incumbent upon Charles to take that course himself.

The victory of Preston, where the Highlanders felt little or no annoyance from cannon, had done away with a great deal of the fear in which they originally held these engines of destruction; and it seems to have been a capital error on Charles's part, to have restrained them, on the present occasion, to a position, where that terror got full reason and leisure to return. He ought to have, on the contrary, rushed up, at the very first, to the lines of his enemy, and endeavoured to silence their artillery, as he had done at Preston, by a coup de main. Had he done so, a great number of lives might have been saved, and the attack would have been made with lines less broken, and a more uniform and simultaneous impulse.

It was not till the cannonade had continued nearly half an hour, and the Highlanders had seen many of their kindred stretched upon the heath, that Charles at last gave way to the necessity of ordering a charge. The aide-de-camp intrusted to carry his message to the lieutenant-general—a youth of the name of MacLauchlan—was killed by a cannon-ball before he reached the first line; but the general sentiment of the army, as reported to Lord George Murray, supplied the want; and that general took it upon him to order an attack, without Charles's permission having been communicated.

Lord George had scarcely determined upon ordering a general movement, when the MacIntoshes,—a brave and devoted clan, though never before engaged in action,—unable any longer to brook the unavenged slaughter made by the cannon, broke from the centre of the line, and rushed forward through smoke and snow to mingle with the enemy. The Atholmen, Camerons, Stuarts, Frasers, and MacLeans, then also went on, Lord George Murray heading them with that rash bravery for which he was so remarkable. Thus, in the course of one or two minutes, the charge was general along the whole line; except at the left extremity, where the MacDonalds, dissatisfied with their position, hesitated to engage.

It was the emphatic custom of the Highlanders, before an onset, to scrug their bonnets—that is, to pull their little blue caps down over their brows, so as to ensure them against falling off in the ensuing mêlée. Never, perhaps, was this motion performed with so much emphasis as on the present occasion, when every man's forehead burned with the desire to revenge some dear friend who had fallen a victim to the murderous artillery. A Lowland gentleman, who was in the line, and who survived till a late period, used always, in relating the events of Culloden, to comment, with a feeling of something like awe, upon the terrific and more than natural expression of rage, which glowed on every face and gleamed in every eye, as he surveyed the extended line at this moment. It was an exhibition of mighty and all-engrossing passion, never to be forgotten by the beholder.

The action and onset of the battle were, throughout, quite as dreadful as the mental emotion which urged it. Notwithstanding that the three files of the front line of English poured forth their incessant fire of musketry—notwithstanding that the cannon, now loaded with grape-shot, swept the field as with a hail-storm—notwithstanding the flank fire of Wolfe's regiment,—onward, onward went the headlong Highlanders, flinging themselves into, rather than rushing upon the lines of the enemy, which, indeed, they did not see for smoke till involved among their weapons. All that courage—all that despair could do—was done. They did not fight like living or reasoning creatures, but like machines under the influence of some uncontrollable principle of action. The howl of the advance—the scream of the onset—the thunders of the musketry, and the din of the trumpets and drums—confounded one sense; while the flash of the firearms, and the glitter of the brandished broadswords, dazzled and bewildered another. It was a moment of dreadful and agonising suspense—but only a moment; for the whirlwind does not reap the forest with greater rapidity than the Highlanders cleared the line. They swept through and over that frail barrier, almost as easily and instantaneously as the bounding cavalcade brushes through the morning labours of the gossamer which stretch across its path. Not, however, with the same unconsciousness of the event. Almost every man in their front rank, chief and gentleman, fell before the deadly weapons which they had braved; and although the enemy gave way, it was not till every bayonet was bent and bloody with the strife.

When the first line had been completely swept aside, the assailants continued their impetuous advance till they came near the second, when, being almost annihilated by a profuse and well directed fire, the shattered remains of what had been but an hour before a numerous and confident force, at last submitted to destiny, by giving way and flying. Still a few rushed on, resolved rather to die and thus forfeit their well-acquired and dearly estimated honour. They rushed on—but not a man ever came in contact with the enemy. The last survivor perished as he reached the points of the bayonets.

The persevering and desperate valour displayed by the Highlanders on this occasion, is proved by the circumstance that, at one part of the plain, where a very vigorous attack had been made, their bodies were afterwards found in layers three and four deep; so many, it would appear, having in succession mounted over a prostrate friend, to share in the same inevitable fate. The slaughter was particularly great among the brave MacIntoshes; inasmuch, that the heroic lady who sent them to the field, afterwards told the party by which she was taken prisoner, that only three of her officers had escaped.

While the rest of the clans were performing this glorious though fatal charge, the MacDonalds, as already stated, withheld themselves on account of their removal to the left wing. According to the report of one of their officers, the clan not only resented this indignity, but considered it as menacing evil fortune to the day; their clan never having fought elsewhere than on the right wing, since the auspicious battle of Bannockburn. The Duke of Perth, who was stationed amongst them, endeavoured to appease their anger by telling them, that, if they fought with their characteristic bravery, they would make the left wing a right, in which case he would assume for ever after the honorable surname of MacDonald. But the insult was not to be expiated by this appeal to the spirit of clanship. Though induced to discharge their muskets, and even to advance a good way, they never made an onset. They endured the fire of the English regiments without flinching; only expressing their rage by hewing up the heather with their swords; but they at last fled when they saw the other clans give way. Out of the whole three regiments, only one man is commemorated as having displayed conduct worthy of the gallant name which he bore. This was the Chieftain of Keppoch, a man of chivalrous character, and noted for great private worth. When the rest of his clan retreated, Keppoch advanced, with a pistol in one hand and a drawn sword in the other, resolved apparently to sacrifice his life to the offended genius of his name. He had got but a little way from his regiment, when a musket-shot brought him to the ground. A clansman of more than ordinary devotedness, who followed him; and with tears and prayers conjured him not to throw his life away, raised him with the cheering assurance that his wound was not mortal, and that he might still quit the field with life. Keppoch desired his faithful follower to take care of himself, and, again rushing forward, received another shot, and fell to rise no more.

When the whole front line of Charles's host had been thus repulsed, there only remained to him the hope that his Lowland and foreign troops, upon whom the wreck of the clans had fallen back, might yet make head against the English infantry; and he eagerly sought to put himself at their head, in order to make one last deperate effort at success. But, though a troop of the Irish piquets, by a spirited fire, checked the pursuit which a body of dragoons commenced after the MacDonalds, and one of Lord Lewis Gordon's regiments did similar service in regard to another troop which now began to break through the inclosures on the right, the whole body gave way at once, on observing the English regiments advancing to charge them. Their hearts were broken, with despair rather than with terror; and they could only reply to his animating exclamations, "Prince—ochon! ochon!"—the ejaculation by which Highlanders express the bitterest grief. As they said this they fled; nor could all his entreaties nor those of his officers, prevail upon them to stand.

It was indeed a complete rout. The mountaineers had done all that their system of warfare taught them, and all that their natural strength had enabled them to perform; they had found this vain; and all that then remained was to withdraw. Charles saw the condition of his troops with the despair of a ruined gambler. He could scarcely be persuaded that God had struck him with so severe an infliction. He lingered on the field, in the fond hope that all was not yet lost. He even moved to charge the enemy, as if his own single person could have availed against so big a destiny. Confounded, bewildered, and in tears, it required the utmost efforts of his attendants to make him forego his once splendid hopes by a retreat; and he at last only left the field when to have remained would have but added his own destruction to that of the many brave men who had already spilt their heart's blood in his cause.*

The pursuit of the royal forces did not immediately follow the retreat of the insurgents. After the latter had withdrawn their shattered strength, the English regiments, upon many of which they had produced a dreadful impression, were ordered to resume the ground where they had stood, and to dress their ranks. The dragoon regiments, with which the duke had calculated to enclose the charging Highlanders as in a trap, were checked, as already stated, by the flanks of the Prince's second line; and they had altogether been so severely handled by the insurgents, that it was some time before they recovered breath or courage sufficient to commence or sustain a general pursuit.

The English dragoons at length did break forward, and join, as intended, in the centre of the field, so as to make a vigorous and united charge upon the rear of the fugitives. Charles's army then broke into two grand bodies of unequal magnitude; one of which took the open road for Inverness, while the other turned off towards the southwest, crossed the water of Nairn, and found refuge among the hills.

The fate of the first of these divisions was the most disastrous, their route admitting of the easiest pursuit. It lay along an open moor, which the light horse of the enemy could bound over with the utmost speed. A dreadful slaughter took place; involving many of the inhabitants of Inverness, who had approached the battle ground from curiosity, and whose dress subjected them to the indiscriminating vengeance of the soldiers. Some of the French, who had the sense to fly first, reached Inverness in safety; but scarcely any who wore the Highland dress escaped with their lives. A broad pavement of carnage marked four out of the five miles intervening betwixt the battle field and that city; the head of the slain being found at a place called Milburn, about a mile from the extremity of the suburbs.

It is remarkable as characteristic of the Highlanders, that in their retreat some of them displayed a degree of coolness and bravery, which would have done credit to the best army in an advance. The right wing retreated, as already stated, almost without any assistance. In their way to cross the river Nairn, they met a large party of English dragoons which had been despatched to intercept them. Such was the desperate fury of their appearance, that the troopers opened their ranks in respectful silence, to permit them to pass. Only one man attempted to annoy the wretched fugitives. He was an officer, and dearly did he pay for his cruel temerity. Advancing to seize a Highlander, the man cut him down with one blow of his claymore. Not content with this, the savage stooped down, and, with the greatest deliberation, possessed himself of his victim's gold watch. He then joined the retreat, whilst

* It required all the eloquence, and indeed all the active exertions of Sullivan, to make Charles quit the field. A cornet in his service, when questioned upon this subject at the point of death, declared he saw Sullivan, after using entreaties in vain, turn the head of the prince's horse, and drag him away.

* One of this corps, though not of the clan named old John Grant, long keeper of the inn at Aviemore—used to tell, that the first thing he saw of the enemy, was the long line of white gaiters belonging to an English regiment, which was suddenly revealed, when about twenty yards from him, by a blast of wind which blew aside the smoke. According to the report of this veteran, the mode of drilling used by his leader, upon Culloden Moor, was very simple—being directed by the following string of orders, expressed in Gaelic. "Come, my lads—fall in, with your faces to Fortrose, and your backs to the Green of Muirtown—load your firelocks—good—make ready—present—now take good aim—fire—be sure to do execution—that's the point."—Information by the editor of the Culloden papers.

the commander of the party could only look on in silence, astonished at the coolness of the mountaineer, if not secretly applauding him for so brave a deed.

Another Highlander signalled himself in a still more remarkable manner. He was a man of prodigious bodily strength; his name Golice Macbane. When all his companions had fled, Golice, singled out and wounded, set his back against a wall, and, with his target and claymore, bore singly the onset of a party of dragoons. Pushed to desperation, he made resistless strokes at his enemies, who crowded and encumbered themselves to have the glory of slaying him. "Save that brave fellow," was the unregarded cry of some officers. Poor Macbane was cut to pieces, though not till thirteen of his enemies lay dead around him.

When Charles retreated, it was with such precipitation, that his bonnet and wig flew off his head before he cleared the battle ground. The peruke being fortunately entangled in falling by some part of his horse's furniture, he easily recovered it; but his bonnet reached the ground, and was necessarily left behind. A Highland seer would have seen, in this loss of his gold-encircled and coronet-like head-piece, an ominous emblem of the departure of the crown from him and his family. He happened fortunately to retreat along with the right wing, and reached the hills in safety.

The battle of Culloden is said to have lasted little more than forty minutes, most of which brief space of time was spent in distant firing, and very little in the active struggle. It was as complete a victory as possible on the part of the royal army, but a still more disastrous defeat on that of the Highlanders. Less praise is due, however, to the victors than to the vanquished. Their force and condition for fighting were so superior, their artillery did so much to their hands, and the plan of the battle was so much in their favour, that to have lost the day would have argued a degree of misbehaviour utterly inconceivable of any soldiery, while to gain was only the natural result of incidental circumstances. Great praise was awarded afterwards by the voice of fame to Barrell's, Monro's, and some other regiments, for their fortitude in bearing the attack of the Highlanders, and for their killing so many; but these battalions were in reality completely beat aside, and the whole front line shaken so much, that, had the MacDonald regiments made a simultaneous charge along with the other clans, the day might have had a different issue. Such was the opinion of the Chevalier Johnstone, whose experience in warfare must have enabled him to judge correctly. But the circumstances altogether go to prove, that, at this period, the fortune of the day was very doubtful, and that indeed the tide of courage, which had hitherto sustained the hearts of the duke's soldiers, was just beginning to turn and ebb, when the Highlanders relieved them by retreating. They had, it will be observed, swept over and destroyed a great portion of the first line; their friends behind had done much to obviate the trap-stratagem of the enclosures; and, above all, when the clans retired from the struggle, some time was spent before the victors became sufficiently confident of their success to commence a pursuit. Had not much been done to appal the duke—had not the Highlanders performed such prodigies of valour as to make them be feared even in flight—had it not, indeed, been a question in the minds of the British soldiery, whether they had really won a battle after what they had seen and felt—the chase would have been more instantaneous and energetic, and the fight less easy and secure.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE BATTLE OF CULLODEN.

The target is torn from the arms of the just,
The helmet is cleft on the brow of the brave,
The claymore for ever in darkness must rust;
But red is the sword of the stranger and slave;
The hoof of the horse, and the foot of the proud,
Have trod o'er the plumes on the bonnet of blue;
Why slept the red bolt in the breast of the cloud,
When tyranny revelled in blood of the true?
Farewell, my young hero, the gallant and good!
The crown of thy fathers is torn from thy brow.

Jacobsite Song.

The very cruelty which the victors exercised after they were certain of their good fortune, is a proof that they did not achieve their victory without great pains; as bad temper is the sure result of a difficult argument. Not content with the slaughter they had made by means of their muskets and bayonets, they unsheathed their swords after the action, and, with the gestures of savages, ran loose over the field, cutting down all who exhibited any symptoms of life, and even taking a malignant pleasure in inflicting fresh stabs upon the bosoms of the slain. They did this as much in sport as in rage; and it is said that, at last, they sought amusement by splashing one another with the horrid liquid which overflowed the field. According to the report of one of themselves, they finally "looked like so many butchers, rather than an army of Christian soldiers."

It was afterwards attempted to palliate this dreadful scene, by forging an order with the signature of Lord George Murray, to the effect that no quarter was to be given to the king's troops. Though such had really been the case, would it have excused a butchery which took place before it was discovered?

The true cause of the cruelty so much complained of on this disastrous occasion, and which has so effectually tarnished the renown of the Duke of Cumberland, is to be found in the several defeats which the victors had before sustained from the Highlanders, of which the last was not the least. When they at length overpowered an enemy from whom they had experienced so much annoyance, they did not well know how to use their good fortune; but, in the heat of the moment, went to the extreme of cruelty, as the measure at once consistent with their own desire of vengeance, and best calculated to serve the purposes of government. The letter which the duke read to them before the battle, breathing such cruel threats against them, in bracing their nerves to the attack, must have also whetted their appetite for the carnage. A great deal, moreover, is to be attributed to the contempt in which the poor mountaineers were held by their soi-disant civilised countrymen. The English actually looked upon them as beasts in human shape—beasts, with the additional disqualification of being more pestilent and dangerous than the most of the brute creation. The simple honour, the generous devotion, the poetical language and manners of the unhappy clansmen, were totally unknown to, or at least unappreciated by the dissolute and inconsiderate soldiery; who, in stabbing their still living but unresisting bodies, probably felt no more compunction, than if they had been only trampling upon so many noxious vermin, which it was necessary to annihilate utterly, lest they should still have the power of stinging.

It is a trite remark, but one which applies well to the present case, that civil contests are ever attended with circumstances of greater violence and cruelty than any other species of warfare. In the battle of Culloden, such was the virulence of both parties, that no quarter was given or taken on either side. It was but natural for the Highlanders to fight with desperation, and rather to die than be taken; for the fate with which the Carlisle prisoners were menaced, assured them that they had no mercy to expect from government. But the same excuse does not hold with the regular forces, who must have been aware that the insurgents had all along been as kind as circumstances would permit to their prisoners, and in general allowed them to go at large upon parole. The king's troops ought therefore to have treated the Highlanders with less rigour than what the Highlanders could be expected to show to the king's troops. The reverse was the case.

The barbarities which followed the victory of Culloden, when the fervour of battle must have been cooled, and the victors completely assured of receiving no farther annoyance from the enemy, were such as to be scarcely credible by the present age; and the writer who now undertakes to display them in their real colours, may perhaps incur the charge of exaggeration or prejudice. Neither this imputation, however, nor any sentiment of delicacy shall be allowed here to stifle the statements which so many former historians have, for these or for worse reasons, withheld.

The most obvious charge of barbarity which can be brought against the Duke of Cumberland, in reference to this period of the campaign, is that he did not take the pains which is usually taken by victors in civilised warfare, of attending to the wounded of the enemy in common with those of his own army. Charles, who, notwithstanding all the attempts which have been made to show him up as a monster, cannot be denied to have used his victories with moderation and humanity, had all along treated the wounded of his prisoners with the most anxious and considerate kindness; even encumbering himself, at various periods of the campaign, in order to provide for their comfort. But with the Duke of Cumberland, whose opportunities of displaying humanity were so much better, the case was very different. Not only did he permit the bloody scene already described, where the wounded insurgents were indiscriminately massacred, but he actually took a personal interest in the completion of the dreadful work. Soon after the battle, he was riding over the field, accompanied by Colonel Wolfe, the future hero of Quebec, when he observed a wounded Highlander sit up on his elbow, and look at him with what appeared to his eyes a smile of defiance. "Wolfe," he cried, "shoot me that Highland scoundrel, who thus dares to look on us with so insolent a stare."—"My commission," said the gentle and excellent Wolfe, "is at your royal highness's disposal; but I can never consent to become an executioner." The Highlander, in all probability, was soon despatched by some less scrupulous hand; but it was remarked that, from that day, the recusant officer declined visibly in the favour and confidence of his commander.

It is a fact equally authentic with the preceding, that, on the day after the action, when it was discovered that some of the wounded had survived both the weapons of the enemy and the dreadful rains which fell in the interval, he sent out detachments from Inverness, to put these unfortunates out of pain. The savage executioners of his barbarous commands performed their duty with awful accuracy and deliberation; carrying all they could find to different pieces of rising ground throughout the field, where, having first ranged them in due order, they despatched them by shot of musketry. On the following day (Friday,) other parties were sent out to search the houses of the neighbouring peasantry, in which, it was understood, many of the mutilated Highlanders had taken refuge. They found so great a number as almost to render the office revolting to its bearers; but, with the exception of a few who received mercy at the hands of the officers, all were conscientiously murdered. An unconcerned eye witness afterwards reported to the writer just quoted, that on this day he saw no fewer than seventy-two individuals "killed in cold blood!" Dreadful, however, as this scene must have been, it was surpassed in fiendish wickedness by a sort of supererogatory cruelty which was acted by the soldiers in the course of their other operations. At a little distance from the field of battle, there was a wretched hut, used for shelter of sheep in stormy weather, into which a considerable number of the wounded had crawled. The soldiers, on discovering them, actually proceeded to set the hut on fire, and set the house in flames; so that all who were in it, including many persons who were mere spectators attending the wounded. In the rubbish and devastation, between thirty and forty scorched and mangled bodies were found by the country people, and the monsters had departed from the scene of their ravages.

But by far the most horrible instance of cruelty which occurred in the course of these unhappy times, was one which took place in the immediate vicinity of Culloden House. Nineteen wounded officers of the Highland army had been carried, immediately after the battle, from a wood in which they had found their first shelter, to the court-yard of that residence, where they remained two days in the open air, with their wounds undressed, and only receiving such acts of kindness from the steward of the house, as that official chose to render at the risk of his own life. Upon the third day, when the search was made throughout the neighbouring cottages, three miserable men were seized by the ruthless soldiers, tied with ropes, tossed into a cart, and taken out to the side of a park wall, where, being ranged up in order, they were commanded to prepare for immediate death. Such as retained the use of their limbs, or whose spirits, formerly so daring, could not sustain them through this trying scene, fell upon their knees, and, with piteous cries and many invocations to heaven, implored mercy. But they petitioned in vain. Before they had been ranged up for the space of a single minute—before they could utter one brief prayer to heaven, the platoon, which stood at the distance of only two or three yards, received orders to fire. Almost every individual in the unhappy company fell prostrate upon the ground, and expired instantly. But, to make sure work, the men were ordered to club their muskets, and dash out the brains of all who seemed to show any symptoms of life. This order was obeyed literally. One individual alone survived—a gentleman of the clan Fraser. He had received a ball, but yet showed the appearance of life. The butt of a soldier's musket was accordingly applied to his head to despatch him; nevertheless, though his nose and cheek were dashed in, and one of his eyes dashed out, he did not expire. He lay for some time in a state of agony not to be described, when Lord Boyd, son of the Earl of Kilmarnock, happening to pass, perceived his body move, and ordered him to be conveyed to a secure place, when he recovered in the course of three months. The unfortunate man lived many years afterwards to tell the dreadful tale; and the writer already alluded to appears to have derived his information from this excellent source.

The Duke of Cumberland has been characterised by his friend Earl Waldegrave, as one whose judgment would have been equal to his parts, had it not been too much guided by his passions, which were often violent and ungovernable. The cruelties, however, which distinguished his Scottish campaign, rather argue the cool malignant fiend than the violent man of anger. His courage was that of the bull-dog; but he had not the generosity of that animal, to turn away from his victim when it could no longer oppose him. After fairly overthrowing his antagonist, his savage disposition demanded that he should throttle, and gore, and exorcise it, as a revenge for the trouble to which it had put him in the combat. He had that persevering and insatiable appetite for prey, that, not contented with sucking the blood and devouring the flesh of his victims, he could enjoy himself in mauling the bones; and even when these were exhausted of sap and taste, he would gnash on for sport, and was only to be finally withdrawn from the horrid feast, when putridity had rendered it disgusting to his senses.

The number of Highlanders slain upon the field of Culloden was never well ascertained; but it could not be much less than a thousand, that is, a fifth of their army. The dreadful list comprised many important men; for in this, as in all the former battles, the chiefs and gentlemen, as the best armed, and to show an example of bravery, went foremost into the strife, and were of course most exposed. Out of the five regiments which charged the English—the Camerons, Stuarts, Frasers, MacIntoshes, and MacLeans—almost all the leaders and front rank men were killed. MacLachlan, colonel of the regiment last mentioned, which included a body of that name, was killed in the onset. His lieutenant-colonel, MacLean of Drimmin, who then assumed the command, was bringing off his shattered forces, when he observed two of his sons, who had fought by his side, severely wounded, and heard that a third had been left dead on the field. Exclaiming, "It shall not be for nought," this brave old gentleman, without either bonnet or wig, rushed back into the fight, attacked two dragoons, killed one and wounded another, but was at last cut down by other three, who came up to the assistance of their comrades. MacGillivray of Drumnaglass, colonel of the MacIntosh regiment, was killed in the attack, with the lieutenant-colonel, the major, and all the other officers of the regiment, with the exception, as already stated, of three. Charles Fraser, younger of Inveralachie, who was lieutenant-colonel of the Fraser regiment, and commanded it on this occasion, was also killed. Seventeen officers and gentlemen of the Appin regiment were slain, and ten wounded; but Stuart of Ardsheil, who commanded it, escaped; as did Lochiel, the chief and leader of the Camerons. No distinguished persons fell among the Lowland regiments, except the Viscount Strathallan.

The field of Culloden yet bears witness to the carnage of which it was the scene. In the midst of its black and blasted heath, various little eminences are to be seen, displaying a lively verdure but too unequivocally expressive of the dreadful tale. These are so distinct and well defined, that the eye may almost, by their means, trace the position of the armies, or at least discover where the fight was most warmly contested. The way towards Inverness, otherwise an unimproved secondary road, is fringed with many such doleful memorials of the dead: and there the daisy and blue bell of Scotland have selected their abode, as if resolved to sentinel for ever the last resting place of their country's heroes. Modern curiosity has, in some cases, violated these sanctuaries, for the purpose of procuring some relic of the ill-fated warriors, to show as a wonder in the halls of the Sasenach; and the Gael, with nobler sentiment, have been till lately, in the habit of pilgrimizing to the spot, in order to translate the bones of their friends to consecrated ground, afar in their own dear glens of the west. But enough, and more than enough, yet remains, to show where Scotland fought her last battle, and the latest examples of her ancient chivalry fell to feed the eagle and redeem the desert.

As already stated, the English dragoons pursued the chase till within a mile of Inverness. The duke, leaving his infantry to dine upon the battle ground, soon after marched forward to take possession of the town. As he proceeded, a drummer came out with a letter from General Stapleton, soliciting quarter from his royal highness, in the name of himself and the French and Irish regiments under his charge. The duke commanded an officer—Sir Joseph Yorke—to alight from his horse, and with his pencil write a note to the general, assuring him of fair quarter and honourable treatment. He then sent forward Captain Campbell of Sempill's regiment, with his company of grenadiers, to take possession of the town.

As the duke entered Inverness, he learnt that the people were about to honour him by ringing their bells. But he commanded them to desist, upon pain of his displeasure. The first thing he did, was to ask for the keys of the Tolbooth, in which the English prisoners were confined. These being with some difficulty procured and brought to him, he went immediately to the prison, and released the men. As they descended the stairs he patted them on the back with an expression of kindness; and he immediately ordered them new clothes, food, and payment of their arrears, of all which they stood in the greatest need.

Several of the Jacobite ladies, who had attended their husbands during the campaign with so much fortitude, were found and made prisoners at Inverness. It is reported in one of the vulgar party productions of the time, that they had just drunk tea, and were preparing for a ball, at which the prince and his officers were to be entertained, after his expected victory, when the entrance of the fugitives informed them of the fatal reverse their friends had met with. The duke's soldiers found a considerable quantity of provision, which had been preparing for the poor Highlanders.

As at Holyroodhouse, Falkirk, and various other places, the duke took up his lodgings in the same house, the same room, and the same bed, which his precursor Charles had just vacated. It may be safely conjectured, that Lady Drummair, whose daughter, Lady MacIntosh, had here acted as the presiding divinity of Charles's household for two months before, would by no means relish the presence of her new tenant, but that he, on the contrary, would be esteemed as little better than a sonner,* where his predecessor had been a welcome and honoured guest. How the venerable gentleman endured his presence, or in what manner she entertained him, has not been recorded; but the comment which she afterwards passed upon this eventful period in the history of her household, is still a tradition in her family. "I've ha'en two kings' bairns living wi' me, in my time," she used to say; "and, to tell you the truth, I wish I may never ha'e another."

The royal army marched in the evening to Inverness, and there formed a camp. One of the duke's first duties at head quarters was, to select from the prisoners those who had deserted from the royal army, to subject them to a brief military trial, and then to consign them to the death of traitors. No fewer than thirty-six suffered this punishment, including a fellow named Dunbar, who was found dressed in a suit of laced clothes he had taken from Major Lockhart at the battle of Falkirk, and who, on that account, was exposed upon the gibbet for forty-eight hours.† This melancholy list is said to have

* A sonner, in Scottish phraseology, is one who exacts free quarters. Sorning was a practice formerly so prevalent in Scotland, that it was placed by the legislature (in the reign of James III.) upon the same scale of capital offences with open robbery, murder, &c.

† The prisoners taken after the battle of Culloden were enclosed, like sheep in a pen, within a square of soldiers. There they stood, bloody, ragged, and miserable, compelled to endure, without the possibility of resort, the insults of their captors, most of whom they had more than once caused to fly with terror, but who could not now help expressing their wonder that such a naked, famished looking crew should ever have had the assurance to face the king's army. Colonel Campbell, of the Argyll militia, overheard what was going on, and unable to bear the insult which seemed to be thrown upon his countrymen in general, came up and offered to bet with one of the officers of the guard, that he would find, among these despised mountaineers, one who, for the sake of his liberty, should beat at sword play any of the royal soldiers who chose to encounter him. The bet was accepted, and one accomplished swordsman selected for the combat. Colonel Campbell then intimated to the prisoners in Gaelic, that any one who should foil this fellow would have his liberty. A tall raw boned Highlander immediately offered himself, and, being provided with a sword, was brought out to confront the English soldier. On the word being given to commence the combat, he rushed against his opponent, and, without any preliminary play, at once cut him down. The English soldiers beheld the action with astonishment, and also included a youthful cadet of the noble family of Forbes, whose zeal in behalf of the house of Stuart, overcoming his sense of the military oath, had caused him to desert an English regiment, in which he was a cadet, for the purpose of joining Charles's standard. The death of this unfortunate person was attended by a circumstance, which, though horrible in the last degree, deserves to be recorded, as evincing the state of moral and political feeling in the British army of that time. While poor Forbes was yet suspended upon the gibbet, an English officer, unable to restrain his virtuous indignation at the delinquency of the culprit, and the better perhaps to show the loyal horror in which he held this "unnatural rebellion," ran up to the scarce inanimate corpse, and stabbed it with his sword; exclaiming at the same time, with an oath as profane as the act was inhuman, that "all his countrymen were traitors and rebels like himself!" A Scottish officer, who happened to be near the spot, immediately drew his sword, to revenge the insult thus thrown upon his country; and, a combat instantly commencing, all the other officers who knew the cause of the quarrel, joined in taking sides according to their respective countries. The soldiers, at the same time, of their own accord, beat to arms, and joined the ranks assumed by their respective officers. The Duke of Cumberland, learning how matters stood, hurried to the place, and arrived just as the two contending parties were about to make a general charge. His presence, of course, quelled the disturbance; but it was not till he had used considerable eloquence in soothing the injured feelings of the Scots, that they withdrew from a conflict to which they had been so ungenerously provoked.

The duke employed the few days immediately following the battle in securing and disposing of the spoil, which was very considerable. He had taken thirty pieces of cannon, two thousand three hundred and twenty firelocks, a hundred and ninety broadswords, thirty-seven barrels of powder, and twenty-two carts of ammunition. The soldiers were allowed a half crown for every musket, and a shilling for every broadsword, which they could bring into quarters; it being the anxious wish of government to keep as many arms as possible out of the hands of the natives. In order, moreover, to put a great public indignity upon the honour of the insurgents, the sum of sixteen guineas was allowed for each stand of their colours; and, fourteen of these melancholy emblems of departed glory being thus procured, they were, on the fourth of June, carried by a procession of chimney sweeps from the castle to the cross of Edinburgh, and there burnt by the hands of the common hangman, with many suitable marks of contempt.

The victory of Culloden was, indeed, very cheaply acquired by the British army. The whole amount of killed, wounded, and missing, was three hundred and ten, including few officers and but one man of any distinction. This last was Lord Robert Kerr, second son of the Marquis of Lothian, a captain of grenadiers in Barrell's regiment, a young man remarkable for his handsome person and great promise. Standing at the head of his company, when the Highlanders made the charge, he received the first man upon his spearhead, but was instantly slain with many wounds. Although the victory was mainly attributable to the cannon and musketry, some portions of the royal army behaved with a degree of courage highly honorable to them. There was scarcely an officer or soldier in Barrell's regiment, and that part of Monro's which was engaged, who did not kill one or two Highlanders with his spontoon or bayonet, before giving way to their irresistible violence. It cannot be mentioned with the same degree of applause, that some of Kingston's dragoons were known to have each cut down ten or twelve fugitives in the pursuit.

The intelligence of the battle of Culloden, so important in its nature and results, produced different effects upon the public mind, according to the sentiments of those by whom it was heard. The Jacobites received it as a total overthrow to their fond and long cherished hopes; while it excited in the partisans of government a transport of joy, too overpowering to admit of a thought upon the misery in which it involved so many of their countrymen. The news reaching Edinburgh during the night between Saturday and Sunday, and being announced to the ears of the slumbering inhabitants by discharges of cannon, many of the unhappy Jacobites were found next morning stretched upon their couches in a state of insensibility. Some of the ancient gentlewomen whose daily prayers for fifty years had included the restoration of the Stuarts, and whose wishes had been wound up during the progress of the insurrection to a state bordering upon insanity, never afterwards rose from the beds upon which the afflicting intelligence had found them, but continued, so long as they lived, shrouded from the light of day, and inaccessible to consolation. The misery of those who had friends, or kinsmen, or lovers, concerned in the dreadful event, was far more poignant; distracted as they were betwixt the fear that they were slain, or what was still more dreadful, that they survived as captives. To add to their grief, the loyal part of the community and the zealous presbyterians, now triumphant in their turn, took every opportunity of lacerating their feelings. They even dared not to inquire regarding the fate of those most dear to them, from the dread of persecution to themselves, or proscription—perhaps death to the ill-starred objects of their affection.

It appears from the well affected newspapers of the time, that there were public rejoicings for the victory, both in the capital and most of the burghs of Scotland. Even in the remote and sequestered town of Wigton, where the news was only received a week after, there was a very loyal bonfire, and a zealous church and state ringing of bells, together with a most cordial drinking of strong ale at the cross, in honour of the auspicious and never-enough-to-be-congratulated occasion. Addresses there were, moreover, devoting as much life and fortune to the service of government, as if produced six months before, would have been enough, and more than enough, to suppress twenty such rebellions.

The satisfaction which the king and the members of government felt in the "glorious event," though expressed with as much coolness as might be, was nevertheless excessively great. The defeat of Preston had roused them like a very rattling peal of thunder, and they had lived for the last six or eight months in a state of the utmost agitation and anxiety. On the morning that the news reached London, Mr. Pelham, the first lord of the treasury, was met by a Forfarshire member of parliament, exhibiting every mark of excessive joy. "His majesty's arms," cried the minister, "have been blessed with a complete victory over the rebels at a place called Culloden;" accentuating the last syllable. "I'm very sorry to hear you say so," was the Scotsman's reply. "How! Mr. —, do you say this to me?" "Yes, Mr. Pelham," was the Caledonian's cool reply. "It maunna be true—there's no sic a place in a' Scotland."

The estimation in which they held the duke's victory, was in some measure proved by the way they took to reward it. His income had hitherto been fifteen thousand a year, paid out of the civil list; but the house of commons now voted him an addition of twenty-five thousand, to arise out of the duties and revenues composing the Aggregate Fund.

Without detracting from the merits of the Duke of Cumberland, as a general, it is impossible to contemplate, without some degree of disgust, the fulsome adulation which was now poured out upon him by all persons in authority. He himself, notwithstanding the emotions of vanity, must have worn his extravagant honours with something like loathing; for it is said, that, when afterwards loaded with public odium on account of his rendition of the British army at Closterseven, he bitterly remarked, that he had formerly got praise where he did not deserve it, and now was blamed where he was not guilty. Such is ever the caprice of the public in regard to its servants, invariably deified if successful, and condemned without a hearing if unfortunate.

From all that can be gathered in the fugitive publications of the time, Duke William received fully as much public gratitude for ridding Britain of the poor Chevalier, as the great general of modern times received for overthrowing the mighty usurper of the continent. He was thanked by all the public bodies in the kingdom, from the houses of parliament down to the general assembly. He had twenty-five thousand a year added to his income; and, lest that should ever fail him, he got the privilege of citizenship from almost all the burghs in the kingdom of Scotland. Pieces of dress were also called after him, and his bluff visage was blazoned over innumerable public houses. Sermons were preached, orations made, and poems written in his praise: and he was universally hailed as the Heroic Deliverer of Britain. Perhaps the most ludicrous circumstance that arose from the spirit of the time, was, that the foundation-stone of the Duke of Argyle's house at Inverary, the laying of which had been postponed on account of the troubles, was now at last deposited, with the grateful inscription, intended no doubt for the instruction of the remotest posterity!—"Gulielmus, Cumbriae Dux, nobis haec otia fecit!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

FINAL SUPPRESSION OF THE INSURRECTION.

Whilst the warm blood bedews my veins,
And unimpaired remembrance reigns,
Resentment of my country's fate
Within my filial breast shall beat;
And, spite of her insulting foe,
My sympathies verse shall flow;
Mourn, hapless Caledonia, mourn,
Thy banished peace, thy laurels torn.

Smollett.

In the meantime, while the victorious party was enjoying the praise, and the honour, and all the other good things with which the world is so apt to load the prosperous man, Charles's hapless adherents retired, like the stricken deer, unpitied by the unhurt members of the herd, to mourn in the desert over their perished hopes and gloomy prospects. The flight was chiefly directed to the western parts of Inverness-shire, the native country of most of the insurgent clans; where the war had taken its earliest rise, and where it was destined to be finally quenched. This region is one of the most wild and inhospitable character, being little else than a tract of stupendous mountains, intersected by narrow valleys, lakes, and arms of the sea. To add to the distress of the fugitives, it had been in a great measure exhausted of provisions for some time before the battle; nor were its boundaries of such a nature as to permit the possibility of supplies from without. There now, therefore, seemed nothing wanting to complete the destruction of the insurgents, but that their retreat should be enclosed within a circle of soldiers, which, gradually narrowing, according to an ancient hunting practice, might at last concentrate them for one easy and decisive blow.

The fate of those who perished in the fight was preferable by far to that of the survivors—doomed as they were to every species of privation, agonised by the bitterness of reflections, and every day suffering, in the fear of death, more pain than the parting pang itself could have occasioned. The misery of the wounded was peculiarly great, though perhaps of shorter endurance. Many were afterwards found dead among the hills, at the distance of ten, fifteen, and even twenty miles from the field of battle; having apparently dragged their mutilated bodies so far towards their homes, over hill and dale, in the hope of procuring relief, but expired of hunger and pain long before reaching the object of their melancholy journey.

Among all the instances of misery which followed the defeat of Culloden, perhaps none was so truly great as that of Charles himself, who now entered upon a life of hazard and wretchedness, the details of which are hardly credible. When at last forced off the field, he fled with a large party of horse, comprising his chief counsellors and friends. His retreat was protected by the foot, who fled behind him. Having crossed the Nairn at the ford of Falie, about four miles from the battle-ground, he held a hurried council, at which it was determined that the men should rendezvous at Ruthven in Badenoch, and there await his orders, while he should in the mean time make a circuit through the country. Here, also, he is said to have sent off various gentlemen of his party upon different routes, in order to distract the enemy in case of a pursuit. Proceeding towards Gortuleg, the seat of a gentleman of the Fraser clan, and where he understood that Lord Lovat was now residing, he reached that place about sunset, along with Sheridan, Sullivan, O'Neal, Secretary Hay, and a few others whom he had chosen to retain about his person.

A girl who was then residing at Gortuleg, and who afterwards lived to a good old age, used to describe the unexpected appearance of Charles and his flying attendants. The wild and desolate vale on which she happened to gaze at the time with indolent composure, was at once so suddenly filled with horsemen riding furiously towards the house, that, impressed with the belief that they were fairies, who, according to the code of Highland superstition, were only visible between one twinkling of the eyelid and another, she strove to refrain from the vibration which she believed would occasion the strange and magnificent apparition to become invisible. To Lord Lovat, who had staked so much upon the Chevalier's success, it brought a certainty more dreadful than the presence of fairies, or even demons; telling him of proscription, death, and the ruin of his house and name. As Charles, whom he had never before seen, entered the door, the old man is said to have quite forgot the duty he owed to his prince, and to have gone distractedly about, calling upon those who were present to chop off his head, or otherwise anticipate the miserable fate to which he saw himself destined. Charles endeavoured to recall him to his senses, by many cheering expressions; saying, among other things, that "they had had two days of the elector's troops, and he did not doubt to have yet a third." Lovat was at length somewhat appeased, and began to enter into serious conversation with the fugitives, during which the prince's next motions were amply discussed. It was generally agreed that Gortuleg was too near the position of the king's troops to be a safe retreat; and Charles, therefore, having changed his dress, set out that night at ten o'clock for Invergarry, the seat of McDonnell of Glengarry.

Charles and his little party were seen, at two o'clock in the morning, riding rapidly past the ruins of Fort Augustus; and they arrived at Invergarry about two hours before daybreak. This ancient seat, which, now a blackened and fire-scathed ruin, stands upon the bank of one of the lochs forming the Caledonian Canal, was, on the present occasion, deserted of its tenants, and in a condition very ill calculated to support the hospitable character of a Highland mansion. Destitute at once of furniture and provisions, and attended by only a single domestic, however easily a party of natives might have accommodated themselves within its walls, it was particularly unfit to entertain a prince and an alien. This was the first day of Charles's wanderings; and its privations but too truly omened those of the succeeding five months.

The prince and his party were so much fatigued with their ride, which was one of little less than forty miles, that they gladly stretched themselves upon the floor in their clothes. They slept till mid-day, when Edward Burke, servant to Alexander MacLeod, having fortunately caught two salmon in the water of Gary, they had a better dinner than they expected, though the only drink they could procure was the pure element from which their meat had been taken. All the company here took leave of Charles, except Sullivan, O'Neal, and Edward Burke, who was left to be the prince's guide, and whose clothes his royal highness now assumed. This small party set out at two o'clock for Loch Arkraig, where they arrived about nine at night, and lodged in the house of Donald Cameron of Glenpean. Charles was so excessively fatigued, that he fell asleep as Edward Burke was unbuckling his spatterdash. Next morning, Friday the 18th, they held their route still farther westward, to Mewboil, a small village near the extremity of Lochiel's country, where they were well entertained. A considerable part of the following day was spent in waiting for intelligence of their friends, which not arriving, they at last set out, for fear of being discovered and taken. There being no longer any road, they were obliged to abandon their horses, and begin to walk on foot. They crossed over a range of lofty mountains, and came in the evening to a place called Oban, near the head of Loch Morar, one of the numerous arms of the sea which penetrate the west coast. Here they took up their lodging in a wretched little shieling or hovel, used for shearing sheep, near the corner of a wood.

Next day, Sunday the 20th of April, Charles and his three attendants crossed, with inconceivable pain and difficulty, another of those ranges of lofty and rugged hills, which, alternately with the lochs or arms of the sea, penetrate the country so regularly at this part of the West Highlands. Their lodging-place, this evening, was at Glenboisdale, in Arassig, a small village near the place where Charles had first landed. Here several fugitives joined the dejected little party.

After the route of the army at Culloden, the clans chiefly sought their own glens, or countries, as they were called, where they had property and relations to be protected; while the foreign troops surrendered as prisoners of war to the duke at Inverness, and the Lowlanders either rendezvoused at Badenoch, or wandered far and wide over the Highlands.* Thus the army was completely broken up; and there remained no hope, in the estimation of men of sense, that it would ever again unite in such force as successfully to make head against the enemy. The prince, under this conviction, despatched a message to the Badenoch party, within two days after the battle, thanking them for their zeal in his service, but desiring them to do what they thought was best for their own preservation, till a more favourable opportunity for action presented itself. The party, which amounted to little above a thousand men, accordingly dispersed; and there was not then, any where, three hundred men together in arms against the state.

The prince received, at Glenboisdale, a message from Lord George Murray, entreating that he would not leave the country, as Lord George had heard that he intended. Clanranald, who here joined the party, along with Mr. Lockhart, younger of Carnwath, Mr. Aeneas MacDonald the banker, and some others, offered to fit up a few summer sheelings in various parts of his country, for his accommodation and shift of quarters, as occasion should require, till he (Clanranald), and some other chosen persons, should take a trip to the Isles, and look out for a vessel to convey his royal highness to France. But Charles was overpersuaded by his fears, and by the advice of Sullivan; and firmly announced his resolution to seek a securer shelter in the Isles.

The prince spent four days in Arasaig, awaiting the arrival of one Donald MacLeod, who had been required to come from the Isle of Skye, in order to act as his guide to the Isles. Before Donald arrived, an alarm was one day given that some of the enemy were at hand, and the whole party immediately dispersed, each to seek shelter where best he might, among the neighbouring hills and woods. Charles was wandering alone through a forest, pondering his altered fortunes and his present distress, when, in the midst of his care, he observed an aged Highlander approaching. He asked the man if he were Donald MacLeod of Gualtergill, in the Isle of Skye. The Highlander answered in the affirmative; when the prince rejoined, "Then I am he who sent for you; you see the distress I am in; I throw myself into your bosom; do with me what you like; your prince resigns himself entirely into your hands." The old man never could repeat this moving address without shedding a flood of tears.

In the evening of the 24th, Charles, along with Sullivan, O'Neal, Burke, and other seven persons, set sail in an open eight-oared boat, from Lechnanuaigh, the bay where he first landed. Donald MacLeod, acting as pilot, sat at the stern, with Charles betwixt his knees. This aged person, being an experienced mariner, was certain, from the appearance of the sky, that a storm was about to ensue, and entreated the prince to defer his voyage till next day. But Charles insisted upon immediately leaving the continent where he apprehended so much danger. In the boat there were four pecks of oatmeal, and a pot in which they could boil meat when they landed.

As old MacLeod had foretold, they had scarcely got fairly out to sea when a storm arose. The wind blew a tempest; the waves of the Atlantic rose with tumultuous fury; and it was altogether a night surpassing in danger all that MacLeod, an experienced boatman, had ever before seen upon that wild sea. To add to their distress, the rain poured down in torrents, and they had neither pump nor compass. In the darkness of the night, none of the crew knew where they were, and serious apprehensions were entertained lest the boat should either founder, or be driven upon Skye, where the person of the prince

Mr. Carnegie of Balnamoon, an Angus gentleman, who had been engaged on the prince's side at the battle of Culloden, used to tell in after life, that, although he made considerable haste in returning home from the battle field, he was thirty-six hours later than a fellow insurgent and countryman, of the name of Peter Logie, who, to retard his motions, had a club foot, and moreover was a very little and weak looking man. This body, as Balnamoon used to call him, was afterwards taken up and questioned by the king's soldiers, regarding his share in the Rebellion. Peter was so conscientious a Jacobite, that he would not prevaricate even to save his life; and he thought proper to give a candid affirmation to all the three successive questions, which demanded, if he had been at Preston—at Falkirk—and at Culloden. But, when at length asked, what station he held in the rebel army—the question being accompanied by a glance at his club-foot—he gave an answer very far from the truth, though sufficiently expressive of wounded vanity. "I had the honour," said Peter, "to be his royal highness's dancing master."

would at once become a prey to the militia, who were roaming about that island in great numbers. At length, a period was put at once to their danger from the sea, and their apprehensions from the militia, by the approach of daylight, which showed them to be upon the coast of that remote archipelago, already mentioned by the descriptive epithet of Long Island, the storm having carried the boat upwards of an hundred miles in nine or ten hours. They landed at Rossinish Point, the north-east corner of the Island of Benbecula, and, having hauled their boat upon dry land, prepared a humble entertainment with meal and the flesh of a cow, which they had seized and killed.

In order to give the reader a proper idea of the danger which the prince now ran, it is necessary to remind him, that the reward of thirty thousand pounds, which had been offered by the British government for his apprehension, at the beginning of the campaign, still hung over his head, and indeed was now more ostentatiously offered than ever. The magnitude of the sum was such as seemed calculated to overcome every scruple on the part of his friends; and it was daily expected, throughout the whole country, that he would be given up by one or other of those to whom he intrusted his person. That no means for the accomplishment of such an end might be omitted, parties of soldiers were sent out in every direction, each more eager than another to secure the splendid prize. The duke's instruction to those blood-hounds were invariably expressed in the simple words, "No prisoners, gentlemen—you understand me." Among all who were employed in this duty, no man seems to have been so eager as the leader of the Campbells, now raised to the rank of general. On a report arising that the Chevalier had taken refuge in St. Kilda, that active person instantly repaired to the island with a large fleet. St. Kilda, "placed far amidst the melancholy main," is the remotest of all the Western Islands, and is peopled by only a few aboriginal families, who subsist chiefly on fish and sea-fowl, paying a rent to the Laird of MacLeod, whose factor, sent once a year to collect the same, was then the only visitor whom the lonely St. Kildans ever saw. On Campbell's fleet coming within sight, the people fled in terror to caves and the tops of mountains; and it was not without considerable difficulty that the general could procure a hearing amongst them. His men asked those whom they found, "what had become of the Pretender?" expecting to discover their guilt by the confusion of their manners, or perhaps to get a candid confession. But the only answer they could get from the simple islanders, was "that they had never heard of such a person." All that they could tell about the late troubles, was, that they heard a report, probably communicated by some stray fishermen, that their laird (MacLeod) had been at war with a woman a great way abroad, and that he had got the better of her. The general returned on board, to retrace his long disagreeable voyage, with feelings which need not be described, but in which few of our readers will be disposed to sympathise with him.

Meanwhile, the Duke of Cumberland took measures for disarming the insurgent clans, and for inflicting that vengeance upon their country, which the atrocity of their late "wicked and unnatural attempt" seemed to demand. The Earl of Loudoun, the Laird of MacLeod, and Sir Alexander MacDonald, with seventeen hundred militia, and General Campbell, with his eight hundred Argyle men, were marched into Lochabar; six hundred Grants were sent into the Fraser's country; and the Monroes, Mackays, and Sutherlands were despatched to Ross-shire: to effect these desirable objects. Lord Fortrose, son of the Earl of Seaforth, raised the Mackenzies, to guard the passages to the Isles; orders were given along the coast to prevent any suspicious persons from making their escape by sea; Cobham's and Lord Mark Kerr's dragoons were planted to guard the east coast; bodies of local militia were placed at all the passes out of the Highlands, and even at the fords of the Frew and the ferries across the Frith of Forth; in order to insure the ultimate and leisurely capture of all the unfortunate insurgents.

About a month after the battle of Culloden, when every preparation had been made, the duke set out from Inverness upon a tour of vengeance. He had previously issued a proclamation, requiring the rebels to deliver up their arms, and submit to the king's mercy, and was somewhat exasperated to find that very few availed themselves of so generous a proposal. Those, therefore, who would not take the chance of civil, he now determined to visit, if possible, with the certainty of military execution. He went to Fort Augustus, with Kingston's horse and eleven battalions on foot, for whose accommodation a summer camp was established. A house was erected of turf, and provided with windows and furniture, for his own use. There, in the midst of the rebel country, with all his troops extending in parties around him, he might be compared to a huge blue-bottle spider, rising in the centre of his wide-spread meshes.

Several of the clans had, in the meantime, entered into a bond of mutual defence, for the desperate purpose of resisting the power which they saw was about to close upon and destroy them. At the head of this association, were the chiefs of Lochiel, Glengary, Clanranald, Stewarts of Appin, Keppoch, Barisdale and MacInnon, each of whom was to assemble his men, and bring as many other leaders as he could advertise or persuade into the measure, on the 15th of May. When the day of meeting came, few were found at the place of rendezvous, on account of the paramount necessity, under which each clan lay, of defending its own country. They expected assistance from France, but none arrived in time. The duke therefore found them still in open rebellion, and yet incapable of resistance.

A period of rapine and massacre now ensued, upon whose details we would willingly shut our eyes, but which the duty of an historian compels us, however reluctantly, to record. The general outline of the devastation, as given in the heartless publications of the day, was simply, that strong parties of soldiers, being despatched into the countries of the various insurgent chiefs, burnt all the houses, carried off all the cattle, and every male inhabitant who fled at their approach. But the filling up of this dreadful picture comprises a thousand horrors. By the conflagration of the houses, innumerable innocent persons, including the young, the sickly, and the aged, were rendered homeless; by the abstraction of the cattle, the same persons were deprived of their daily food; by the massacre of the fugitives, many of whom were innocent of even the imaginary crime imputed to them, the whole population was left to lament over the bloody corpses of their kindred. Under circumstances of such unparalleled distress, the widows and orphans of the slain had either to resign themselves to a slow and lingering death, or to anticipate it by perishing of fatigue, among the pathless hills, in wandering towards the distant countries which the brand of the destroyer had not reached. Some followed the parties which drove their cattle towards Fort Augustus, with the miserable hope of getting back a few for their subsistence by working upon the pity of the oppressors. But they had only the mortification of seeing their property sold, generally at trifling prices, to the mercenary drovers of the south. It might have been expected that at this place, where there was a sort of public market for the time, the wretched victims would have been able to subsist at least upon charity. Instead of that mitigated fate, they were reduced to such extremities of hunger, as often to approach the shambles, where the soldiers killed cattle for their own use, and with the humblest air and many entreaties, beg permission to lick up the blood and soil of the slaughtered beeves!

Before the 10th of June, the task of desolation was complete throughout all the western parts of Lowland shire; and the curse which had been denounced upon Scotland, by the religious enthusiasts of the preceding century, was at length so entirely fulfilled in this wretched region, that it would have been literally possible to travel for days through the depopulated glens, without seeing a chimney smoke, or hearing a rock crow.

It is generally allowed that the duke himself, though the instigator of these cruelties, did not show so much open or active cruelty as some of the more immediate instruments of the royal vengeance. General Hawley was one of the most remorseless of all the commanding officers; apparently thinking no extent of cruelty a sufficient compensation for his loss of honour at Falkirk. The names of Lieutenant-colonel Howard, Captain Canline Scott, and Major Lockhart, are also to be handed down to everlasting execration, as among the blood-thirstiest of all these human wolves. The last, in particular, did not even respect the protections which Lord Loudoun had extended (by virtue of a commission from the duke), to those who had taken an early opportunity of submitting to him; but used only to observe to the unhappy individuals who expected to be saved on that account, as he ordered them to execution and their houses to the flames, that, though they were to show him a protection from Heaven, it should not prevent him from doing his duty!

It reflects great credit upon the Highlanders, that, in the midst of all these calamities, they displayed no disposition to take mean or insidious modes of avenging themselves, though, with arms in their hands, and acquainted as the were with the country, they might have often done so both easily and securely. Only one soldier is said to have perished by the hand of an assassin, during the whole of the frightful campaign. The circumstance was to the triumphant party a matter of great gratulation, affording them a sort of excuse for further cruelties; while, by the thinking part of the Jacobites, it was regarded with horror and bitterness of spirit. A domestic belonging to the house of Glengary, on reaching his home after a short expedition, found that, during his absence, his property had been destroyed, his wife violated, and his home rendered desolate. In the bitterness of the moment, he vowed deadly revenge. Learning that the officer who had commanded the spoliators, and who had been the ravisher of his wife, rode upon a white horse, he rushed abroad with his musket, determined never to rest till he had accomplished his vow. After wandering several weeks, without discovering the villain, he one day observed an officer approaching at the head of a party, mounted upon the white horse he had heard described. This was not the real perpetrator of his wrongs, but a very worthy man, Major Monro of Culcairn, a younger brother of the late Sir Robert Monro of Foulis, who had, unfortunately for himself, borrowed the animal on which he rode. The infuriated Highlander took aim from behind some craggy banks which overlooked the road, and shot the major dead. He then fled through the rugged country, and was soon beyond pursuit. On afterwards learning that he had killed an innocent man, he burst into tears, and renounced the vow which had bound him to vengeance. Doddridge and various other writers narrate the circumstance of Culcairn's assassination, but it is only now for the first time justified, by a full disclosure of the facts which led to it.

Whilst the natives and the fugitive princes were enjoying every species of hardship, Duke William and his minions at Fort Augustus spent their time in a ceaseless round of festivity. Enriched by the sale of their spoils, the soldiers could purchase all the luxuries which the Lowlands could supply, or which could be conveniently transported over the Grampians; and for several weeks their camp exhibited all the coarse and obstreperous revelries of an English fair. It was common, while thousands were starving around them, to hear these miscreants talking, over their feasts, of the languor and tedium of their campaign—looking with affected horror on the sublime scenery around them—and execrating the rebels for bringing them into such a wilderness. In order to amuse them, the duke instituted races, which were run by the trulls of the camp, with circumstances of indecency which forbid description. General Hawley also ran a race with the infamous Howard, and probably rendered a proficient in that exercise by his practice at Falkirk, gained it by four inches.

"At this time," says the volunteer Ray, "most of the soldiers had horses, which they bought and sold with me another at a low price, and on which they were constantly riding about, to the neglect of their duty, which made it necessary to publish an order, that, unless immediately parted with, the animals should be shot. I saw a soldier riding on one of these horses, when a comrade passing by asked him, 'Tom, what hast thou given for the gallop?' 'Tom answered, 'Half a crown.' 'Too dear by half,' replied the other; 'I saw a better bought for eighteen pence.' Notwithstanding this lowness of price," continues Ray, "the vast quantities of cattle, such as oxen, horses, sheep, and goats, taken from the rebels, and bought up, in the hump, by the jockies and men of Yorkshire, and Galloway, came to a great deal of money—all of which was divided as booty among the men who had brought them in. These, being sent out in search of the pretender, frequently came to the aid of rebels that had left them, refusing to be reduced to obedience, which our soldiers commonly plundered and burnt, so that many of them grew rich by their share of spoil."

The manners of the British soldiery at this time have been already described as extremely dissolute; but to immorality there was now added a degree of savage ferocity, which would have actually disgraced the brigands of Italy. Not content with laying waste the country of the active insurgents, they extended their ravages, before the end of the season, over peaceful districts, to the very gates of the capital; and for some time Scotland might be said to have been treated throughout its whole bounds as a conquered country, subjected to the domination of military law. The voice of Lord Viscount Forbes was occasionally heard amidst these ravages, like that of Pity described in the allegory as reproaching in some barbarous scene; but, on this amiable old man remonstrating with the duke, by a representation that his soldiers were breaking the laws of the land, his royal highness is said to have answered with scorn, "The laws, my lord! By G—, I'll make a brigade give laws." No form of trial was adopted with the insurgents, even within a few miles of the seat of the Court of Session; nor did the soldiers ever appeal to the neighbouring justices for warrants, when about to plunder their houses. The lawful creditors of unfortunate individuals were, in innumerable instances, mortified at seeing a lawless band seize the property to which they looked for payment, and unceremoniously expose it to public rous for their own behalf. Such transactions often took place on Sundays, to the general scandal of the nation.

The license of the soldiery extended to the most tranquil districts of the country, and was often exercised upon people of unquestionable innocence. A party of dragoons, hurrying through Nithsdale in search of some wandering insurgents, drew up, hungry and fatigued, at the door of a lonely widow, and demanded refreshment. Her son, a lad of sixteen, dressed them up some homely dish, and the good woman brought new milk, which she told them was all her stock. One of the party inquired, with seeming kindness, how she lived—"Indeed," quoth she, "the cow and the garden, wi' God's blessing, is a' my mailen (farm)." He rose, and with his sabre killed the cow, and destroyed the garden. The poor woman, thus rendered destitute, soon died of a broken heart; and her disconsolate son wandered away beyond the inquiry of friends or the search of compassion. Afterwards, in the Seven-years' War, when the British army had gained a great and signal victory, the soldiery were making merry with wine, and recounting their exploits, when a dragoon cried out, "I once starved a Scotch witch in Nithsdale. I killed her cow and destroyed her greens; but," added he, "she could live, for all that, on her God, as she said." "And don't you rue it?" cried a young soldier, starting up, "don't you rue it?" "Rue what?" said the miscreant, "rue aught like that!" "Then, by h—," cried the youth, unsheathing his sword, "that woman was my mother—draw, you brutal villain, draw!" They fought; the youth passed his sword twice through the dragoon's body; and, while he turned him over in the throes of death, exclaimed, "Had you rued it, you should have been only punished by your God!"

At length, a public outrage of a peculiarly heinous nature became the means of terminating this reign of terror. A citizen of Stirling, having given offence to an officer in the garrison by some uncivil expression uttered in the course of business, was seized by the ruffians, stripped naked on the public street, bound upon a lamp-post, and there flogged in military fashion, notwithstanding the interference of the civil authorities, and the general horror of the people. The news of this transaction, which happened six months after the total suppression of "the rebellion," spread over all Scotland, and had nearly occasioned a new insurrection. The state-officers of the country, who had hitherto meekly submitted to the domination of the soldiery, then at last saw it necessary to remonstrate against a system which promised so much mischief; and on their representation, farther violence was prohibited by the express command of government.

Besides the measures already described as having been taken for the capture of the Chevalier and his friends, others were adopted of a nature which showed the resolution of government to attain that object. The general assembly of the church, about the end of May, was required to command all the placod clergymen throughout the country, to read a proclamation from their pulpits, in which the duke ordered every minister and every loyal subject to exert themselves in discovering and seizing the rebels; and the general assembly complied with the requisition, contrary to the republican independence affected by the Scottish church, than to the dictates of the gospel which they professed to preach. Many of the individual clergymen, with a better spirit, refused to read this paper, or left it to be read by their preceptors; in consequence of which the duke sent another order to the church, commanding every minister to give in a list of the rebels belonging to his parish. With this last still fewer complied; the clergymen of Edinburgh ranking among the recusants; and the duke, having then used individual applications and even personal entreaties in vain, troubled them with no more.

It is not observable, in any authentic documents, that those who gave food or shelter to the fugitives, were punished with death; but it is at least certain, that a proclamation was read in the churches of Perth and its vicinity, by order of the Duke of Cumberland, threatening with that punishment all who concealed them, or even their arms. Rewards were also offered in Ireland and the Isle of Man, for the apprehension of any who might land in those territories; and the British ministers at foreign courts in alliance with his majesty, were ordered to secure all who might take refuge there. No means, in short, were omitted, which might tend to the grand object of exterminating these unhappy victims of state resentment.

The consequence was, that, besides the numbers who perished in the course of what the soldiers termed rebel-hunting, hundreds were immured in the jails of the south and the holds of the British cruisers. The chief men of distinction who fell into the hands of government, besides the Earl of Croharty and Lord MacLeod, who had been taken before Culloden, were the Earl of Kilmarnock, Lords Lovat and Balmerino, the Marquis of Tullibardine, and Secretary Murray. Lord Kilmarnock's capture was attended by circumstances peculiarly affecting. During the confusion of the flight from Culloden, being half-blinded by smoke and snow, he mistook a party of dragoons for FitzJames's horses, and was accordingly taken. He was soon after led along the lines of the British infantry, in which his son, then a very young man, held the commission of an ensign. The earl had lost his hat in the strife, and his long hair was flying in disorder around his head and over his face. The soldiers stood mute in their lines, beholding the unfortunate nobleman. Among the rest stood Lord Boyd, compelled by his situation to witness, without the power of alleviating, the humiliation of his father. When the earl came past the place where his son stood, the youth, unable to bear any longer that his father's head should be exposed to the storm, stepped out of the ranks, without regard to discipline, and, taking off his hat, placed it over his father's disordered and wind-beaten locks. He then returned to his place, without having uttered a word, while scarcely an eye that saw his filial affection, but what confessed its merit by a tear.

Lord Lovat, after parting with Charles, had sought refuge in the wildest parts of Inverness-shire, along with a considerable number of attendants, who carried him upon a sort of litter, with all the devotion of clansmen to their chief. His lordship was at length taken, about the beginning of June. He was found wrapped in a blanket, and deposited in the hollow of an old tree which grew upon a little isle in the centre of a lake; to which place of concealment he had retired for shelter. On the search becoming very close, Balmerino voluntarily resigned himself, after having only endured the life of a fugitive for two days. Tullibardine fell into the hands of a private gentleman, the commander of a troop of native militia, at one of the passes out of Dunbartonshire; and Secretary Murray, after escaping from the Highlands, was taken in the house of his brother-in-law, Mr. Hunter of Polmood, Peeblesshire. They were all despatched, under safe custody, to London.

CHAPTER XXX.

CHARLES'S WANDERINGS—THE LONG ISLAND.

He might put on a hat, a muffler, and a kerchief, and so escape. Shakespeare.

Charles was left in the remote and desolate island of Benbecula, where he had arrived after a night voyage of no ordinary danger. His accommodations in this place were of the humblest description. A cow-house, destitute of a door, was his palace; his couch of state was formed of filthy straw and a sail-cloth; and the regal banquet, composed of oat-meal and boiled flesh, was served up in the homely pot in which it had been prepared. The storm continued for fourteen hours; and it was not till the third day after, (Tuesday, the 29th of April,) that he could leave the island. They set sail for Stornoway, the chief port in the Isle of Lewis, where Donald MacLeod entertained hopes of procuring a vessel to convey the prince to France. A storm, however, coming on, as on the former occasion, their little vessel was driven in upon the small Isle of Glass, about forty miles northward of Benbecula, and fully as far distant from Stornoway. They disembarked about two hours before daybreak, and, finding the inhabitants engaged in the hostile interest under the Laird of MacLeod, were obliged to assume the character of merchantmen who had been shipwrecked in a voyage to Orkney; Sullivan and the prince calling themselves Sinclair, as father and son; the rest of the crew taking other names. They were entertained here by Donald Campbell, a farmer; who was so kind as to lend his own boat to Donald MacLeod, that he might go to Stornoway, in order to hire a vessel for the prince's service. Donald set out next day, leaving the prince in Campbell's house.

A message came from the faithful MacLeod on the 3d of May, intimating his having succeeded in his object, and requesting the prince immediately to set forward. Another boat, therefore, being manned, Charles set sail next day for Stornoway. The wind proving contrary, he was obliged to land in Loch Seaforth, at the distance of thirty miles from Stornoway. All this way he had to walk on foot over a pathless moor, which, in addition to all other disadvantages, was extremely wet. It was fortunate, however, that he did not immediately reach his destined port, as the people there, apprised of his approach by a zealous presbyterian clergyman of the Isle of Uist, had risen in arms against him, their imaginations possessed by an idea, that he would burn their town, carry off their cattle, and force a vessel into his service. Being misled by the ignorance of their guide, the disconsolate little party did not get near Stornoway till the 5th at noon; when, stopping at the Point of Arinish, about half a mile from town, they sent forward their guide to Donald MacLeod, imploring him to bring them out some refreshment. Donald soon came with provisions, and took them to the house of Mrs. MacKenzie of Kildun, where the prince went to sleep. Returning to Stornoway, Donald was confounded to observe the people all rising in the commotion alluded to. He exerted his eloquence, to show them the absurdity of their fears, representing the inability of the prince with so small a band to do them the least injury, and finally threatening that, if they should hurt but a hair of his head, it would be amply and fearfully revenged upon them, in this their lonely situation, by his royal highness's foreign friends. By working upon their pity, alternately, and their fears, he succeeded in pacifying them; and all they at last desired was, that he should leave their country. Donald requested to have a pilot; but nobody could be persuaded to perform that service. He then returned to the house in which the prince was reposing, and informed him of the disagreeable aspect of his affairs. Some proposed to fly instantly to the moors; but Charles resolved to stand his ground, lest such a measure should encourage his enemies to pursue. They soon after learned, that the boat, in which they came to Lewis, had been taken out to sea by two of the crew, while the other two had fled to the country, from fear of the people of Stornoway. They were, therefore, obliged to spend the afternoon, in a state of painful alarm, at Mrs. MacKenzie's house.

The prince, Sullivan, and O'Neal, had at this time only six shirts amongst them. They killed a cow during their residence at Kildun; for which the lady refused to take payment, till compelled by his royal highness. They also procured two pecks of meal, with plenty of brandy and sugar. Edward Burke acted as cook, though the prince occasionally interfered with his duties, and, on the present occasion, prepared with his own hands a cake of oat-meal, mixed with the brains of the cow. With these provisions, the whole party set sail next morning in the boat, which had returned ashore during the night. The prince wished to go to Bollein in Kintail; but the men refused, on account of the length of the voyage. Soon after, four large vessels appearing at a distance, they put into the small desert Isle of Eilurn or Ifurt, near Harris, a little way north of Glass, where they had been a few days before.

The island was inhabited by only a few fishermen, all of whom fled to the interior at the approach of the boat, which they believed to be sent with a press-gang from the vessels within sight. They left their fish in large quantities drying upon the shore, to the great satisfaction of the wanderers, who made a hearty meal upon it. The prince was going to lay down money upon the place where they got the fish, but the ingenious Donald prevented him, by representing the necessity of acting up to their supposed character of a press-gang; adding, according to the report of Dugald Graham—

"Is it not the man of war's men's way,
To take all things, but nought to pay?"

Charles yielded to the suggestions of his sagacious counsellor, though not without violence to his conscience. His lodging here was a miserable hovel, the roof of which was so imperfect, that it had to be covered with a sail-cloth. They lay upon the floor, keeping watch by turns.

After a residence of four days upon this little island, the party once more set sail, and, cruising along the shores of the Long Island, touched at Glass (where they had been before,) with the intention of paying Donald Campbell for the hire of his boat. Before they had got time to land, four men came up, and it was thought necessary to send Edward Burke ashore to confer with them, before the prince should hazard his person on the island. These fellows manifesting a desire of seizing the boat, Burke, to escape their clutches, was under the necessity of hastily jumping back into it, and pushing off from the shore. On account of the calm, they had to row all night, although excessively faint for want of food. About daybreak, they hoisted their sail to catch the wind, which then began to rise.

Not having any fresh water, they were obliged, during this miserable day, to subsist on meal stirred into brine. Charles himself is said to have partaken this nauseous food with some degree of satisfaction, observing that, if ever he mounted a throne, he should not fail to remember "those who dined with him to-day." It ought to be mentioned, that they fortunately were able to qualify the salt water dramnock, as it was called, with a dram of brandy.

Charles's route having been discovered by his enemies, the Long Island was now invested by a great number of English war-vessels, whilst the land was traversed by nearly two thousand militia; so that it seemed scarcely possible he should escape. He was actually chased for three leagues by an English ship, under the command of a Captain Fergusson; but escaped among the rocks at the Point of Roundil, in the Harris. Soon after, on stealing out to pursue his course, the boat was espied and pursued by another ship; and it was with the greatest difficulty the crew got ashore upon Benbecula. But Providence seemed to guard him in all dangers; for scarcely had he landed, when a storm arose, and blew his pursuers off the coast. Charles, elated at the double escape he had made, could not help exclaiming to his companions, that he believed he was not designed to die by either weapon or water.

Soon after landing upon Benbecula, one of the boatmen began to search among the rocks for shell-fish, and had the good fortune to catch a crab, which he held up to the prince with a joyful exclamation. Charles instantly took a pail or bucket, which they carried with them, and ran to receive the fish from the man's hands. They were fortunately soon able to fill this vessel with crabs; and they then directed their steps to a hut about two miles inland, Charles insisting upon carrying the bucket. On reaching the hotel, it was found to be one of the very meanest and most primitive description; the door being so low, that they were obliged to enter upon their hands and knees. Resolving here to remain for some time, Charles ordered his faithful servant Burke to improve the hovel by lowering the threshold. He also sent a message to the old Laird of Clanranald, the father of his youthful adherent, acquainting him of his arrival, and of his present hapless condition.

Clanranald, who had lived in the Long Island during the whole progress of the war, came immediately, bringing with him some Spanish wines, provisions, shoes, and stockings. He found the youth who had recently agitated Britain in so extraordinary a manner, and whose pretensions to a throne he considered indubitable, reclining in a hovel little larger than an English hog-stye, and a thousand times more filthy; his face haggard with disease, hunger, and exposure to the weather; and his shirt, to use the expressive language of Dougal Graham, as dingy as a dishcloth. He procured him six good shirts from Lady Clanranald, with a supply of every other convenience which was attainable; and after spending a day or two in the hut, it was determined that he should remove to a more sequestered and secure place of hiding, near the centre of South Uist.

Before removing, the prince despatched Donald MacLeod to the Mainland, with letters to Lochiel and Secretary Murray, desiring to know the state of affairs in the country, and requesting from the secretary a supply of cash for the purchase of provisions. On making application to Murray, whom he found with Lochiel near the head of Loch Arkai, Donald was informed that "he had only sixty louis-d'ors for the supply of his own necessities, and could not spare any for the use of his royal highness." The faithful messenger, having received letters from both gentlemen, and purchased two ankers of brandy at a guinea each, returned to the Long Island, where he arrived after an absence of eighteen days.

When Donald returned, he found the prince in a better hut than that in which he had left him; having two cow-hides stretched out upon four sticks, as an awning to cover him when asleep. His habitation was called the Forest-house of Glencoradale, being situated in a lonely and secluded vale, with a convenient access either to the hills or the sea, in case of a visit from the enemy. South Uist is remarkable above all the Hebrides for abundance of game, and Charles had here amused himself with field sports. He showed himself remarkably expert in shooting fowl upon the wing.* Sometimes he also went out in a boat upon the creek near his residence; and, with hand-lines, caught a species of fish called Lythr. Most of his faithful boatmen still remained with him, and he was provided by Clanranald with a dozen of stout gillies to act as watchmen and couriers. The old gentleman, as well as his brother Boisdale, often attended him, to cheer his solitude and administer to his comfort.

After having spent several weeks in this fashion at Glencoradale, Charles was at last obliged to resume his former skulking mode of life, on learning that the myrmidons of government, whose vessels cruised every where around, had now resolved to sweep over the whole of the Long Island from end to end, for the purpose of enclosing him in their toils. "It is impossible," says one who attended him, "to express the consternation which this intelligence occasioned among the prince's attendants. The island invested by war-vessels, traversed by hundreds of soldiers, every ferry guarded, and no person permitted to leave the coast without a passport—escape seemed to be altogether impracticable. His usual good fortune, however, attended him; and, by the activity and vigilance of the people of the island, all of whom knew who and what he was, and took every means to assist him, he at length evaded all the perils that environed him.

It was when thus hard pressed in South Uist, that Charles became indebted for his immediate preservation to Miss Flora MacDonald, to whom which, according to the prediction of Dr. Johnson, will live in history, and which no historian, it may be added, will ever mention without profound respect. This lady, the daughter of MacDonald of Milton, in the island of South Uist, and therefore a gentlewoman by birth, was then in the prime of life, possessed of an attractive person, and endowed with the invaluable accomplishments of good sense, sprightliness, and humanity. Her father having died during her infancy, her mother was married to MacDonald of Armadale, in the Isle of Skye, who was at the head of one of the corps of militia now patrolling South Uist. She was generally an inmate in the family of her brother, the proprietor of Milton; but, at present, she resided, on a visit, at Ormaclade, the house of Clanranald, to whose family she was nearly related. O'Neal being employed to ask her good services for the prince, she expressed an earnest desire at least to see that celebrated personage; and was accordingly brought to an interview with his royal highness. She found him emaciated with bad health, though possessed of a wonderful degree of good humour and cheerfulness; and, unable to resist the influence of his presence, she at once agreed to do every thing in her power for his service.

When the project for his escape had been settled, Miss MacDonald repaired to her step-father, and demanded a passport for herself, a man-servant, and her maid, which she entitled Betty Burke; professing to be bound to Skye, on a visit to her mother. Captain MacDonald, unsuspecting of his step-daughter's design, granted the passport without demur, and even, at Miss Flora's suggestion, recommended Betty Burke to his wife as an excellent spinner of flax, and a good servant. She returned to the prince, who now lay by himself in a hut upon the shore, about a mile from the house of Ormaclade. She was accompanied by the Lady Clanranald and some other attendants, who carried a female dog for the prince.

On entering the hut, they found his royal highness engaged in roasting the heart and liver of a sheep upon a wooden spit; a sight at which some of the party could not help shedding tears. Charles, always the least concerned at his distressing circumstances, though even in his lowest humiliation, compromising the aim of his lofty pretensions, jocularly observed, that it would be well, perhaps, for all kings if they had to come through such a fiery ordeal as he was now enduring. They sat after sat down to dinner, Miss MacDonald on his right hand and Lady Clanranald on his left. A small study

* During his residence at this place, he one day shot a deer, which Edward Burke carried home. "While some collops of the venison were preparing, a beggar came in, and, without question or ceremony, thrust his hand amongst the meat. E. B., being very angry, gave him a smart stroke with the back of his hand; at which the prince said, 'Oh, man, thou don't remember the scripture, which commands to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. You ought rather to give him meat than a stripe. See that you put clothes on him—for which I shall pay.' This was presently done, and the prince added, 'I would not bear to see a Christian perish for want of food and raiment, had I the power to assist them.'" had been previously made ready, and was now floating near the shore.

The party was soon after informed by a messenger, that General Campbell, with a great party of soldiers, had arrived at Orinacade, in quest of Charles. Lady Clanranald judged it proper to go home, to amuse them. The commanding officer examined her very strictly; but she readily excused herself, by the pretext that she had been visiting a sick child. She was afterwards taken into custody, along with her husband; and both paid for their kindness to the prince by a long confinement at London.

Soon after she had left the prince, he and his company were dreadfully alarmed by seeing four wherries, full of armed men, sailing along close by the shore. They instantly extinguished a fire of heath and sticks which they had lighted to warm themselves, and sought concealment behind the rocks of the beach. The boats sailed past within musket-shot, without the sailors having perceived them.

In was on the evening of Friday, the 28th of June, that Charles set sail from the Long Island, where, during the last two months, he had encountered so many risks. He was dressed in attire suitable to his character as an Irish serving-girl—namely, a coarse printed gown, a light-coloured quilted petticoat, and a mantle of dun samblet, made in the Irish fashion, with a hood. His circumstances had rendered it necessary, some time before, that he should part with his faithful friends, Sullivan, O'Neal, Edward Burke, and Donald MacLeod; and, when he now embarked for Skye, he was only accompanied by Miss MacDonald, and a person named Neil MacEachan, neither of whom he had ever seen a week before. It is worthy of remark, that the last-mentioned person, who passed for Miss MacDonald's servant, but who was in reality a sort of preceptor in the family of Clanranald, was the father of Marshal MacDonald, Duke of Tarentum, so much distinguished for military achievement and honourable bearing during the wars of Bonaparte.

Burke, after being nearly starved to death in the course of a long concealment in a cave in South Uist, finally escaped all his troubles, and spent the rest of his life at Edinburgh in the humble situation of a street porter or chairman. Good old Donald MacLeod was seized soon after parting with the prince, and taken on board a ship of war, where he was questioned by General Campbell. The conversation is worthy of record, as exemplifying the pure and exalted honour of the old man. The general asked if he had been along with the Chevalier. "Yes," said Donald, "I winna deny't."—"And do you know," enquired the general, "what money was upon that gentleman's head?"—no less than thirty thousand pounds sterling—a sum which would have made you and your family happy for ever!"—"What, then?" replied MacLeod, "what though I had gotten't? I could not have enjoyed it for two days. Conscience would have got the better of me. But, although I could have gotten all England and Scotland for my pains, I would not, after his throwing himself upon my care, have allowed a hair of his head to be touched!" Sullivan made his escape, soon after parting with his master, in a French war-ship which came to South Uist for the purpose of taking away the prince; and O'Neal surrendered as a prisoner of war.

CHAPTER XXXI.

CHARLES'S WANDERINGS—SKYE.

Far over you hills of the heather so green,
And down by the corrie that sings to the sea,
The lovely young Flora sat sighing her lane,
The dew on her plaid, and the tear in her ee.
She looked at a boat with the breezes that swung,
Away on the wave like a bird of the main,
And, as eye as it lessened, she sighed and she sung,
"Fareweel to the lad I shall ne'er see again.
Fareweel to my hero, the gallant and good,
Fareweel to the lad I shall ne'er see again!"

Jacobite Song.

The weather continued fair till they had got several leagues from shore, when it became somewhat tempestuous. Exposed in an open boat to the cold night air, at the mercy of a raging sea, and at the same time haunted by the fear of man's more deadly hostility—the sensations of the little party cannot be supposed to have been very agreeable. Charles could not help perceiving the meanness of his attendants; and, anxious to compensate, by all the means in his power, for the pain which he occasioned to them, he endeavoured to sustain their spirits by singing and talking. He sung the lively old song, entitled "The Restoration;" and told some playful stories, which yielded them considerable amusement.

When day dawned, they found themselves surrounded by a shoreless sea, without any means of determining in what part of the Hebrides they were. They sailed, however, but a little way farther, when they perceived the lofty mountains and dark bold headlands of Skye. Making with all speed towards that coast, they soon found themselves off Watnash, the western point of the island. Here an adventure occurred which had nearly proved the destruction of the prince, and which ran nigh to involve the whole party in one dreadful fate. They had no sooner drawn near to the shore, than they perceived it become covered with a body of armed men, all of them clad in the sanguine garments which betoken such deadly danger to the princely fugitive. The boat was within shot of these men, before they were observed. When the boatmen at length perceived them, they lost no time in changing the direction of their oars. The soldiers called upon them to land, upon peril of being shot at; but it was resolved to escape at all risks, and they exerted their utmost energies in pulling off their little vessel. The soldiers then put their threat in execution, by discharging a volley, the balls of which struck the water in every direction around, though fortunately without hitting the boat or any of its crew. The whole of the party, not excepting either the royal or the female individual, displayed a high degree of fortitude on this trying occasion. Charles at first called upon the boatmen "not to mind the villains," for so he termed the soldiers; and they assured him, that, if they cared at all, it was only for him; to which he replied, with undaunted lightness of demeanour, "Oh, no fear of me!" He then entreated Miss MacDonald to lie down at the bottom of the boat, in order to avoid the bullets; as nothing, he said, would give him at that moment greater pain than if any accident were to befall her. The truly noble woman whom he addressed, instead of obeying his wishes, declared that she was here with a purpose to save his life, and not to take care of her own—that she would consider herself degraded if she were to use any measure for her own safety, while the person of her prince was exposed;—and she entreated that he would take care of a life which was so much more valuable than hers, by occupying the place of security which he had pointed out to her. Charles was astonished at the extravagant heroism of his conductress, and proceeded to use still more urgent entreaties, as the bullets were every moment coming in great numbers from the shore. But she gave a decided negative to all that he could urge; and he only at last prevailed upon her to take the measure of safety which he suggested, by agreeing to lie down along with her. The matter thus comprised, they ensconced themselves together in the bottom of the boat; and the rowers soon pulled them out of all further danger.

When once more fairly out to sea, and in some measure recovered from this alarm, Miss MacDonald, overcome with the watchfulness and anxiety of the night, fell asleep upon the bottom of the boat. Charles had previously rendered the kindest attentions to his amiable preserver, refusing to partake of a small quantity of wine which Lady Clanranald had brought to him before embarking, upon the plea that it should be reserved for her, both on account of her sex, and the extraordinary hardships she was undergoing. He now sat down beside her, and watched with tender and anxious regard, lest the boatmen should happen to disturb her in the course of their awkward evolutions.

In the eagerness of Duke William's emissaries to take Charles upon the Long Island, were they had certain information he was, Skye, on which the prince was now about to land, and which is at least sixty miles distant from that remote cluster of isles, was left comparatively unwatched. It is true, the MacDonalds and MacLeods, who chiefly possessed Skye, had remained well-affected to government, and now formed a sort of militia for the ostensible purpose of capturing the great public enemy. But Sir Alexander MacDonald and the Laird of MacLeod, chiefs of the two clans, were in secret friendly to the Chevalier, having only refrained from joining him for prudential reasons, and would have been now very unwilling to injure him. The whole clans of course took their cue from the chiefs, and were equally inclined to be passive. There were only several troops of regular infantry upon the island, from whom any harm could be apprehended; and they, fortunately, were not very vigilant.

Proceeding to Kilbride, near the northern extremity of the island, the little party landed at a short distance from Moydshat, or Mugstat, the seat of Sir Alexander MacDonald. Sir Alexander himself was known to be absent, in attendance upon the Duke of Cumberland; but Flora had taken care, before leaving Uist, to apprise his lady, by means of a friend named Mrs. MacDonald, of her visit and its purpose. She, now, therefore, went forward to the house, along with Charles and Mr. MacEachan, in full hope of meeting with a favourable reception.*

Lady Margaret MacDonald, to whose honour the prince's life was now to be intrusted, was the daughter of Alexander Earl of Eglintoun, an unwavering Jacobite, and of Susanna, daughter of Sir Archibald Kennedy of Colzau, who had ranked among the most violent cavaliers of the preceding age. Descended from friends of the exiled family, and married to a chieftain who was every thing but an active partisan; educated in High Church principles, and possessed of an honourable and exalted mind; she could not fail to befriend the unfortunate wanderer who had now come to her shores. It was fortunate that her ladyship possessed talent and presence of mind sufficient to second her predilections and benevolence.

Leaving Charles alone at a safe place in the neighbourhood of Moydshat, his heroic conductress went forward to the house, with MacEachan, to reconnoitre, and apprise Lady Margaret of his arrival. This precaution proved to have been absolutely necessary, for there were several British officers in the house with her ladyship, belonging to the parties left to patrol the island. Miss MacDonald, with an exertion of presence of mind which reflects the highest credit upon her, went into the room where these officers were sitting, and conversed with them about the news of the day, and the professed object of her journey. She had previously consulted with Lady Margaret, regarding the disposal of the prince; and her ladyship had determined upon sending him to the neighbouring isle of Raasay, the laird of which was there in hiding with some select friends, in whose company the prince would be quite safe.

Lady Margaret, being obliged to remain at home for the entertainment of her military guests, was obliged to depute Mr. MacDonald of Kingsburgh, Sir Alexander's

* There still lives (July 1827) an ancient adherent of this family, who happened to be tending cattle near the house, at the same time that Flora MacDonald passed towards it from the shore, attended by her supposed servant. He was born in the same year with the prince; was then, of course, twenty-six years of age; and is now an hundred and seven. He remembers, he says, with as much distinctness as if the circumstance happened yesterday, seeing two women, one of them meanly, and the other finely dressed, approach him as he was sitting upon the hill-side. She who was finest in appearance, and also shortest in stature, asked him in Gaelic, if there was not a well in that neighbourhood. He answered that there was; and he immediately conducted the strangers to a spring, which, from its dedication to the Virgin, was called St. Mary's Well. Here the tallest lady put her hand into her pocket, and pulled out a thing which looked at first like a little purse, but afterwards assumed the shape of a cup. This she dipped into the well, and taking up a draught, presented it, with an obeisance, to the shortest and finest lady. That lady having satisfied her thirst, the tallest received back the cup, and proceeded to take a draught for herself. When she had also satisfied her thirst, she returned the cup to her pocket in its collapsed form; and, taking out a shilling, presented it to the islander, who looked with wonder upon this mysterious and unusual scene, during the whole of which the tall lady never spoke. "I had never before," concludes the old man, "been master of silver money, and I did not think the less of it because it was given to me by our dear prince."

factor, who happened to be in the house, to receive and take charge of the prince. Kingsburgh, who, like all the factors of great Highland families, was a gentleman, and one of the best of the clan, displayed the greatest anxiety to render his services in so good a cause, and promised to conduct Charles to his own house of Kingsburgh, which is about a dozen miles from Moydhatat. He therefore went out to the hill where Charles had been lost, carrying some wine and provisions for his refreshment. Though he had been apprised by Miss MacDonald of the exact place where the adventurer was lost, he could not find him for a considerable time, and began to fear that some unhappy accident had befallen him. At length, perceiving some sheep make a sudden start at a particular part of the shore, and rightly judging the cause, he made towards that place, and on approaching it gave a cough, which caused the object of his search to start out of his concealment. On perceiving the old gentleman, Charles rushed forward, with a large knotted stick in his hand, as if ready to knock him down; but, on learning who the intruder was, and for what purpose he had been sent, his royal highness at once changed his threatening attitude for one of the blindest friendship. Kingsburgh then produced his provisions, of which Charles partook with great avidity, having ate nothing for many hours. They soon after set forward together towards Kingsburgh.

After having dined with Lady Margaret and the officers, and when the prince and Kingsburgh could be supposed to have got a considerable distance from the house, Miss MacDonald rose to depart. Lady Margaret affected great concern at her short stay, and entreated that she would prolong it at least till next day; reminding her that, when last at Moydhatat, she had promised a much longer visit. Flora on the other hand pleaded the necessity of getting immediately home to attend her mother, who was unwell, and entirely alone in these troublesome times. After a proper reciprocation of entreaties and refusals, Lady Margaret, with great apparent reluctance, permitted her young friend to depart.

Miss MacDonald and Mr. MacEachan were accompanied in their journey by the lady (Mrs. MacDonald) whom she had despatched as an avant-courier to Moydhatat, and by the male and female servant of that gentleman. All the five rode on horseback. They soon came up with Kingsburgh and the prince, who had walked thus far on the public road, but were soon after to turn off upon an unfrequented path across the wild country. Flora, anxious that her fellow-traveller's servants, who were uninitiated in the secret, should not see the route which Kingsburgh and the Prince were about to take, called upon the party to ride faster; and they passed the two pedestrians at a trot. Mrs. MacDonald's girl, however, could not help observing the extraordinary appearance of the female with whom Kingsburgh was walking, and exclaimed, that she "had never seen such a tall impudent like jaud in her life! See," she continued, addressing Flora, "what lang strides she takes, and how her coats wamble about her! I daur say she's an Irish woman, or else a man in woman's clothes." Flora confirmed her in the former supposition, and soon after parted with her fellow-travellers.

Kingsburgh and the Prince, in walking along the road, were at first a good deal annoyed by the number of country people whom they met returning from church, and who all expressed wonder at the preternatural height and awkwardness of the apparent female. In crossing a stream which traversed the road, Charles held up his petticoats indelicately high, to save them from being wet. Kingsburgh pointed out, that, by doing so, he must excite strange suspicions among those who should happen to see him; and his royal highness promised to take better care on the next occasion. Accordingly, in crossing another stream he permitted his skirts to hang down and float upon the water. Kingsburgh again represented that this mode was as likely as the other to attract disagreeable observation; and the prince could not help laughing at the difficulty of adjusting this trifling, and yet important matter. His conductor further observed that, instead of returning the obeisance which the country made to them in passing, by a courtesy, his royal highness made a bow, and also that, in some other posture and attitudes of person, he completely forgot the lady, and assumed the man. "Your enemies," remarked Kingsburgh, "call you a pretender; but if you be, I can tell you, you are the worst at your trade I ever saw." "Why," replied Charles laughing, "I believe my enemies do me as much injustice in this as in some other and more important particulars. I have all my life despised assumed characters, and am perhaps the worst dissimular in the world." The whole party, Charles, Kingsburgh, and Miss MacDonald, arrived in safety at Kingsburgh House, about eleven at night.

The House of Kingsburgh was not at this time in the best possible case for entertaining guests of distinction; and, to add to the distress of the occasion, all the inmates had long been gone to bed. The old gentleman, however, lost no time in putting matters in proper trim for the production of a supper to the party. He introduced Charles into the hall, and sent a servant up stairs to rouse his lady. Lady Kingsburgh, on being informed of her husband's arrival, with guests, did not choose to rise, but contented herself with sending down an apology for her non-appearance, and a request that they would help themselves to whatever was in the house. She had scarcely despatched the servant, when her daughter, a girl of seven years, came running up to her bed-side, and informed her, with many expressions of childish surprise, that her father had brought home the most "odd, muckle, ill-shaken-up wife she had ever seen,—and brought her into the hall too!" Kingsburgh himself immediately came up, and desired her to lose no time in rising, as her presence was absolutely necessary for the entertainment of his fellow-travellers. She was now truly roused, and even alarmed; the mysterious sententiousness of her husband suggesting to her that he had taken under his protection some of the proscribed fugitives who were then known to be skulking in the country.

As she was putting on her clothes, she sent her daughter down stairs for her keys, which she remembered to have left in the hall. The girl, however, came back immediately, declaring, with marks of the greatest alarm, that she could not go into the hall for fear of the tall woman, who was walking backwards and forwards through it, in a manner, she said, perfectly frightful. Lady Kingsburgh then went down herself, but could not help hesitating, when she came to the door, at sight of this mysterious stranger. Kingsburgh coming up, she desired him to go in for the keys; but he bade her go in herself; and, after some further demur, in at last she went.

On her ladyship entering, Charles rose up from a seat which he had taken at the end of the hall, and advanced to salute her. Her apprehensions were now confirmed beyond a doubt; for, in performing the ceremony which was then so indispensable at the introduction of gentlemen to ladies, she felt the roughness of a male cheek; and such were her feelings at the discovery, that she almost fainted away. Not a word passed between her and the unfortunate stranger. When she got out of the hall, she eagerly made up to Kingsburgh, and disclosed to him all her suspicions. She did not upbraid her husband for having been so imprudent, but, on the contrary, asked if he thought the stranger would know any thing regarding the prince. Kingsburgh then took his wife's hands into his own, and said seriously, "My dear, this is the prince himself!" She could not restrain her alarm when he pronounced these emphatic words, but exclaimed, "The prince!—then we'll be a hanged noo!" Kingsburgh replied, "Hout tout, we can die but once—could we over die in a better cause? We are only doing an act of humanity, which any body might do. Go," he added, "and make haste with supper for his royal highness. Bring us eggs, butter, cheese, and whatever else you can quickly make ready." "Eggs, butter, and cheese!" repeated Mrs. MacDonald, alarmed upon a new but not less interesting score—the honour of her housewifery; "what a supper is that for a prince—he'll never look at it!" "Ah, my good wife," replied Kingsburgh, "you little know how this poor prince has fared of late! Our supper will be a treat to him. Besides, to make a formal supper, would cause the servants to suspect something. Make haste, and come to supper yourself." Lady Kingsburgh was almost as much alarmed at her husband's last expression as she had been about her provisions. "Me come to supper!" she exclaimed, "I ken naething about how to behave before Majesty!" "But you must come," Kingsburgh replied; "the Prince would not eat a bit without you; and you'll find it no difficult matter to behave before him—he is so easy and obliging in conversation."

Supper being accordingly soon after prepared, and Miss Flora MacDonald introduced, Charles, who had always paid the most respectful attention to that young lady—rising up whenever she entered the room, and giving her the pas in all matters of precedence—placed her upon his right hand and Lady Kingsburgh on his left. He ate very heartily, and afterwards drank a bumper of brandy to the health and prosperity of his landlord. When his repast was finished, and the ladies had retired, he took out a little black stunted tobacco-pipe which he carried about with him, and which, among his companions, went by the name of "the cutty;" and proceeded to take a smoke; informing Kingsburgh that he had been obliged to have recourse to that exercise, during his wanderings, on account of a toothache which occasionally afflicted him. Kingsburgh then produced a small china punch-bowl, and, in Scottish fashion, made up, with usquebaugh, hot water, and sugar, the celebrated composition called toddy; dealing it out to Charles and himself in glasses. His royal highness was pleased to express himself perfectly delighted with this beverage, and soon, with Kingsburgh's assistance, emptied the little bowl; after which it was again filled. The two friends, unequal in rank, but united in common feelings, talked over their drink in a style so familiar, so kindly, and so much to the satisfaction of each other, that they did not observe the lapse of time; and it was an hour at the earliest in the morning ere either talked of retiring. It might have been expected that Charles, from fatigue, and from a wish to enjoy once more the comforts of a good bed, to which he had been so long a stranger, would have been the first to propose this measure. On the contrary, Kingsburgh had to perform the disagreeable duty of breaking up the company. After they had emptied the bowl several times, and when he himself was become anxious for repose, he thought it necessary to hint to the prince, that, as he would require to be up and away as soon as possible to-morrow, he had better now go to bed, in order that he might enjoy a proper quantity of sleep. To his surprise, Charles was by no means anxious for rest. On the contrary, he insisted upon "another bowl," that they might, as he said, finish their conversation. Kingsburgh vailed his feelings as a host, so far as to refuse this request, urging that it was absolutely necessary that his royal highness should retire, for the reason he had stated. Charles as eagerly pressed the necessity of more drink; and, after some good humoured altercation, when Kingsburgh took away the bowl, to put it by, his royal highness rose to detain it; and a struggle ensued, in which the little vessel broke into two pieces, Charles retaining one in his hands, and Kingsburgh holding the other. The pas was thus put at an end; and the prince no longer objected to go to bed.

After having retired from the supper table, Lady Kingsburgh desired Miss Flora to relate the adventure in which she had been concerned with his royal highness. At the termination of the recital, her ladyship enquired what had been done with the boatmen who brought them to Skye. Miss MacDonald said they had been sent back to South Uist. Lady Kingsburgh observed that they ought not to have been permitted to return immediately, lest, falling into the hands of the prince's enemies in that island, they might divulge the secret of his route. Her conjecture, which turned out to have been correct, though happily without being attended with evil consequences, determined Flora to change the prince's clothes next day.

So much did Charles enjoy the novel pleasure of a good bed, that, though he seldom during his distress slept above four hours, he on this occasion slept about ten, not awaking till roused, at one o'clock next day, by his kind landlord. Kingsburgh enquiring, like a good host, how he had reposed, the prince answered that he had never enjoyed a more agreeable, or a longer sleep, in his life. He had almost forgot, he said, what a good bed was. Kingsburgh begged leave to tell his royal highness, that it was full time to think of another march. It would be proper, he continued, for him to go away in the same dress which he wore when he entered the house, in order to avoid raising suspicions among the servants; but, as the rumour of his disguise might have taken air, it would be advisable to assume another garb by the earliest convenience. The only reformation he thought it would be allowable to make in his habiliments at present, was a change of shoes, those which the prince had brought with him being worn so much that his toes protruded through them. Kingsburgh happened to have a pair in the house which he had never worn, and those he provided for the accommodation of his royal highness. When Charles had shifted the old for the new, Kingsburgh took up in a corner of his house, observing, that they might yet stand him in good stead. Charles asked him what he meant by that; and the old man replied, "Why, when you are fairly settled at St. James's, I shall introduce myself by shaking these shoes at you, to put you in mind of your night's entertainment, and protection under my roof." Charles smiled at the conceit of the good old gentleman, and bade him be as good as his word. Kingsburgh accordingly kept these strange relics of his royal visitor as long as he lived. After his death, and when all prospect of Charles's restoration to St. James's was gone, his family permitted them to be cut to pieces, and dispersed among their friends. It is the recollection of his great granddaughter, that Jacobite ladies often took away the pieces they got, in their bosoms.

When the prince had dressed himself as well as he could, the ladies went into his chamber, to put on his apron, and pin his gown and cap. Before Flora put on the cap, Lady Kingsburgh requested her in Gaelic to ask for a lock of his royal highness's hair. Flora from bashfulness, desired her ladyship in the same language to prefer the petition herself. Charles observed their debate, and enquired its object, which was no sooner explained to him than he laid down his head upon the lap of his young conductress, and told her to cut off as much as she chose. Flora severed a lock, the half of which she gave to Lady Kingsburgh, and the other half retained for herself.

The prince being now dressed, and having taken his breakfast, addressed himself to his departure. He had observed that Lady Kingsburgh, like most ladies of birth and fashion of her time, took snuff; and, on approaching her to take his leave, he asked to have "a pinch from her snuff." The good lady took that opportunity of presenting the box to his royal highness, as "a keepsake." He accepted it with many thanks, rendering at the same time his warmest acknowledgments of the kindness with which he had been treated under her ladyship's roof. After he had taken a tender farewell, she went up stairs to his bedroom, and folded the sheets in which he had lain, declaring that they should never again be washed or used, till her death, when they should be employed as her winding-sheet. She was afterwards induced to divide this valuable memorial of her distinguished guest, with the amiable Flora, who, it may be mentioned, many years afterwards, carried her moiety of it to America. In the course of her strangely adventurous life, and, though often reduced to situations of the greatest distress by the republican insurgents, she never parted with it till the day of her death, when her body was wrapped in its precious folds, and consigned with it to the grave.

Charles had already debated with Kingsburgh what course it would be advisable for him next to pursue; and a resolution had been made, that he should endeavour to get over to the adjacent Isle of Raasay, in order to throw himself upon the protection of the proprietor, who was understood to be skulking there for his concern in the insurrection. The Laird of Raasay was one of the few gentlemen of the name of MacLeod who had joined Charles; and as he was, moreover, a man of the purest honour, the course proposed seemed extremely eligible. Kingsburgh had already taken measures to get his guest conveyed across the narrow sound which divides Skye from Raasay. Early in the forenoon, he had despatched a faithful servant named Donald Roy, or MacDonald, to a place not far distant, where lived the young Laird of Raasay, a gentleman who, having remained at home in possession of the estate, was not subject to the unhappy proscription which had overtaken his father. Donald Roy was empowered to disclose the prince's secret to young Raasay, and beg his assistance in getting his royal highness transported over to his father's hiding-place.

Charles therefore set out from Kingsburgh, with the intention of walking to Portree, a little town opposite Raasay, about ten or twelve miles distant, where he had the cheerful prospect of finding a boat ready to convey him to that island. He was accompanied by his faithful friends, Flora and Kingsburgh; the last carrying under his arm a suit of male Highland attire for his royal highness's use. When they had got to a considerable distance from the house, Kingsburgh conducted the prince into a wood, and assisted him in changing his clothes. The suit which he now put on, consisted, as usual, of a short coat and waistcoat, a phibeg and short hose, a plaid, a wig, and a bonnet. Kingsburgh hid his cast-off garments in a bush, designing to call for them in returning from Portree. That they might not tell against him, in case of a call from the military, he afterwards conveyed them to his house, and burnt the whole, except the gown. The preservation of the gown was owing to his daughter, who insisted upon keeping it as a relic of their prince, and because it was a pretty pattern. It was a stamped linen or cotton gown, with a purple flower upon a white ground. A Jacobite manufacturer of the name of Carmichael, at Leith, afterwards got a pattern made from it, and sold an immense quantity of cloth, precisely similar in appearance, to the loyal ladies of Scotland.

When Donald Roy made application to young Raasay, he was mortified by the information, that old Raasay had left his hiding place upon the island, and gone to Knoydart, a part of Glengary's estate, upon the Mainland. The young gentleman, however, though he had been reserved from the insurrection for the purpose of saving the estate, was as well affected to the Chevalier as either his father or his younger brothers, who led out the clan, and instantly proposed to conduct the wanderer to Raasay, where he could at least remain concealed till the old gentleman's advice might be obtained for further procedure. Donald approved of the plan; but the difficulty was, how to get a boat. They could not trust a Portree crew, and all the Raasay boats had been destroyed or carried off by the military, except two, belonging to Malcolm MacLeod, a cousin of young Raasay, which he had somewhere concealed.

There was at that time in the same house with young Raasay, a younger brother, named Murdoch MacLeod, who had been wounded at the battle of Culloden, and was here slowly recovering. Murdoch, being informed of the business in hand, said he would once more risk his life for Prince Charles; and, it having occurred, that there was a little boat upon a fresh-water lake in the neighbourhood, he, with his brother, and some women, brought it to the sea, by extraordinary exertion, across a Highland mile of land, one half of which was bog, and the other a steep precipice. The gallant brothers, with the assistance of one little boy, rowed this to Raasay, where they hoped to find Malcolm MacLeod, and get one of his good boats, with which they might return to Portree and receive the wanderer; or, in case of not finding him, they were to make the small boat serve, though the danger was considerable.

Malcolm MacLeod, who was soon to act a conspicuous part in the deliverance of the prince, had been a captain in his service, and fought at the battle of Culloden. Being easily found by his cousins, he lost no time in producing one of his boats, which he succeeded in manning with two stout boatmen, named John MacKenzie and Donald MacFriar. Malcolm, being the oldest and most cautious man of the party, suggested that, as young Raasay was hitherto a clear man, he should not on the present occasion run any risk; but that he himself and Murdoch, who were already as black as they could be, should alone conduct the expedition. Young Raasay answered, with an oath, that he would go at the risk of his life and fortune. "In God's name, then," said Malcolm, "let us proceed." The two boatmen, however, now stopped short, and refused to move, till they should be informed of their destination. They were sworn to secrecy, and made acquainted with not only the extent of their voyage, but also its object; after which, they expressed the utmost eagerness to proceed.

The boat soon crossed the narrow sound which divides Raasay from Skye, and, being landed about half a mile from the harbour of Portree, Malcolm and MacFriar were despatched to look for Prince Charles, who had by this time advanced, with Kingsburgh and Miss Flora MacDonald, to the little inn at Portree. Donald Roy effected a meeting between the two parties; and it was resolved that Charles should immediately embark. Before leaving the inn to do so, Charles asked the landlord to have silver for a guinea; and, on it appearing that there was only thirteen shillings of silver to be found in all Portree, his royal highness was about to accept that sum in exchange for his gold; when Donald judiciously prevented him, on the plea that such an extraordinary symptom of indifference to money would point him out as a great man, and perhaps occasion his destruction. Nothing, therefore, now remained to be done in Skye, but to take leave of the two faithful friends to whom he had been so much indebted during his stay upon the island. Kingsburgh professed his resolution to accompany him to the boat, but it was thought proper that he should part with Miss Flora MacDonald at the inn. He could not, without much agitation, bid farewell to that young lady, whose whole conduct, during the three days of their acquaintance, had been marked with so much heroism and generous affection, and who, indeed, must have not only made the strongest impression upon his heart, but exalted his opinion of her sex, and of human nature. He embraced her in the tenderest manner, thanked her for her extraordinary services, and concluded by presenting to her a miniature of himself, which he desired that she would ever keep for his sake.

He was then conducted towards the boat, in which young Raasay and his brother were at this time waiting with the greatest anxiety. Before going on board, he turned to take leave of his remaining friend, the generous Kingsburgh. He threw his arms round the neck of this excellent old gentleman, thanked him warmly for his valuable services, and, reminding him of the pleasantry about the shoes, expressed a hope that they should yet meet to drink a festive cup in the palace of the Kings of England. Tears fell from the eyes of both, as they closed in a parting embrace; and the prince was so much affected, that his nose gushed with blood. Kingsburgh expressed alarm at so singular a mark of sensibility, but Charles assured him it never failed to happen when he parted with dear friends. In expressing his thanks to the old gentleman, he said that he only wished he could have a MacDonald to go through with him all the way; it being impossible for him to find greater kindness, or more fidelity, among any other clan in the wide world.

When he entered the boat, and the names of all the individuals composing the crew, including young Raasay, were announced to him, he would not permit the usual ceremonies of respect, but saluted them as his equals. It was evening when Charles left Portree; a haven which derives its name from having been touched at by King James the Fifth, during his celebrated tour through the Western Isles; and it may be supposed that the contrast between his great great great grandfather's pomp on that occasion, and his own present humble state, must have afforded the unfortunate prince matter for the most painful reflections. He slept a little on the passage to Raasay, and, after a voyage of ten miles, landed, about daybreak on the 1st of July, at a place called Glam. As almost all the houses in Raasay had been burnt by the soldiery, and as some were not eligible as places of concealment, it was not without difficulty that the prince was accommodated. A resolution was at length made, that the whole company should lodge in a little hovel which some shepherds had lately built, though it could afford them absolutely nothing but shelter from the open air. Bundles and beds of heath being strewed upon the ground, they sat down to a meal composed of provisions which had been sent along with the prince from Kingsburgh. It was observed, with delight, by the Highlanders, that Charles would not eat wheaten bread or drink brandy, so long as there remained any oat-bread or whisky, which he enraptured them by terming "his own country bread and drink."

Though there were no parties of military upon Raasay, and although all the inhabitants were well affected, it was thought proper by Charles's attendants to use the utmost caution. Watches were established upon the tops of all the neighbouring heights, and no one of the party appeared in public except young Raasay, who was, as already mentioned, a clear man. Donald Roy being stationed upon Skye, to give intelligence in case of any annoyance from that quarter, the Prince might have almost considered himself secure upon this wild and secluded island. Laying the wretchedness of his lodging out of the question, he might also be esteemed as by no means in the worst possible predicament as to living. Young Raasay was in the midst of his own flocks, and had only to use insidious means, to procure his royal highness, and the whole party, plenty of fresh provisions.

The prince's bed of state was here one made, in the primitive Highland fashion, of heather, with the stalks upright, and the bloom uppermost. He enjoyed long, but not unbroken slumbers; often starting, and giving unconscious expression to the feelings and imagery of his dreams. Malcolm MacLeod, who watched him on these occasions, informed Mr. Boswell, that his half suppressed exclamations were sometimes in French, sometimes in Italian, and occasionally in English; though the ingenious tourist could not help questioning Malcolm's ability to distinguish at least two of these tongues. One of his expressions in English was, "Oh God, poor Scotland!" his mind having probably been then engaged in lamenting the military tyranny, by which, in consequence of his unfortunate enterprise, a great part of the nation was then so bitterly agonised.

The only stranger, besides the prince, then known to be upon the island of Raasay, and of course the only person from whom they apprehended particular danger, was a man who had come about a fortnight before for the ostensible purpose of selling a roll of tobacco. The tobacco had been long sold, and yet the man wandered about, apparently reluctant to quit the island. Nobody knew any thing about him, and he was suspected to be a spy.

One day, John MacKenzie came running down from the place where he had been watching, with the alarming intelligence that this mysterious individual was approaching the hut. The three gentlemen who attended the prince, young Raasay, Murdoch MacLeod and Malcolm, immediately held a council of war upon the subject, the result of which was, that the man should be put to death without ceremony. The mind of Charles shrunk with horror from a proposal, which, though involving no violation of humanity according to the ancient Highland code, seemed cruel in the extreme to a person who had been educated in a climate where life was held in greater estimation. Assuming a grave, and even severe countenance, he said, "God forbid that we should take away a man's life who may be innocent, while we can preserve our own." The gentlemen, however, persisted in their resolution, while he as strenuously continued to take the merciful side. In the midst of the debate, John MacKenzie the watchman, who sat at the door of the hut, said in Erse, "He must be shot:—you are the king: but we are the parliament, and will do what we choose." Charles, seeing his friends smile, asked what the man had said; which being reported to him in English, he observed that he was a clever fellow, and, notwithstanding the perilous situation he was in, laughed loud and heartily. Fortunately, the unknown person walked past without perceiving that there were people in the hut. Malcolm MacLeod afterwards declared that had he stopped or come forward, they were resolved to despatch him; that he would have done so himself, although the victim had been his own brother! Douglas Graham, indeed, reports that young Raasay had his pistol ready cocked for the purpose.

After a residence of two days and a half upon the island of Raasay, informing his friends that he did not think it advisable ever to remain long in one place, and that he had hopes of finding a French ship at Skye, he desired to be conveyed back to that island. The whole party accordingly set sail, on the evening of the 3d of July, in the same open boat which had brought them over to Raasay. Before they had proceeded far, the wind began to blow hard, and to drive so much sea water into their vessel, that they begged to return, and wait a more favourable opportunity. But the prince insisted upon proceeding, in spite of every danger; exclaiming that Providence had not brought him through so many perilous chances to end his life in this simple manner at last. To encourage them, he sung a lively Erse song; being now pretty well acquainted with that language. They continued their voyage, notwithstanding the water came into the boat in such quantities, as to require the utmost exertions of Malcolm to keep it from sinking them. After a rough voyage of about fifteen miles, they landed safe, about eleven o'clock at night, at a place called Nicholson's Great Rock near Scorbreck in Trotternish, Isle of Skye. There being no convenient landing place, the party had to jump out into the surf, and haul the boat ashore; Charles, who was already drenched to the skin, and encumbered with a large great coat, was the third man to fling himself into the sea for this purpose.

After disembarking on this difficult and inhospitable coast, the only lodging which the party could find to sojourn in for all the fatigues and discomforts of their voyage, was a lonely cowhouse belonging to Mr. Nicholson of Scorbreck, a mansion about two miles distant. Here, without either fire to dry them, or food wherewith to satisfy their hunger, they passed a most wretched night. In the morning, young Raasay was despatched to see Donald Roy, and procure intelligence; and his younger brother was desired by the prince, with much earnestness, to take the boat, and keep it ready at a place about seven miles off, till he himself should come up, as he intended it should carry him upon a business of great consequence. He also presented the young gentleman with a case containing a silver spoon, knife and fork, which he desired him to keep till they next met. These orders were given in order to get rid of the two MacLeods; whom, according to his constant custom during his wanderings, he did not wish to apprise of his future motions, as he generally took care to conceal the place whence he had come from all the people into whose hands he successively intrusted himself. As soon as he was fairly left alone with Malcolm, he left the cottage, desiring that faithful retainer to follow him.

When they walked about a mile, Malcolm made bold to ask his royal highness where he intended to go. "Malcolm," answered the prince, impressively, "I commit myself entirely to you; carry me to MacKinnon's bounds in Skye;" meaning that portion of the island which belonged to the Chief of MacKinnon, the only one of the three great proprietors of Skye who had been concerned in his late enterprise. Malcolm objected, that such a journey would be dangerous, on account of the soldiers who patrolled the island; but Charles answered, that there was nothing now to be done without danger. "You, Malcolm," he continued, "must now act the master, and I the man." Accordingly, taking the bag which contained his linen, and strapping it over his shoulders; and having changed his vest, which was of scarlet tartan, with a gold twist button, for Malcolm's, which was of a plain ordinary tartan, he desired his faithful companion to go in advance as a gentleman, while he trudged behind in the character of a humble gilly or servant. Malcolm acquiesced in the plan; and they set forward in this fashion towards MacKinnon's country, which was distant a long day's journey, and could only be reached from this point by traversing a very wild and mountainous tract.

Malcolm, though himself an excellent pedestrian, as most of his countrymen then were, used afterwards to own that, in this long and painful journey, he found himself far excelled by Prince Charles, whose rapidity of motion was such, that it was with the greatest difficulty he could be restrained to his proper station in the rear. His royal highness informed Malcolm, that, trusting to his speed of foot, he felt little apprehension on the score of being chased by a party of English soldiers, provided he got out of musket-shot, though he owned he was not just so confident of escaping any of the Highland militia who might fall in with him. Malcolm asked him what they should do, if surprised before getting to the proper distance. "Fight, to be sure," was the prince's reply. "I think," rejoined Malcolm, "if there were no more than four of them, I would engage to manage two." "And I," added Charles, "would engage to do for the other two."

In walking over the mountains, they kept as much as possible out of sight of houses; but they occasionally met a few country people wandering about. On these occasions, Charles took care to display the demeanour of a servant; touching his bonnet when spoken to by his apparent master, and also when addressing him. Having asked Malcolm, if he thought he should be known in his present disguise, and Malcolm having replied he would, he said, "Then I'll blacken my face with powder." "That," said Malcolm, "would discover you at once." "Then," said he, "I must be put into the greatest dishabille possible." He therefore put his wig into his pocket, tied a dirty napkin over his head, with his bonnet above it, tore the ruffles from his shirt, and took the buckles out of his shoes, making his friend fasten them with strings. Malcolm, saying that he still thought he might be recognised, he remarked, that "he had so odd a face, that he believed no man ever saw it but he would know it again." Malcolm's own remark on the circumstance (made in after life) went to the same effect, that "nothing could disguise the majestic mien and carriage of the true prince."

The only nourishment which the two pedestrians had during their long walk, was derived from a bottle of brandy carried by Malcolm, with the assistance of the wayside springs. This source of comfort becoming exhausted before the end of their journey, all except a single glass, the prince insisted that his companion should drink the same, protesting that he could better endure to wait it. When he had fairly drained the bottle, Malcolm hid it in the ground, where he afterwards found, and resumed possession of it in quiet times.

After a journey of more than thirty English miles, they arrived in the evening at Ellagol, near Kilmaree, in the country of MacKinnon, where they happened to meet two of that clan, who had been engaged in the insurrection. The men stared at the prince for a little, and, soon recognising him, fairly lifted up their hands and wept. Malcolm immediately put them upon their guard, lest such an expression of sympathy, though honourable to them, should discover their prince to his enemies. He also swore them to secrecy upon his naked dirk, after the fashion of the Highlanders, and requested them to go away, without taking further notice of his royal highness. It is needless to say that they kept their word.

Being now near MacKinnon's house, Malcolm asked the prince if he wished to see the Laird. Charles answered that, with the highest respect for the worth and fidelity of MacKinnon, he did not think him the person precisely fitted for his present purpose; and he wished rather to be conducted to the house of some other gentleman. Malcolm then determined that he should go to the house of his brother-in-law, Mr. John MacKinnon, and from thence be conveyed to the Mainland, where he wished to claim the assistance of MacDonald of Scothouse. They accordingly proceeded to this house, which they reached at an early hour in the morning.

Leaving Charles at a little distance, till he should reconnoitre the premises, Malcolm entered the house himself, and saw his sister, who informed him that her husband had gone out, but was expected back every minute. He intended, he said, to spend a day or two in her house, provided there were no soldiers in the neighbourhood. She assured him he would be perfectly safe. Then he informed her that he had brought a brother-in-distress along with him, one Lewis Caw, the son of a surgeon in Crieff, whom he had engaged, from pity, as his servant, and who had unfortunately fallen sick during their journey. Mrs. MacKinnon, with all the hospitality of a Highlander, and all the benevolence of a woman, desired he might be instantly brought in and entertained.

Charles being immediately introduced, the lady of the house could not help observing, as he entered, "Poor man! I pity him. At the same time my heart warms to me of his appearance." She provided the two with a plentiful Highland breakfast, during which Charles sat at a respectful distance from the table with his bonnet off, partaking only of the inferior articles. Malcolm, moved by the prince's humility, requested him to draw near the table and eat along with him, as there was no company in the house. But Charles answered, he knew better what became a servant; and it was only after an earnest entreaty, that, making a profound bow, he at length permitted himself to take advantage of so kind an offer. When their meal was concluded, an old woman came in, with warm water, after the mode of ancient Highland hospitality, to wash Malcolm's feet. When she had done, that gentleman desired her also to wash those of the poor man who attended him. She refused; saying with much warmth, in the periphrastic language of the Gael, "Though I have washed your father's son's feet, why should I wash his father's son's feet?" This woman was only a servant, but, with true Highland pride, she considered it a degradation to perform a menial office to a person of her own rank. Malcolm, however, by working on her feelings of pity, at length prevailed upon her to undertake the office as a matter of charity. Still, though complying, she had a certain degree of indignation at the service, and could not help treating Charles's legs a little more roughly than she had done those of her mistress's brother. She indeed rubbed so hard, that his royal highness at last made a violent remonstrance on the subject. He had been some time on his legs a good way up, in a bog which he had the misfortune to fall into; and on the old woman scrubbing the soft skin above his knees, he could not refrain from an exclamation expressive of pain. "Filthy fellow," said the beldame, who, like Pistol eating his leek, had sworn and washed, and washed and sworn, "it will set the like of you to take offence at any thing my father's daughter could do to you."

The two travellers afterwards went to sleep, while Mrs. MacKinnon took her station on the top of a neighbouring hill, to watch the approach of the least danger. Charles slept two hours, but Malcolm having suffered more from fatigue, continued in bed a good while longer. On rising, he was astonished to find his indefatigable companion dandling and singing to Mrs. MacKinnon's infant with an appearance of as much cheerfulness and alertness as if he had endured neither danger nor fatigue. The old woman sat near him, sullenly looking on. Malcolm could not help expressing his surprise at so extraordinary a sight, when the prince exclaimed with light gaiety, and half forgetting his assumed character, "Who knows but this little fellow may be a captain in my service yet." "Or you rather an old sergeant in his company," said the beldame, disgusted at once at the extravagant ambition implied by the "filthy fellow's" remark, and provoked at the slight promotion which it promised to her charges, for whom, like all other nurses, she of course thought no lot in life too good.

Malcolm, now hearing that his brother-in-law was approaching the house, went out to meet him, in order to sound his disposition in regard to Prince Charles. After the usual salutations, pointing to some ships of war which lay at a distance, he said, "What, MacKinnon, if the prince be on board one of those?" "God forbid," was MacKinnon's devout answer. Malcolm, then assured that he might be trusted, asked, "What if he were here, John? Do you think he would be safe?" "That he would," answered MacKinnon; "we should take care of him." "Then, John," said Malcolm, "he is in your house." MacKinnon, in a transport, was for running in immediately and paying his obeisance; but Malcolm stopped him, till he should compose himself, and be tutored to preserve his royal highness's incognito. When he was fairly instructed as to his behaviour, Malcolm permitted him to enter; but no sooner had the warm-hearted Highlander set his eyes upon the unfortunate prince, than he burst into tears, and had to leave the room.

During the course of the day, a consultation being held as to the best means of transporting Charles to the Mainland, it was agreed that John MacKinnon should go to his chief and hire a boat for that purpose. He was enjoined to conceal the fact of the prince's being in his house from that old gentleman, and to pretend that the boat was intended for the use of his brother-in-law alone. He went accordingly; but the force of clanship proved too much for his discretion; and he disclosed the secret. The chief, delighted with the intelligence, at once got ready his own boat, and, with his lady, set out to pay his respects to the wanderer. On John returning to the house, and confessing what he had done, Charles felt somewhat uneasy, but resolved to make the best of the circumstances. He went out and received the old chief; and the whole party then partook of an entertainment of cold meat and wine, which Lady MacKinnon laid in a neighbouring cave upon the shore.

It was now determined that Charles should be conducted by the old laird and John MacKinnon to the Mainland, while Malcolm should remain in Skye, to interrupt or distract the pursuit which would probably be made after him. It was about eight o'clock at night, when the party repaired to the water's edge, where the boat was lying ready to sail. At that moment, two English men of war were in sight, apparently bearing towards them; and Malcolm, in high alarm, counselled the prince to delay his voyage till next morning, more especially as the wind was favourable to the enemy, which it would not be to his boat. Charles, however, would not listen to his suggestions; urging, with enthusiastic vehemence, the result of former good fortune, and that he felt confident the wind would change in his favour the moment that he required its good services. He then wrote a short note to Murdoch MacLeod, apologising for his non-appearance at the place he had appointed, and informing him, that he had now got safe off the island at another place. He next took out his purse, and desired Malcolm's acceptance of ten guineas, along with a silver stock-buckle. The generous Highlander positively refused to take the money, which he saw from the slenderness of the prince's purse could ill be spared; but Charles at length prevailed upon him to do so, asserting that he would not have need of it in the skulking life he was now leading, and at the same time expressing a confidence that he would get his own exchequer supplied on reaching the Mainland. "Malcolm," he then said, "let us smoke a pipe together before we part." A light was instantly procured from the flint of Malcolm's musket, and the two fond, though unequal companions, took a last parting smoke from "the cutty." When they had finished, Charles presented the stump which had done him so much good service, to Malcolm, as a sort of token of affectionate comradeship, desiring him to think of the giver whenever he should use it. Malcolm gratefully accepted the gift, which Charles could the better spare that he had got a newer and more commodious pipe at Mr. MacKinnon's house.

After a tender and long-protracted adieu, the prince went into the boat, which, with the chief and Mr. John MacKinnon, immediately put out to sea, under the management of a few stout rowers. The affectionate Malcolm sat down upon the side of a hill, partly to watch the proceedings of the two tenders, and partly that he might see his dearly beloved prince as long as distance and eye-sight would permit. He afterwards used to tell, with the true superstitious reverence of a stickler for the jus divinum, that, precisely as the prince predicted, he had not gone far out to sea, when the wind shifted in such a manner as to part him effectually from the inimical vessels; a fact by which he acknowledged himself to have been convinced of the truth of what his royal highness had only said in sport, or by way of a gay bravado—that Providence made a point of favouring him.

Malcolm returned home next day by the way of Kingsburgh; where he related the prince's late adventures to a grateful and admiring audience. He had to inform Lady Kingsburgh of one circumstance, which must have given her unqualified pleasure. During his travels with the prince, his royal highness had expressed a high sense of the value of her ladyship's present—the snuff-box already mentioned. He had asked the meaning of the device which adorned the lid, a pair of clasped hands, with the words "Rob Gib;" which Malcolm explained as emblematic of sincere friendship, and as alluding to a circumstance in which an ancestor of the prince was concerned. Rob Gib was the court-fool of Scotland in the reign of James the Fifth, and, with that sarcastic wit for which some of his profession have been so remarkable, used to observe, that all the official courtiers served his majesty for selfish ends, except himself, who, for his part, had no other contract with the king than "stark love and kindness." The prince expressed himself an ardent admirer of the principle symbolised by the device, and declared he would endeavour to keep the box as long as he lived.

Malcolm, being asked his opinion of the prince, as one who had seen him in the extremes of both prosperous and adverse fortune, replied, that "he was the most cautious man he ever saw, not to be a coward, and the bravest, not to be rash." Amidst all the conflicting opinions regarding Charles's courage, this is perhaps the most satisfactory and nearest the truth which has been uttered, and, granting it to have been appropriate to his royal highness, he must be acknowledged to have possessed the character of a perfect soldier.

About ten days after he had parted with the prince, Malcolm was apprehended, put aboard a ship, and conveyed to London. Kingsburgh was also made prisoner, and conveyed first to Fort Augustus, and afterwards to Edinburgh Castle, where he lay a year and a day. The same party of soldiers (which had come to Skye in consequence of information forced from the boatmen on their return to South Uist) captured the gallant Flora MacDonald. All these three persons, at a time when the Habeas Corpus Act of Scotland was not suspended, were detained a twelvemonth without trial, and then discharged without being asked any questions; a violation of the liberty of the subject which seems to have been passed over unnoticed, in the terror with which the recent bloody triumphs of government had inspired the people, or which was perhaps rather owing to the maxim then apparently paramount in the public mind of England, that all the natives of Scotland had forfeited their rights as British subjects, and were now slaves subjected to military law. On being discharged from jail, Miss MacDonald was provided with a post-chaise, to convey her back to Scotland, by a Jacobite lady of quality resident in London; and, being desired to choose a person who might accompany her, named her fellow-sufferer, Malcolm. "And so," Malcolm used afterwards to observe, triumphantly; "I went up to London to be hanged, and returned in a brow post-chaise with Miss Flora MacDonald!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

CHARLES'S WANDERINGS—MAINLAND.

"The muir cock that crows o'er the brow of Ben-Connal,
He ken's o' his bed in a sweet mossy ham;
The eagle that soars o'er the cliffs of Clanranald, Unaw'd and undunted, his eyrie can claim;
The solan can sleep on his shelve of the shore;
The corncock roost on his rock of the sea;
But, oh! there is nae whose hard fate I deplore, Nor house, ha, nor haue in the country hae he.
The conflict is past, and our name is no more:
There's naught left but sorrow for Scotland and me."
Flora MacDonald's Lament.

Charles, after having spent upwards of two months in the isles, was now returning to the Mainland, where dangers as great awaited him. The country opposite Skye, upon which he intended to land, was that wild district where he had first reared the standard of his enterprise, and whose population was so entirely and so zealously devoted to him. In every respect it was well calculated to afford him shelter, except that it was in a great measure laid waste, and that the soldiery had subjected it to a peculiarly sharp system of surveillance. Hunted, however, as he had been, out of the Hebrides, and relying upon the fidelity of the people, which he had previously experienced on so many different occasions, he hesitated not to throw himself once more upon its protection. It eventually appeared that he could not have adopted a wiser course.

This district, as already mentioned, is indented in a remarkable manner by lochs or arms of the sea, which, stretching into the land from ten to twenty miles, form a series of mountainous promontories, from five to ten miles in length. For want of a better illustration, it may be compared to the fingers of the hand, stretched out and separated. Let the reader place his hand in this manner on a table, and, imagining the spaces betwixt his fingers to represent the sea, while the digits themselves rise eminently up like the hills between, he will have a tolerably good idea of the territory. Let him further conceive the space between his thumb and fore-finger to be Loch Houru, that betwixt his fore and third finger to be Loch Nevish, and that betwixt his mid and fourth to be Loch Morer, and that betwixt the fourth and the fifth to be Lochnanouagh, while the exterior of that digit represents Loch Sheil; and he will be better able to understand the nature of the dangerous circumstances in which Prince Charles was soon to be involved.

After a rough night voyage of thirty miles, during which they passed and were hailed by a boat containing armed militia, but which could not stop to inspect their company on account of the storm, Charles landed safe, with the boat's crew, about four in the morning of July 5th, at a place called Little Mallag, on the south side of Loch Nevish. Here the whole party slept three nights in the open fields. The old laird and one of the boatmen at length went in search of a cave for a lodging, and Charles, along with John MacKinnon and the other three men, took to the boat, and rowed up the Loch. In doubling a point, they had the misfortune to be espied and pursued by a boat's party of militia. In the chase which ensued, Charles was mainly indebted for his preservation to the zeal of his honest friend, MacKinnon, who, by voice and example, so animated the rowers, that they speedily outstripped the enemy. When they had got to some distance, and escaped observation by doubling another point, the boat was put to shore, and Charles, with John and one other companion, nimbly ascended the hill, while the rest remained to treat with the pursuers in case of being followed to their landing-place. On arriving at the summit of the hill, they had the satisfaction to see the boat which occasioned the alarm, returning from its fruitless pursuit.

The prince slept three hours on this eminence, and then returning to the boat, was rowed first across the loch to a little island near the seat of MacDonald of Scotchhouse, and afterwards back to Mallag, where he rejoined the old laird. The whole party then set out for the seat of MacDonald of Morer, which was situated at the distance of seven or eight miles across the promontory, betwixt Loch Nevish and Loch Morer. This journey, according to the familiar but not unapt illustration of the spread hand, was simply a movement across the terminating joint of the mid finger. Passing a shieling, in the course of the journey, and being espied by some people, the prince, apprehensive of recognition, desired John MacKinnon to fold his plaid for him in the correct Highland fashion, and throw it over his shoulder, with his knapsack upon it. Then, tying a handkerchief about his head, and assuming a menial air, he declared himself once more a servant. At this shieling the party was refreshed by a draught of milk from the hand of a grandson of MacDonald of Scotchhouse. Pursuing their journey, they came to another shieling, where they procured a guide to conduct them to Morer House, the object of their journey. On arriving there, the house was found to be burnt, and its master reduced to the necessity of living in a bothy or hut hard by. Nevertheless, Morer, who had been an officer in the prince's army, received his guests with all the kindness of a loyal-hearted Highlander, and, when he had given them such entertainment as his situation would permit, conducted them to a cave, where they might be assured of concealment. Here they slept ten hours, during which their kind landlord went in quest of young Clanranald, whom, however, he did not find. At his return, Charles expressed a resolution to part with the venerable Laird of MacKinnon, whose health and strength were inadequate to the fatigues of the journey, and to go with only John MacKinnon to Borodale, where he conceived himself sure of good entertainment. Morer having added his son, a boy, to the party, and provided a guide, Charles left the cave in the evening, crossed Loch Morer into Arasaig, and reached Borodale early in the morning.

The reader must now conceive Charles to have crossed over another finger, and to be established, as it were, on the lower or south side of the external joint of the third from the thumb. He must also now suppose the roots of the fingers to be all closed up, and traversed by a line of soldiers, so as to complete the insulation of the promontories, and enclose the unhappy wanderer within a circle of danger, from which it seemed impossible that he should escape alive. In more plain language, intelligence of his arrival at Loch Nevish having by this time reached the royal army, and they being assured that he must be skulking upon one or other of the promontories parallel with that arm of the sea, they had drawn a strong and well appointed chain of posts betwixt the head of Loch Houru and the head of Loch Sheil, certain of either capturing him in an attempt to pass through them, or driving him again back to sea, where he was equally liable to be taken up by the British cruisers. This chain consisted of single sentinels, planted within sight of each other. By day, these men were perpetually on the look-out for travellers, none of whom were permitted to pass without examination; and, by night, large fires being lighted at all the posts, they crossed continually from one to another, so as to leave no piece of ground within a space of twenty miles for more than a few minutes at a time unvisited. This system has an appearance of such excessive vigilance, that, at first sight, wonder is excited how the prince should have been able to baffle it. Yet it had one fault; and by taking advantage of it, an escape was achieved. The sentinels, it will be observed, crossed each other at the points exactly between the fires, each man going forward to his comrade's fire, and then returning to his own. Of course, after passing each other, their backs were mutually turned towards each other, and the space between them for a certain time left unobserved.

Charles, on being brought to Borodale, found the master of that house residing, like Morer, in a bothy, near the blackened ruins of his mansion. John MacKinnon, in handing the prince over to Borodale, said expressively, "I have done my duty, do you yours." "I am glad of the opportunity," was Borodale's answer, "and shall not fail to take care of his royal highness." John then returned home, and was captured just as he landed at his own house in Skye. Being conveyed to Kilvory, along with two of his rowers, who were taken with him, he was there examined, or rather required to disclose the place of the prince's concealment. On his refusing to do this, one of the men was seized, stripped naked, tied to a tree, and scourged with a cat-o'-nine-tails, till the blood gushed out of both his sides, in order to make him confess; and MacKinnon himself was threatened with similar treatment. However, he resisted all the cruel importunities of his captors, who were at length obliged to send him on board a transport, which conveyed him to London, where he remained in confinement till July 1747.

From Borodale Charles despatched one of his host's sons for MacDonald of Glenaladale, a gentleman of the Clanranald sept, who had accompanied him in his expedition as the major of that regiment. Soon after, learning that his aged friend, the Laird of MacKinnon, had been taken in his neighbourhood, he thought it necessary to shift his quarters; and accordingly, Borodale conducted him to a cave four miles to the eastward, which, being almost inaccessible, and known only to a few persons in the country, seemed to promise the most effectual possible concealment. He was accompanied to this place by Borodale and his son Ronald, who had been a lieutenant in Clanranald's own company.

Glenaladale, receiving the Prince's letter from the hands of its youthful bearer, on the 20th of July, lost no time in obeying its behest. Borodale next day received a letter from a gentleman of the district of Morer, his son-in-law, informing him that the fact of the prince's concealment on his lands was beginning to be whispered about, and representing that, as it would evidently be dangerous for him to remain any longer where he was, the writer of the letter had prepared a more eligible place of concealment in Morer, to which his royal highness ought immediately to repair. Ronald MacDonald was sent to reconnoitre this place, the prince resolving to remain where he was till assured by that young gentleman of its superiority to his present hiding-place. Next day, however, an alarm arising that a tender was hovering upon or approaching the coast, his royal highness thought proper to anticipate the report of his new quarter-master, by leaving the cave, and setting out towards Morer. Accompanied by Glenaladale, Borodale, and John, the younger son of the latter, he travelled till he came to a place called Corriebeine Cabir, where he was met by Borodale's son-in-law, who told him that Clanranald had come to a place not many miles off, in order to conduct his royal highness to a safe place, which he had prepared for that purpose. Charles was extremely anxious to throw himself upon the protection of this kind and faithful adherent; but the lateness of the evening, and his comparative proximity to the place prepared for him in Glen Morer, determined him to prefer that lodging for the night. Accordingly, he proceeded on his original route, intending to effect a junction with Clanranald next day.

Borodale, who had gone on before as an advanced guard, learning through the course of the night that General Campbell, with several men of war and a considerable body of troops, had anchored in Loch Nevis, while Captain Scot had brought another party into the lower part of Arisaig, waited upon the prince next morning (the 23d) with that alarming intelligence, which obliged him to decamp immediately, without attempting to join Clanranald. Being now completely surrounded with his enemies, and they being aware that they had environed him, it was necessary that he should take the most cautious measures. Leaving Borodale and another of his train behind, and only accompanied by Glenaladale and other two MacDonalds, so that the party might be as little conspicuous as possible, he set out early in the forenoon, and by mid-day reached the top of a hill called Scoorveig, at the eastern extremity of Arisaig, where he stopped to take some refreshment, while one of his attendants (John MacDonald, brother to Glenaladale), went to Glenfinnin for intelligence, and to appoint two men stationed there to join the prince that evening on the top of a hill called Sworninck Corrichan, above Locharkaig, in Lochiel's country. The prince soon afterwards set out, with his two remaining friends, and about two o'clock came to the top of a hill called Frughvain. Here observing some men driving cattle, Glenaladale walked forward to enquire the reason, and soon after returned with intelligence that they were his tenants flying before the approach of a strong body of troops, who had come to the head of Locharkaig, to prevent the prince from escaping in that direction. It was of course impossible to pursue that route, and the wanderers immediately despatched a messenger to Glenfinnin, which was only about a mile off, to recall Glenaladale's brother and the two men who were to have gone to Locharkaig. Glenaladale likewise sent a man to a neighbouring hill, for Donald Cameron of Glenpean, who had removed hither with his effects on the approach of the soldiers, and from his acquaintance with the country, promised to be an excellent guide. While they waited the return of these messengers, one of the tenants' wives, pitying the condition of her landlord, came up the hill with some new milk, for his refreshment. The prince, perceiving her approach, covered his head with a handkerchief, and assumed the appearance of a servant who had got a headache. The day was excessively warm, and the milk, of course, grateful to the palate of a way-worn traveller; but Glenaladale used afterwards to confess, that he could as well have spared the officious kindness of the good woman. It was with some difficulty, moreover, that he could get her dismissed without the pail in which she had brought the milk, so as to enable him with safety to give the prince a share more suitable to his real than his supposed rank.

The messenger who had been sent to Glenfinnin soon after returned, without having found Glenaladale's brother or the two men, (they having run off towards the place where they expected to find the party,) but brought intelligence that an hundred of the Argyll militia were approaching the very hill on which the prince was stationed. On this alarming news, the terrified party dislodged without waiting for Glenpean, and set forward on their perilous journey. About eleven at night, as they were passing through a hollow way between two hills, they observed a man coming down one of the hills towards them; upon which Charles and young MacDonald stepped aside, while Glenaladale advanced to discover whether he was friend or foe. This person turned out to be the very man they were most anxious to see, Donald Cameron of Glenpean, who had made all haste to overtake them after receiving their message. Glenaladale immediately brought him to the prince, who had lodged one night in his house soon after the battle of Culloden, and to whom he now recounted all he knew regarding the position of the king's troops. Then assuming the character of their guide, he set forward with them through a road so wild and rugged as to be almost impervious even in daylight.

Travelling all night with untiring diligence, they arrived next morning (July 24th,) at the top of a hill in the Braes of Locharkaig called Mamnyn-Callum, from whence they could perceive their enemy's camp, distant about a mile. Cameron knew that this hill had been searched the day before, and, therefore, conjecturing that it would not be again searched that day, counselled that they should take up their abode there till the evening, and endeavour in the meantime to procure the refreshment of sleep. They reposed for two hours, after which the whole party except the prince got up to keep sentry. They had not been long awake when they were alarmed by the appearance of a man at a little distance. Cameron, on account of his acquaintance with the country and its people, was selected to approach and accost this person, who, to the great joy of the whole party, turned out to be no other than Glenaladale's brother. This gentleman had no sooner discovered, on the preceding day, that the prince did not keep his appointment, than he began to wander in a state of extreme alarm through the country, in search of either of his royal highness, or of intelligence regarding his fate. The same apprehensions which he had entertained regarding the party, they had entertained regarding him; and it was now with sensations of the utmost pleasure that these unfortunate genlemen mutually congratulated each other upon a meeting which they had so little reason to expect.

Charles remained, with his trusty little band, upon the hill Mamnyn-Callum, all that day, without experiencing any disturbance from the soldiers. They set out about nine in the evening towards the south, and at one in the morning (July 25th,) came to Corrinangaul, on the confines of Knoidart and Locharkaig. Here Cameron hoped to fall in with, and procure provisions from, some of the people who had fled before the face of the encroaching soldiery. The party had been but poorly fed during their harassing and perilous march, and they now possessed only a little butter and some oatmeal, which they could not prepare for want of fire.

For two days the prince had now been skirting along the interior of that chain of sentries, which has been described as extending from Loch Houra to Loch Sheil. In his dreary and stealthy night journeys, he could distinctly see the fires which marked the posts of the enemy, and even hear the stated cries of the sentinels, as they slowly crossed backwards and forwards. These fires were placed at brief intervals, and every quarter of an hour, a patrolling party passed along to see that the sentinels were upon the alert. It seemed scarcely possible that this forlorn little party should evade or break from a toil whose meshes were at once so strong and so closely set. Yet the want of provisions, and the fear of being soon inextricably environed, rendered it unavoidably necessary that they should make the attempt, though it were only to anticipate their fate.

This desperate enterprise being fixed for the succeeding night, Glenaladale and Glenpean ventured down to some shielings, in search of provisions, while the prince and the other two MacDonalds remained upon the hill. The shielings were found to have been abandoned, and the two commissaries returned without their errand. It was then judged safe to shift from their present situation to a secret place upon the brow of a hill, at the head of Lochnaigh, which was about a mile from the position of the troops, and where they might expect to spend the intervening day in greater security. Here they slept for some time. After awaking, Glenpean and Glenaladale's brother were sent off to the hill above them, in quest of food, while Glenaladale and the younger MacDonald watched over the prince, who still remained asleep. The commissaries did not return till the afternoon, when two small cheeses proved all that they had been able to procure throughout the country. This was very dry food; and, as they did not know when they might get more, they were obliged to use it very sparingly. To increase the mortification of the unhappy prince, the commissaries reported that a troop of a hundred men were coming up the opposite side of the hill, in search of the fugitive country people, and that they possibly might light upon their place of concealment.

Under these distressing circumstances, it was his royal highness's wisest, or rather his only policy, to remain as closely concealed as possible. Notwithstanding, therefore, that the soldiers searched very narrowly, and all round him, he kept perfectly close, with his company, till eight in the evening, when, the search being done, they set out at a quick pace towards the steep hill called Drumachosi. On reaching the top of this eminence, they discerned the fires of a camp directly in their front, which they thought they could scarcely shun. Resolved, however, to make the attempt at all hazards, they approached the dreaded object till they could actually hear the soldiers talking to each other. Then creeping up the next hill, they spied the fires of another camp, which also seemed to lie directly in their path. Here they at last determined to make the attempt.

Cameron, at this juncture, with the true generosity of a Highlander, proposed to go forward himself, and, as it were, prove the possibility of escape, before permitting the prince to hazard his more precious person. "If I get safe through," he remarked, "and also return safe, then you may venture with greater security, and I shall be all the better fitted to conduct you." Be it remarked, he made this courageous proposal in the face of an owner which, though ridiculous enough, was perhaps sufficient to have unmanned a person who, with equal superstition, had not so noble or so exciting a cause to brace his nerves. He began to complain that his nose was itchy—a clear sign, he averred, that they had great dangers to go through. Charles, notwithstanding his perilous circumstances, could not help laughing at his fantastic alarm, though he must have been, at the same time, deeply impressed with admiration of the devotedness and real bravery of the Highlander.

Glenpean having put the passage to the proof, and, to the great joy of the company, returned in safety, the whole set forward, headed by him as guide. It was now about two o'clock in the morning, and the brilliancy of the fires was beginning to fade before the advancing lights of day. Betwixt the two posts which they intended to cross, there was a small mountain-stream, whose winter torrents had, in the course of ages, worn a deep channel among the rocks. Up this deep and narrow defile, at the moment when the sentinels were returning to the fires, and had their backs turned towards the place, the party crept, upon all fours, with the stealthy caution and quiet of a party of Indian savages. A few minutes sufficed to carry them to a place where they were completely screened from the observation of the enemy.

Having thus escaped from one of the greatest dangers which had yet environed him, Charles, whose spirits always displayed the elasticity characteristic of his country, gaily addressed Glenelg with an enquiry after the welfare of his nose. The good gentleman confessed it was a great deal better since they had passed the sentries, but that it was still "a wee yeuky." The prince accepted the reservation as a hint that they were not yet altogether out of danger.

After walking about two miles, they came to a place on the Glenelg side of the head of Loch Hour, where, finding what they considered a well-concealed spot, they called a halt and partook of some refreshments. As already mentioned, the commissariat was in a truly miserable state. Animal spirits, however, compensated every privation to Charles. Cutting a slice of cheese, which he covered with oatmeal, and seasoning that dry fare with a drink from the neighbouring spring, he contentedly stretched the form upon the cold ground, whose home, in the words of the old song, "should have been a palace." He passed the whole of the succeeding day in this place, without any improvement in his food.

It was now resolved, as the West Highlands had become so unsafe a place of residence, to repair northwards to a portion of the Mackenzies' country, which, on account of the loyalty of the inhabitants, had not been subjected to a military police. They decamped for this purpose about eight o'clock at night, when, to their indistinguishable alarm, they discovered that they had spent the day within cannon-shot of two of the enemy's posts, and that at this moment a company of soldiers were employed in their immediate neighbourhood in driving some sheep into a hut for slaughter. This, however, only hastened their march; and about three o'clock in the morning (July 27th,) they reached Glenshiel, a wild vale in the estate of the Earl of Seaforth. The little provision they had had, being now entirely exhausted, Glenaladale and Lieutenant MacDonald (Borodale's son,) were sent out upon the commissariat department, while Charles remained behind, with Cameron and the elder Lieutenant MacDonald, Glenaladale's brother. While Glenaladale was enquiring among some country people about a guide to conduct them to Pollew, where he learned that some French vessels had lately been seen, a Glengary man came running up, having been chased by soldiers out of his own country, where they had killed his father the day before. Glenaladale knew this man at first sight, and being aware that he had served in the prince's army, and was a man of honour, resolved to keep him in reserve as a guide to Glengary's country, in case he should not succeed in his present quest. Having then furnished himself with some provisions, he returned to the prince; and as soon as they had refreshed themselves, the whole party retired to a secure place on the face of an adjacent hill, in order to sleep. Getting up about four in the afternoon, they dismissed their faithful guide, Cameron, who could no longer be of any service. Soon after, Glenaladale, observing the Glengary fugitive passing in his way back to his own country, slipped out of his den, and, without disclosing his purpose, used arguments with the man to induce him to remain in a by place till such times as he could be sure of a guide to Pollew. He then returned to the prince, who approved of his precaution. About seven o'clock, the man whom he had employed to procure a guide to Pollew, brought intelligence, that the only French vessel which had been there was gone, and that a guide could not have been procured, even though that had not been the case. Glenaladale immediately dismissed the messenger, and brought this intelligence to the prince, whose course it was now resolved to change in the way proposed. Accordingly, the Glengary man being introduced to his royal highness, and having undertaken the high office, the whole party set out late at night towards the south, designing to form a junction, if possible, with Lochiel and some other chiefs, who, it was understood, still remained secure even in the vicinity of the enemy's forts.

Charles experienced at this juncture one of those providential deliverances, which induced so many of his adherents to believe that his life was under the immediate and constant care of Heaven, and which may at least be allowed to render the narrative of his wanderings one of the most remarkable ever penned. Before proceeding very far on this night's journey, Glenaladale, clapping his hand upon his side, declared he had lost his purse. As this contained forty guineas, which the prince had confided to him for the purchase of provisions, and which was the sole stock of the company, Glenaladale was extremely perplexed at the loss, and proposed to return to the place from whence they had just set out, in order to search for it. Charles opposed this measure, and used many entreaties to prevent it; but Glenaladale insisted upon the necessity of recovering a commodity so indispensable to them, and accordingly went back along with the younger lieutenant, while the prince, with Glenaladale's brother and the guide, remained behind to await their return. While Glenaladale was absent, Charles spied an officer and two private soldiers advancing under arms along the path which they had just left. Trembling with joy at so signal a deliverance, he and his friends retired behind a rock, where they could see the motions of the soldiers, without being seen by them. The men passed by, unconscious of the prize which had so nearly fallen into their hands. Though rejoicing in their own preservation, Charles and his two companions remained in a state of great anxiety for the safety of Glenaladale and his companion, who might chance to meet the enemy in their turn. On coming to their last resting place, these two gentlemen found the purse, but, upon opening it, discovered, to their mortification, that the gold was gone. "Reflecting," continues Glenaladale's Journal, "that it might have been taken away by a little boy whom their landlord had sent with a present of milk to Glenaladale, and whom they had left at the place where the purse was forgotten, they went back a mile farther to their landlord's house, whose name was Gilchrist MacRath, and through his means got the boy to restore all back, which he did to a trifle." Fortunately, in returning to the prince, they took a different route, and thus escaped the little party of soldiers, who must otherwise have met them. When the company was thus once more reunited in safety, they could not help returning thanks to Providence, which had first provided them with a good guide, and then ordered an accident which saved all their lives. Charles was now so thoroughly impressed with a belief of his immunity from danger, that he said he believed he "should not be taken though he had a mind to it."

They travelled all the remainder of the night, till they came to a hill side above Stratheluanie, where, choosing a secret place, they rested till three o'clock in the succeeding afternoon, (July 28.) Then setting out again, they had not walked above a mile along the hill side, till their feelings were agonised by hearing several shots fired on the top of the hill, which they rightly judged to be occasioned by the soldiers chasing and murdering the poor people who had fled thither with their cattle! They now steered their course northward, and late at night reached the top of a high hill betwixt the Braes of Glenmorriston and Strathglass, where they lodged all night, the prince reposing in an open cave, so narrow as not to permit him to stretch himself. This was one of the most uncomfortable nights Charles had ever spent. The rain had fallen heavily and incessantly, during the whole of the preceding day, and he was of course wet to the skin. There was no possibility of a fire to dry him. Without food, and deprived of sleep by the narrowness and hardness of his bed, the only comfort he could obtain was the miserable one of smoking a pipe. Thus was the man, whose birth, according to the general laws of nations, entitled him to the possession of a throne and a palace—who, indeed, according to the feudal system, upon which the country was originally constituted, had just as unalienable a right to its sovereignty as any landed proprietor within its bounds had to his peculiar inheritance—reduced to be, in all probability, the most wretched and destitute person who that night rested within the four seas of Britain.

Charles next morning reached the retreat which had been pointed out to him upon the hill of Corambiam, after having been for eight and forty hours without food. Seven men occupied this place, being neither more nor less than robbers. They had no house or hut to reside in, but sheltered themselves in a rocky cave upon the side of a hill, from whence they sallied occasionally to provide themselves with necessaries. Such men as these were common at that time in the Highlands, and for some years afterwards, being generally persons who had been proscribed for their concern in the insurrection, and who had therefore no other means of livelihood than by depredation. It affords a lively proof of the desperation of Charles's circumstances, that he should have been compelled to trust his life to men of such disorderly habits.

On approaching their den, Glenaladale and the guide went forward, leaving Charles and the other two MacDonalds. Six out of the seven men were present, and having killed a sheep that day, were just sitting down to dinner. Glenaladale said he was glad to see them so well provided, and they gave him a hearty welcome to share in their good cheer. Glenaladale said he had a friend with him, for whom he must ask the same favour. They enquired who this friend was, and he answered that it was his chief, young Clanranald. Nobody, they said, could be more welcome to them than young Clanranald, for whom they were willing to purchase food at the point of their swords. Glenaladale, assured of their fidelity, then went back for Charles, who immediately drew near. No sooner did they see the unfortunate prince, than they recognised him under his disguise, and fell down on their knees to do him homage. On being introduced to their cave, he lost no time in satisfying his hunger, which had by this time become almost intolerable.

The condition in which Charles was at this period, has been commemorated by Mr. Home, from the report of Hugh Chisholm, one of the robbers, who was in Edinburgh a good many years afterwards. Upon his head he had a wretched yellow wig and a bonnet. His neck was cinched by a dirty clotted handkerchief. His coat was of coarse dark coloured cloth; his vest of Stirling tartan, much worn. A belted plaid was his best garment. He had tartan hose, and Highland brogues tied with thongs, so much worn that they would scarcely stick upon his feet. His shirt, and he had not another, was of the colour of saffron. His good landlords soon provided him with a change of attire. Learning that a detachment of the king's troops, commanded by Lord George Sackville, was ordered from Fort Augustus to Strathglass, and knowing that they must pass at no great distance from their habitation, they lay in wait for it, at a part of the road suitable for their purpose, permitted the soldiers to pass and get out of sight, and then, attacking the servants with the baggage, seized some portmanteaus, in which they found every thing which the prince required.

Charles remained in his cave three days, when they thought proper (August 2d,) to remove to another about two miles off. He remained altogether about three weeks in the company of these men, during which they made several movements, but none of material importance. They sometimes went to Fort Augustus, which was never many miles from their place of residence, and, procuring what intelligence they could among the inhabitants, occasionally brought the newspapers of the day for Charles's perusal. About this time a circumstance occurred which tended to slacken the search which had hitherto been made for his royal highness. A young gentleman of Edinburgh, by name Roderick MacKenzie, who had been engaged in the prince's service, was skulking in the Braes of Glenmorriston, when he was surprised by a party of soldiers. Being a tall genteel youth, and somewhat resembling the prince in features, he might have passed for that personage with people not accustomed to see them together. He endeavoured to make his escape; but, being defeated in the attempt, he assumed a noble and undaunted air, and met his fate with the exclamation, "You have killed your prince!" The soldiers, overjoyed at their good fortune, and convinced that this was the object of their search, cut off his head, and brought it to Fort Augustus. Being there shown to various persons who had seen Charles, it was universally affirmed to be the head for which so much money had been offered. The Duke of Cumberland is said to have then set off to London, with the ghastly but valuable object stowed in his chaise; certain that he had at length accomplished the great object of his campaign, and extinguished for ever the most formidable rival of his family. It was not till he reached London, that the head was proved to be supposititious. By that time, many of the troops had been withdrawn from the Highlands, and Charles was in a great measure safe from those that remained.

On the 18th of August, Charles despatched Peter Grant, the most active of his seven attendants, from Glenmorriston where he then was, to Lochaber, with a message to any of the gentlemen of the name of Cameron whom he might meet, informing them that he wished to put himself under their protection. Grant went to Lochaber, and found Cameron of Clunes, who agreed to meet his royal highness on a particular day at a place near the head of Glencoch, where he had a little hut in a secret place for his own security. Charles set out with all his attendants, in number amounting to ten, on a very stormy night, and travelling along the tops of the mountains, reached Drumadial, a high mountain on the side of Loch Lochie which commands an extensive view of the country. There they rested all day, and Grant was despatched again, to see if Clunes had come to the place appointed. Charles and his attendants remained upon the hill, and as they had no provisions, and durst not stir to search for any, they were in great distress for want of food. Grant at length returned, with intelligence that Clunes not having found Charles at the time appointed, had gone away. In his return he had shot a buck, and secured it in a concealed place. At night they all set out for the place where the buck lay hid, and made a delicious meal of it, without bread or salt. Next morning, having despatched another messenger to search for Clunes, that gentleman came with his three sons. The faithful robbers then committed his royal highness to the care of his new protectors, and took their leave of him, all except Hugh Chisholm and Peter Grant, who remained with him some time longer.

Charles was now informed by Clunes, that all the ferries of the rivers and lakes were so strictly guarded, that it was impossible for him at present to reach the countries of Rannoch and Badenoch, where Lochiel and Cluny were: and that it was absolutely necessary he should remain where he was, till the vigilance of the guards abated. Clunes had a hut in a wood hard by, at the bottom of Locharkaig, to which he conducted the prince. Charles and Clunes skulked securely about this place for several days. When the weather was rough, and there were no troops apparent in the neighbourhood, they lodged in the hut; when otherwise, they remained upon the hill.

About this period, Lochiel and Cluny, who had hitherto remained concealed in the country south of the Chain, judging that the prince must be north of that tract of country, despatched MacDonald of Lochgary and Dr. Cameron (Lochiel's brother) to learn what they could concerning him. These messengers, well acquainted with the passes, made their way in safety to the north of the lakes, and very soon met Clunes, who told them he would conduct them to the object of their search.

Charles was at this moment sleeping on the hill, with one of Clunes's sons, while Peter Grant held watch. Grant happened to nod upon his post, and did not perceive the approaching party till they were very near. He instantly flew to awaken the sleepers. The party had a formidable appearance; for, besides Clunes, Lochgary, and Dr. Cameron, there were two servants; and at a little distance they looked like armed militia. Grant and young Cameron counselled an immediate flight to the top of the hill in the face of the enemy; but Charles resolved rather to keep close behind the loose stones amidst which they were skulking, and to fight the enemy in ambuscade. He represented that, in case of a flight, the militia would soon get within gun shot, and bring them down without resistance. "I am a good marksman," he said, "and can charge quick. I am therefore sure to do some execution." With Grant's assistance, he thought he might reduce the enemy to a level in point of numbers before coming to close quarters. Then he took out a brace of pistols which he had not previously shown, and expressed a hope to make these serviceable in the close struggle. Every thing considered, he hoped that they would repulse the advancing party, or at least die like brave men with arms in their hands. Grant acceded to a resolution so much in unison with his own dauntless spirit, and they had presented their muskets along the stones, and were almost on the point of firing, when fortunately the peculiar form of Clunes was distinguished in the party, which assured them they had nothing to fear.

Joy immediately took the place of desperation, and Charles could not help returning thanks to Heaven for having prevented him from destroying so many dear friends. His satisfaction was increased by receiving a message from his beloved friend Lochiel, for whose recovery, of which the doctor informed him, he thrice audibly thanked the Deity. At this period he has been described as wearing a shirt extremely soiled, an old black tartan coat, a plaid, and a philabeg. He was barefooted, and had a long beard. In his hand he carried a musket, and he had a dirk and pistol by his side. Notwithstanding the fatigues he had gone through, and though he had not enjoyed the luxury of a bed for several months, but had slept continually in the open air, he was both healthy and cheerful. His attendants had killed a cow the day before, and were preparing a portion of it when Dr. Cameron approached. At dinner he ate very heartily of this fare, and enjoyed himself over the novel luxury of some bread, which had been procured for his use from Fort Augustus.

Charles now expressed a wish to cross the Chain and join Lochiel; but this measure was considered premature by his attendants, on account of a statement having recently appeared in the newspapers, that he had gone over Corryarrack with Lochiel and thirty men, which would undoubtedly occasion a vigilant search in those parts. He was advised to remain where he was, as in all probability the attention of the troops would be withdrawn from the north of the Chain, while it was directed with proportionate closeness to the south. In the mean time, Dr. Cameron ventured into Lochaber to procure intelligence, and Lochgary posted himself upon the isthmus, betwixt the east end of Loch Lochy and the west end of Loch Linnhe, to watch the motions of the troops. The prince, at the same time, despatched his faithful attendant Glenaladale, who had shared every privation with him for a month past, to await the arrival of the French vessels which he now expected at Loch-nanuah in Arisaig, and to apprise him of that event whenever it should take place.

A few days after this dispersion of his friends, while Charles was sleeping upon the mountain side, with his few remaining attendants, he was roused at eight o'clock in the morning by a child, who exclaimed she saw a body of red coats. Looking down into the vale, the prince accordingly saw a troop of soldiers demolishing the hut, and searching the adjacent woods. This occurred in consequence of information which had been communicated to Fort Augustus. The party, in great alarm, ascended the face of the mountain, along the deep channel of a winter torrent, which prevented them from being seen. They then travelled to another hill called Mullantagart, which is prodigiously steep, high, and craggy. On the top of that eminence they remained all day without a morsel of food. In the evening, one of Clunes's sons came, and told them that his father would meet them at a certain place in the hills somewhat distant, with provisions. Charles set out for this spot, which was only to be reached by the most inaccessible paths. Toiling along amongst rocks and stumps of trees, which tore their clothes and limbs, they at length proposed to halt and rest all night. But Charles, though the most exhausted of all the party, insisted upon keeping their appointment with Clunes. After proceeding some way farther, Charles had to acknowledge himself utterly incapable of further exertion; when the generous Highlanders took hold of his arms and supported him along, though themselves tottering under the influence of this unparalleled fatigue. Almost perishing with hunger, and sinking under the dreadful exertions of the night, they at last reached their destination; where, to their great relief, they found Clunes and his son, with a cow which they had killed and partly dressed. Here they remained for a few days, till Lochgary and Dr. Cameron arrived with the welcome intelligence, that the passes were not now so strictly guarded, and that he might safely venture at least a stage nearer to Lochiel.

The prince now crossed Locharkaig, and was conducted to a fastness in the firwood of Auchnacary, belonging to Lochiel. Here he received a message from that chieftain and MacPherson of Cluny, informing him that they were in Badenoch, and that the latter gentleman would meet him on a certain day at the place where he was, in order to conduct him to their habitation, which they judged the safest place for him. Impatient to see these dear friends, he resolved not to wait for Cluny's coming, but to set out with such guides as he had. Accordingly, he decamped on the 28th of August, and, travelling all night, came next day to a place called Corineuir. He crossed the Chain or great Glen of Albyn in safety, and joined Lochiel at a place called Mallanauir, in that part of Badenoch which adjoins to the Braes of Rannoch.

Lochiel had resided in this part of the country for several months, accompanied by Cluny, the proprietor of the ground, and Dr. Stuart Thriepland, a gentleman of Perthshire. By this time he was almost recovered from the wounds received in his ankles at the battle of Culloden, but was still unable to walk without assistance. When Charles came to see him, he was residing in a miserable little hut, with MacPherson of Breakachie, Allan Cameron, his principal servant, and two servants of Cluny. On seeing the prince approach with his party of four persons under arms, he had nearly fallen into the same mistake which Charles and Peter Grant had lately escaped so narrowly—he took them for a party of militia, of whom he knew there was a troop stationed only four or five miles off. Under that apprehension, he had prepared his firearms, of which he possessed a considerable quantity, and was on the point of firing off a volley, when he recognised some of the persons composing the dreaded little band. On perceiving that the prince was among the number, he hobbled out as fast as he could to greet and welcome him. The meeting of these two friends is said to have been extremely affecting—so much did they love and admire each other, and so glad were they mutually to meet, after having been so long parted. Lochiel attempted to kneel before his beloved prince; but Charles, touching him on the shoulder, exclaimed, "Oh no, my dear Lochiel; we do not know who may be looking at us from yonder hills; and, if they see any such motions, they will immediately conclude that I am here." Lochiel then conducted him into the hut, where he found a better larder than he had had any experience of ever since the battle of Culloden. There was plenty of mutton, an anker of whiskey containing twenty Scots pints, some good beef sausages made the year before, plenty of butter and cheese, and a large well-cured bacon ham. The first thing he called for was a dram, which he drank to the health of all present. Some minced collops were then dressed for him with butter, in a large sauce pan which Lochiel and Cluny always carried about with them, and which was the only fire-vessel they had. "Now, gentlemen, I live like a prince," cried Charles, as he devoured the collops out of the pan with a silver spoon. He seemed quite elevated with the pleasures of the day—with meeting Lochiel, and finding food so superior to any he had lately eaten.

Two days after, Cluny, having gone to Auchnacary and found his royal highness gone, returned to Mallanauir. Upon his entering the hut, he would have knelt to Charles; but the prince prevented him, by taking him in his arms and kissing him. "I am sorry, Cluny," he said, "you and your regiment were not at the battle of Culloden; I did not hear till lately that you were so near us that day."

The day after Cluny arrived, thinking it time to remove from Mallanauir, he conducted the prince and his attendants to a little shieling termed Uiskichibra, which, though dreadfully snaky and uncomfortable, was more eligible in other respects as a place of concealment. Charles expressed no ill-humour at the desiguement of this miserable abode, in which they remained two days and nights. They then removed to a habitation the most remarkable in which Charles had yet been—a curious half-aerial house called the Cage, situated in the wild recesses of the great mountain of Benalder, and which seemed to promise the most effectual protection that could be desired.

Cluny's own description of "the Cage" has fortunately been preserved. "It was situated in the face of a very rough, high, and rocky mountain called Letternelick, a part of Benalder, full of great stones and crevices, and some scattered wood interspersed. The house was within a small thick bush of wood. There were first some rows of trees laid down, in order to knock a floor for the habitation; and as the place was steep, he raised the lower side to an equal height with the other; and those trees, in the way of joists or planks, were levelled with earth and gravel. There were between the trees, growing naturally on their own roots, some stakes fixed in the earth, which, with the trees, were interwoven with ropes, made of heath and birch twigs, up to the top of the Cage, it being of a round or oval shape; and the whole thatched or covered over with fog-moss. This whole fabric hung, as it were, by a large tree, which inclined from the one end, all along the roof to the other, and which gave it the name of the Cage. By chance there happened to be two stones at a small distance from one another, in the side next the precipice, resembling the pillars of a chimney, where the fire was placed. The smoke had its vent out here, all along the face of the rock, which was so much of the same colour, that one could discover no difference in the clearest day. The Cage was no larger than to contain six or seven persons; four of whom were frequently employed playing at cards, one idle looking on, one baking, and the other firing bread and cooking."

Charles resided in this romantic retreat from the 2d till the 13th of September; and it was destined to be his last place of concealment in Scotland. Two French vessels, despatched on purpose to bring him off, early this month anchored in Lochnanuah; and Glenaladale, according to appointment, set off for the place where he had left the prince, to inform him of the joyful event. The good gentleman found Charles away, nor was Clunes at hand to give him notice of his new place of retreat. Fortunately, as he was wandering about, a poor woman accidentally met him, and gave him a direction to Clunes's place of concealment. On finding that gentleman, a message was instantly despatched to Benaider; and Glenaladale then returned to Lochnaugh, to inform the ships' crews that Charles would be with them as soon as possible.

Charles, on receiving this delightful intelligence, immediately left the Cage, with Lochiel, Lochgary, John Roy Stuart, and several other friends; and, travelling only by night, reached Moidart upon the 19th. As care had been taken to inform as many brethren in distress as were within reach, of the opportunity of escape which now presented itself, a considerable company soon assembled upon the shore opposite to the vessels. Charles was destined, like the hare which returns after a hard chase to the original form from which it set out, to leave Scotland, where he had undergone so long and so deadly a chase, precisely at the point where he had first set his foot upon its territory. Under what different auspices did he first see the wild hills around Lochnaugh fourteen months before! He was then in the hey-day of hope—a kingdom lying open before him ready to be reaped by his sword—friends thronging around him with hopes as high as his own—and the country, by its tranquillity, apparently inviting him to proceed. Now, ragged and forlorn—his person shattered by the inclemencies of nature, and his mind agonised by the dejection of his fortunes—he stood amidst a troop of half-starved and half-naked fugitives, of whose misfortunes he was in one sense the cause—the country all round him teeming to his alarmed imagination with fiends thirsting for his life—and every thing seeming to inform him that the brilliant hopes he had so long entertained were now for ever extinguished. With a judicious affectation of resolution, he proclaimed to the friends whom he left, that he would soon be back from France, with a force which should set his pretensions at rest; he also hoped to fight yet one other glorious battle by the side of his brave Highlanders, and then to reward them for the valour, the fidelity, and the kindness, which they had so devotedly displayed in his behalf. But the wretchedness of his present appearance was strangely inconsistent with the magnificence of his professed hopes. The many noble spirits who had already perished in his behalf, and the unutterable misery which his enterprise had occasioned to a wide tract of country, returned to his remembrance, and, looking round him, he saw the tear starting into many a brave man's eye, as it cast a farewell look back upon the country which it was never again to behold. To have maintained a show of resolution, under circumstances so affecting, was impossible. He had drawn his sword in the energy of his harangue; but he now sheathed it, with a force which spoke his agitated feelings; he gazed a minute in silent agony, and finally burst into a flood of tears. Upwards of an hundred unfortunate gentlemen accompanied him on board; when the anchor being immediately raised, and the sails set, the last of the Stuarts was quickly borne away from the country of his fathers.

Thus did Charles end a series of adventures, such as few princes had ever encountered before him. His career was distinguished at first by extravagant daring and miraculous success. The sun of his fortune afterwards declined amidst a shower of blood. Then, a proscribed fugitive, with a price set upon his head, he spent five months in a state of perpetual alarm, enduring fatigues, hunger, and exposure to the elements, enough to have killed most men. The dangers which he escaped during that period were manifold. His preservation is in a great measure to be ascribed to his own sagacity and fortitude; but it could never have been achieved without the concurrence of the generous people amongst whom he was cast. The constancy displayed by the Highlanders on this occasion was beyond all praise. They showed that a rude state of society is not without its virtues, and that poverty can sometimes be incorruptible. Charles's life was intrusted to several hundred individuals, many of them in the lowest grade of humble life; and some of them even belonging to what modern civilization would term the vicious. Yet not one seems to have ever so much as entertained the idea of giving him up, but all endeavoured, to the utmost of their power, to further his escape, even at the risk of their own lives. The generosity of their behaviour is said to have recommended them, for the first time, to the respect of the English people; who saw from this, that unswerving principle, and pure and lofty feeling, might reside under the tartan and blue bonnet of Scotland, as well as beneath the silk and fine linen of the South.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

TRIALS AND EXECUTIONS.

Tit. O reverend tribunes! gentle aged men!
Unbind my sons, reverse this doom of death,
And let me say, who never wept before,
My tears have been prevailing orators.
Luc. Oh noble father, you lament in vain;
The tribunes hear you not,
And you recount your sorrows to a stone.

Titus Andronicus.

Long before Charles's escape, a multitude of his followers, less fortunate than him, had met a cruel and bloody death upon the scaffolds of England. The vengeance of government, after their final victory, had been precisely apportioned to their previous panic and pusillanimity; and, in the emphatic language used by Johnson on the occasion, it was now necessary that statutes should reap the refuse of the sword. We are never so apt to commit an act of inhumanity as during the surprise and agitation which follows personal danger; and even the annoyance of a harmless fly will sometimes provoke us to an act at which, in cooler moments, we would shudder. On the same principle, the rulers of this time, though perhaps not naturally cruel, displayed a blood-thirstiness and immitigable desire of vengeance, which no doubt appeared justified by the occasion, but of which they must have afterwards repented.

The officers of the English regiment taken at Carlisle were the first victims of this sanguinary calature. Eighteen of these unfortunate gentlemen, at the head of whom was Townly their colonel, were tried before a grand jury, at the Court-house on St. Margaret's Hill, Southwark, in the county of Surrey, on the 15th of July, and four following days. All were condemned to death except one; and, on the 29th of the month, an order came to their place of confinement, ordering the execution, on the succeeding day, of nine who were judged to be most guilty, namely, Francis Townly, George Fletcher, Thomas Chadwick, James Dawson, Thomas Deacon, John Berwick, Andrew Blood, Thomas Syddal, and David Morgan; the other eight being reprieved for three weeks.

These ill-fated persons were roused from sleep at six o'clock in the morning of July 30th, to prepare for their execution. On coming down into the courtyard of their prison, they ordered coffee to be got ready for their breakfast. The firmness which they displayed throughout the whole scene was very remarkable. Only Syddal, of all the rest, was observed to tremble when the halter was put about his neck; and he, to conceal his agitation from the spectators, took a pinch of snuff. When their irons had been knocked off, their arms pinioned, and the ropes adjusted about their necks, they were put into three sledges, to each of which three horses were attached. In the first sledge, along with Townly, Blood, and Berwick, the executioner sat with a drawn scimitar. The procession was accompanied by a party of footguards.

Kennington Common was the place appointed for their execution; and as the spectacle was expected to be attended with all those circumstances of barbarity awarded by the English law of treason, the London mob had assembled in extraordinary numbers to witness it. A pile of faggots and a block were placed near the gallows; and while the prisoners were removing from their sledges into the cart from which they were to be turned off, the faggots were set on fire, and the guards formed a circle round the place of execution. The prisoners were not attended by clergymen of any persuasion; but Morgan, who had been a barrister-at-law, read prayers and other pious meditations from a book of devotion; to which the rest seemed very attentive, joining in all the responses and ejaculations with great fervour. Half an hour was spent in these exercises, during which they betrayed no symptoms of irresolution; though their deportment was said to be perfectly suitable, at the same time, to their unhappy circumstances. On concluding prayers, they took some written papers from their books, and threw them among the spectators. These were found to contain declarations, to the effect that they died in a just cause, that they did not repent of what they had done, and that they doubted not but their deaths would be avenged, together with some expressions which were considered treasonable. They likewise delivered papers severally to the sheriff, and then threw away their hats, some of which were gold-laced—for they were all dressed like gentlemen; and it is said that these pieces of dress were found to contain other treasonable papers. Immediately after, the executioner pulled their caps out of their pockets, put them on, and drew them over their eyes; and then they were turned off. When they had been suspended three minutes, the soldiers went in under the bodies, drew off their shoes, white stockings, and breeches; and the executioner pulled off the rest of their clothes. When they had been stripped perfectly naked, the last mentioned official cut down Mr. Townly, and laid him on the block. Observing the body to retain some signs of life, he struck it several violent blows upon the breast, for the humane purpose of rendering it totally insensible to what remained. These not having the desired effect, he cut the throat. The verenda were first cut off, and thrown into the fire. Then cutting open the body, he took out the bowels and heart, which he also threw into the fire, and finally, with a cleaver, separated the head from the body, and put both into a coffin. Mr. Morgan was next cut down, and after him the rest, the executioner unbewailing and beheading them one by one, as he had done Mr. Townly. On throwing the last heart into the fire, which was that of James Dawson, he cried with a loud voice, "God save King George!" and the spectators responded with a shout. When this barbarous ceremony was concluded, the mutilated bodies were conveyed back to prison on the sledges; and the heads of Townly and Fletcher were three days after affixed upon Temple-Bar, while those of Deacon, Berwick, Chadwick, and Syddal, were preserved in spirits, in order to be disposed in the same way at Carlisle and Manchester. Townly's body was buried at Pancras; but those of the others were interred in the burying-ground near the Foundling Hospital.

The mob of London had hooted these ill-fated gentlemen on their passage to and from their trials; but at the execution they looked on with faces betokening at least pity for their misfortunes, if not also admiration of their courage. A circumstance, observed at the time, excited a good deal of commiseration amongst the crowd. This was the appearance at the place of execution of Charles Deacon, a very youthful brother of one of the culprits, himself a culprit, and under sentence of death for the same crime, but who had been permitted to attend the last scene of his brother's life in a coach, along with a guard. Another circumstance still more affecting came afterwards to the knowledge of the public. James Dawson, the son of a gentleman of Lancashire, and who had not completed his studies at St. John's College, Cambridge, was attached to a young lady, of good family and fortune, at the time when some youthful excesses induced him to run away from college and join the insurgents. Had he been acquitted, or if he could have obtained the royal mercy, the day of his enlargement was fixed by the parents of both parties to have been that of their marriage. When it was ascertained that he was to suffer the cruel death which has just been described, the inconsolable young lady determined, notwithstanding the remonstrances of her friends, to witness the execution; and she accordingly followed the sledges, in a hackney-coach, accompanied by a gentleman nearly related to her, and one female friend. She got near enough to see the fire which was to consume her lover's heart, besides all the other dreadful preparations for his fate, without being guilty of any of those extravagances which her friends had apprehended. She also succeeded in restraining her feelings during the progress of the bloody tragedy. But when all was over, and the shouts of the multitude rung her lover's death-peal in her ears, she drew her head back into the coach, and crying, "My dear, I follow thee, I follow thee—sweet Jesus, receive both our souls together," fell upon the neck of her companion, and expired in the very moment she was speaking.

Previous to this period, bills of indictment having been found, by the Grand Jury of Surrey, against the Earls of Kilmarnock and Cromarty, and Lord Balmerino, these three noblemen were tried by the House of Peers, on Monday the 28th of July. This high solemnity was conducted with great state. A hundred and thirty-five peers were present. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke acted on the occasion, as lord high steward, or president of the assembly. Westminster Hall was fitted up in a most magnificent manner for the purpose. Mr. George Ross was appointed solicitor for Kilmarnock and Balmerino, and Mr. Adam Gordon for Cromarty, at their own request.

The three rebel lords, as they were styled, proceeded from the Tower, early in the forenoon, towards Westminster Hall; Kilmarnock in Lord Cornwallis's coach, attended by General Williamson, deputy-governor of the Tower; Cromarty in General Williamson's coach, attended by Captain Marshall; and Balmerino in another coach, accompanied by Mr. Fowler, gentleman jailer, who had the axe covered by him. A strong guard of soldiers paraded along side of the coaches. The Court, who had likewise moved in a procession from the House of Peers to the Hall, being duly met, and proclamation having been made for the appearance of the prisoners, they were brought to the bar, preceded by the gentleman jailer, who carried the axe with its edge turned away from them. When reciprocal compliments had passed between the prisoners and their peers, the indictments were read; to which Kilmarnock and Cromarty successively pleaded "Guilty," recommending themselves to the king's mercy. Balmerino, before pleading to his indictment—that is to say, before avowing himself guilty or not guilty,—asked the lord high steward if it would avail him any thing to prove that he was not at the siege of Carlisle, as specified in the indictment, but ten miles distant. His grace answered, that it might or might not be of service, according to the circumstances; but he begged to remind his lordship that it was contrary to form to allow the prisoner to ask any questions before pleading; and he therefore desired his lordship to plead. "Plead!" cried Balmerino, who knew nothing of the technicalities of an English court, and whose bold blunt mind stood in no awe of this august assembly; "why, I am pleading as fast as I can." The steward explained what was meant by pleading, and his lordship then pleaded, "Not guilty." The court immediately proceeded to his trial, which was soon despatched. King's counsel were heard in the first place, and five or six witnesses were then examined in succession; by whom it was proved, that his lordship entered Carlisle, though not on the day specified, at the head of a cavalry regiment, called from his name Elphinstone's Horse, with his sword drawn. The prisoners had no counsel; but Balmerino himself made an exception which was overruled. The lord high steward then asked if he had any thing further to offer in his defence; to which his lordship answered, that he was sorry he had given the court so much trouble, and had nothing more to say. On this, the lords retired to the house of peers; and the opinion of the Judges being asked touching the overt act, they declared that it was not material, as other facts were proved beyond contradiction. They then returned to the hall; where the steward, according to ancient usage, asking them one by one, (beginning with the youngest baron,) "My Lord of —, is Arthur Lord Balmerino guilty of high treason?" each answered, clapping his right hand upon his left breast, "Guilty, upon my honour, my lord." The prisoners were afterwards recalled to the bar, informed of the verdict of the court, and remanded to the Tower till the day after next, when they were again to appear, in order to receive sentence. The House immediately broke up, and the prisoners were conveyed back to prison, with the edge of the axe turned towards them.

When the court met again, on the 30th, the lord high steward made a speech to the prisoners, and asked each of them, "If he had any thing to offer why judgment of death should not pass against him?" To this question, Kilmarnock replied in a speech expressive of the deepest contrition for his conduct, and imploring the court to intercede with the king in his behalf. He represented, that he had been educated in revolution principles, and even appeared in arms in behalf of the present royal family; that, having joined the insurgents in a rash moment, he had immediately repented the step, and resolved to take the first opportunity of putting himself into the hands of government; for this purpose, he had separated himself from his corps at the battle of Culloden, and surrendered himself a prisoner, though he might easily have escaped. He, moreover, endeavoured to make merit with the court, for having employed himself solicitously during the progress of the insurrection, in softening the horrors which the war had occasioned in his country, and in protecting the royalist prisoners from the abuse of their captors. Finally, he made a declaration of affection for the reigning family, not more incredible from his past actions than it was humiliating in his present condition; and concluded with an asseveration, that, even if condemned to death, he would employ his last moments in "praying for the preservation of the illustrious house of Hanover." The Earl of Cromarty pronounced a speech of nearly the same complexion, but concluding with a more eloquent appeal to the clemency of his majesty. "Nothing remains, my lords," he said, "but to throw myself, my life, and fortune, upon your lordship's compassion. But of these, my lords, as to myself, is the least part of my sufferings. I have involved an affectionate wife, with an unborn infant, as parties of my guilt, to share its penalties; I have involved my eldest son, whose infancy and regard for his parents hurried him down the stream of rebellion; I have involved also eight innocent children, who must feel their parent's punishment before they know his guilt. Let them, my lords, be pledges to his majesty; let them be pledges to your lordships; let them be pledges to my country, for mercy; let the silent eloquence of their grief and tears; let the powerful language of innocent nature supply my want of eloquence and persuasion; let me enjoy mercy, but no longer than I deserve it; and let me no longer enjoy life than I shall use it to efface the crime I have been guilty of. Whilst I thus intercede to his majesty, through the medium of your lordships, let the remorse of my guilt as a subject—let the sorrow of my heart as a husband—let the anguish of my mind as a father—speak the rest of my misery. As your lordships are men, feel as men; but may none of you ever suffer the smallest part of my anguish. But if, after all, my lords, my safety shall be found inconsistent with that of the public, and nothing but my blood can atone for my unhappy crime; if the sacrifice of my life, my fortune, and family, is judged indispensably necessary for stopping the loud demands of public justice; and if the bitter cup is not to pass from me; not mine, but thy will, O God, be done."

The mind of Balmerino was superior to such humiliation as this. When the question was put to him, he pleaded, that an indictment could not be found in the county of Surrey, for a crime laid to be committed at Carlisle in December last, in regard that the act ordaining the rebels to be tried in such counties as the king should appoint, which was not passed till March, could not have a retrospective effect; and he desired to be allowed counsel. On this, the Earl of Bath asked if the noble lord at the bar had any counsel allowed him, and was answered that he had never desired any. Balmerino replied, that all the defences which had occurred to him or his solicitor having been laid before a counsellor, and by him judged to be trifling, he had not chosen to give the court needless trouble; and that the above objection had only been hinted to him an hour or two before he was brought into court. After some altercation, the court assigned Messrs. Wilbraham and Forrester, as counsel to his lordship, and adjourned till the 1st of August.

Being again brought to the bar on that day, the Earls of Kilmarnock and Cromarty were again asked if they had any thing to propose why judgment of death should not pass upon them, and answered in the negative. The lord high steward informed Balmerino that, having started an objection, desired counsel, and had their assistance, he was now to make use of it, if he thought fit. His lordship answered that his counsel having satisfied him there was nothing in the objection that could do him service, he declined having them heard; that he would not have made the objection, if he had not been persuaded there was ground for it; and that he was sorry for the trouble he had given his grace and the peers. All the prisoners having thus submitted to the court, the lord high steward made a long and pathetic speech, which he concluded by pronouncing sentence in these words: "The judgment of the law is, and this high court doth award, that you William Earl of Kilmarnock, George Earl of Cromarty, and Arthur Lord Balmerino, and every of you, return to the prison of the Tower, from whence you came; from thence you must be drawn to the place of execution; when you come there, you must be hanged by the neck; but not till you are dead; for you must be cut down alive; then your bowels must be taken out, and burnt before your faces; then your heads must be severed from your bodies; and your bodies must be divided each into four quarters; and these must be at the king's disposal. And God Almighty be merciful to your souls!" After sentence was passed, the prisoners were withdrawn from the bar, and the lord high steward, standing up uncovered, broke his staff, and announced that his commission was dissolved.

The Earl of Kilmarnock, who was only in his forty-second year, and extremely anxious for life, immediately presented a petition for mercy to the king, together with others to the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cumberland, entreating them to intercede in his behalf with their royal father. The tenor of these petitions was much the same with that of his speech, equally penitential and humble, and equally unworthy of his birth, rank, and former character. That to the duke contained a vindication of himself from some aspersions which had reached his royal highness, and which he understood had prejudiced that personage against him. It had been whispered that the earl was concerned in the order said to have been found in the pocket of a prisoner after the battle of Culloden, and that, moreover, he had exercised sundry other cruelties upon the prisoners in the hands of the insurgents. Both of these charges he distinctly denied—and probably with truth; though the assertion that he had voluntarily surrendered himself to government, contained in his speech, and in the petition to the king, was afterwards confessed by himself to have been made only with the view of moving his majesty to mercy.

The Earl of Cromarty, whose share in the insurrection

had been much less conspicuous, and who had not, like Kilmarnock, added ingratitude to his other misdemeanours, made similar efforts to obtain the royal grace. The countess went about, after the sentence had been pronounced, delivering petitions in person to all the lords of the cabinet-council; and on the following Sunday, she went in mourning to Kensington Palace, to petition majesty itself. When the interesting condition of this lady is considered, it must be allowed that a more powerful mode of intercession could not have been adopted. She way-laid the king as he was going to chapel, fell upon her knees before him, seized the hem of his coat, and, presenting a petition, fainted away at his feet. His majesty raised her up with his own hand, received her petition, and gave it to the Duke of Grafton, who was in attendance; desiring Lady Stair, who accompanied Lady Cromarty, to conduct her to an apartment where care might be taken of her. A day or two after, the Dukes of Hamilton and Montrose, the Earl of Stair, and several other courtiers, interceded with his majesty in the unfortunate earl's behalf.

Balmerino made no effort to save his life, but behaved after this period as one who had resigned himself to death, and who despises those who are to inflict it. On learning that his two brothers in affliction had made their applications for mercy, he said, with a sneer, that, as they had such great interest at court, they might have suggested his name in with their own. On a gentleman calling upon him a week after his sentence, and apologizing for intruding upon the few hours which his lordship had to live, he replied, "Oh, sir, no intrusion at all—I have done nothing to make my conscience uneasy. I shall die with a true heart, and undaunted; for I think no man it is live, who is not fit to die; nor am I any ways concerned at what I have done."

The Earl of Cromarty received a pardon on the 5th of August, and on the 11th an order was signed in council for the execution of Lords Kilmarnock and Balmerino. Cromarty and Kilmarnock had both alike hoped for pardon, and most people expected that Balmerino would be the only victim. But the resentment of the king at Kilmarnock's ingratitude, and the unfavourable impression which the Duke of Cumberland had received of his character, together with the gross prevarications upon which he had grounded his claims for mercy, determined it was supposed, that he should also perish. Two writs therefore, passed the great seal on the 12th, empowering the Lord Cornwallis, constable of the tower, to draw the bodies of the Earl of Kilmarnock and Lord Balmerino to the sheriffs of London, for execution, on the 18th.

Nothing could mark more strongly the different characters of these two unfortunate noblemen, than the way in which each respectively received intelligence of the final order. It was communicated to Kilmarnock by Mr. Foster, a dissenting or presbyterian clergyman, who had spent some time before with his lordship in religious exercises, and in some measure prepared his mind for the dreadful announcement. When the words of doom fell upon the ear of the culprit, their force was softened by the religious consolations with which they were accompanied; and Kilmarnock received them with tranquillity and resignation of a true Christian. Balmerino, on the contrary, heard the news with all the weakness and levity with which he might have some months before received an order for some military movement. He was sitting at dinner, with his lady, when the warrant arrived; and, on her starting up distractedly and swearing away, he coolly proceeded to recover her by the usual means, and then, remarking that it should not make him lose his dinner, sat down again to table as if nothing had happened. He could even scarcely help chiding her for the concern she had displayed in his behalf, requesting her to resume her seat at table, and absolutely begging when she declared her inability to eat. The gentle pity and resignation of Kilmarnock excited universal admiration and pity among the whigs, while the indifference of Balmerino was hailed, by his own party, as the trait of a martyr.

The day appointed for the execution was Monday the 18th of August. On the Saturday preceding, General Williamson thought proper to give Kilmarnock an account of all the circumstances of solemnity and outward terror which would accompany it. He informed his lordship that, about ten in the morning, the sheriffs would come to demand the prisoners, who would be delivered to them at the gate of the tower; that from thence, if their lordships thought proper, they should walk on foot to the house appointed on Tower-hill for their reception, where the rooms would be hung with black, to make the more decent and solemn appearance, and that the scaffold would also be covered with black cloth; that his lordship might repose and prepare himself, in the room fitted up for him, as long as he thought convenient, remembering only that the warrant for execution was limited to one o'clock; that, because of a complaint made by Lord Kilmarnock in 1716, that the block was too low, it was raised to the height of two feet; that, to fix it the more firmly, props would be placed directly under it, that the certainty or decency of the execution might not be obstructed by any concussion or sudden jerk of the body. In all this Lord Kilmarnock expressed his satisfaction. But, when informed that two mourning-hearse would be placed close by the scaffold, so that, when the heads were struck off, the coffins might soon be taken out to receive the bodies, he said it would be better to have the coffins upon the scaffold, for by that means the bodies would be sooner removed out of sight. Being further informed, that an executioner was provided, who, besides being expert, was a very good sort of man, he exclaimed, "General, this is one of the worst circumstances that you have mentioned. I cannot thoroughly like, for a work of this kind, your good sort of men. One of that character must be tender-hearted and compassionate; and a rougher and less sensible person would be much more fit for the office. He then requested that four persons might be appointed to receive the head, when it was severed from the body, in a red cloth, in order that it might not, as he had been informed, was the case in some former executions, roll about the scaffold, and be thereby mangled and disfigured; adding, that this was a small circumstance in comparison, but he was not willing that his body should be exposed to any unnecessary indecency after the just sentence of the law had been executed. Throughout this trying conversation, his lordship is said to have maintained as much composure as the least compassionate reader can do in perusing mere report of it. General Williamson advised him, in conclusion, to think frequently on the circumstances of his death-scene, in order that they might make the less impression when presented to his senses.

At six o'clock in the morning of the day of execution, a troop of life-guards, a troop of horse grenadier guards, and about a thousand foot guards, drew themselves up on Tower Hill, in the form of a battledore—the round part enclosing the scaffold, and the handle, formed by two lines, extending to the lower gate, with a proper space between for the procession to pass. At eight o'clock, the sheriffs of London, their under-sheriffs, and their officers, namely, six sergeants at mace, six yeomen, and the executioner, met at the Mitre Tavern, in Fenchurch street, where they breakfasted. They then went to the house hired by them for the reception of the prisoners, which was about thirty yards distant, and in front of which the scaffold had been erected. At nine o'clock, the block was fixed, covered with black cloth, and several sacks of saw-dust were provided, to be thrown upon the scaffold. Soon after, the two coffins were brought upon the scaffold. These were covered with black cloth, ornamented with gilt nails, and upon that of Lord Kilmarnock was a plate with this inscription, "Gulielmus Comes de Kilmarnock, decolatus 18^o Augusti 1746, ætatis sue 42," with an earl's coronet over it; while Balmerino's bore, "Arthurus Dominus de Balmerino, decolatus 18^o Augusti 1746. Ætatis sue 58," surmounted by the coronet of a baron.

These preparations over, the officers to whom the management of the execution was by law assigned, went in procession to the Tower, and knocked at the gate, when the warder within asked, "Who's there?" and was answered by an officer, "The sheriffs of London and Middlesex." According to ancient usage, the warder asked, "What do they want?" and the officer answered, "The sheriffs of William, Earl of Kilmarnock, and Arthur, Lord Balmerino." The warder said, "I will go and inform the lieutenant of the tower." When General Williamson subsequently informed the Earl of Kilmarnock that the sheriffs were waiting for the prisoners, his lordship, having completely prepared himself for the terrible announcement, was not in the least degree agitated, but said, calmly, "General, I am ready, and will follow you." In going down stairs, he met Balmerino at the first landing-place, who embraced him affectionately, and said, "My lord, I am heartily sorry to have your company in this expedition." The two unfortunate noblemen were then conducted to the Tower gate, and delivered over to the sheriffs, who gave receipts to the deputy-lieutenants for their persons. As they were leaving the Tower, the deputy-lieutenant, according to custom, cried, "God bless King George!" to which Kilmarnock made a bow, while the inflexible Balmerino exclaimed, "God bless King James!" The procession moved in a slow and solemn manner towards the house prepared for the reception of the lords; Kilmarnock, attended by Mr. Sheriff Blackford, with Messrs.

Foster and Home, two presbyterian clergymen, and Balmerino, supported by Mr. Sheriff Cockayne, accompanied by the chaplain of the Tower and another minister of the episcopalian persuasion. As they were moving along, some person was heard to exclaim from the surrounding crowd, "Which is Balmerino?" when that nobleman instantly turned half round, and politely said, "I am Balmerino." Two hearses and a mourning coach followed the procession, adding an inexpressible solemnity and gloom to a scene already as melancholy as can be conceived.

On arriving within the area around the scaffold, the two lords were conducted into separate apartments in the house fitted up for their reception, where their friends were admitted to see them. The walls of this house were hung with black, as well as the passage leading from it to the scaffold, and the scaffold itself, at the expense of the sheriffs. When the pageant had come to the scaffold, the troops which lined the road from the Tower closed in behind the rest, and the scaffold was thus surrounded by soldiers six deep.

About eleven o'clock, Lord Kilmarnock received a message from Lord Balmerino, requesting an interview; which being consented to, Balmerino was introduced into Kilmarnock's apartment. The conversation which took place, is reported by Mr. Foster to have been precisely as follows:—BALMERINO. "My lord, I beg leave to ask your lordship one question."—KILMARNOCK. "To any question, my lord, that you shall think it proper to ask, I believe I shall see no reason to decline giving an answer."—B. "Why, then, my lord, did you ever see or know of any order, signed by the prince, to give no quarter at Culloden?"—K. "No, my lord."—B. "Nor I, neither; and therefore, it seems to be an invention to justify their own murders."—K. "No, my lord, I do not think that inference can be drawn from it; because, while I was at Inverness, I was informed by several officers that there was such an order, signed 'George Murray'; and that it was in the duke's custody."—B. "Lord George Murray! Why, then, they should not charge it upon the prince." His lordship then took his leave, embracing his fellow prisoner with great tenderness, and saying to him, "My dear lord Kilmarnock, I am only sorry that I cannot pay all this reckoning alone. Once more, farewell for ever!"

Lord Kilmarnock spent nearly an hour after this conversation, in devotion with Mr. Foster and the gentleman attending him, and in making declarations that he sincerely repented of his crime, and had resumed at this last hour his former attachment to the reigning family. His rank giving him a dreadful precedence in what was to ensue, he was led first to the scaffold. Before leaving the room, he took a tender farewell of all the friends who attended him. When he stepped upon the scaffold, notwithstanding all his previous attempts to familiarise his mind with the idea of the scene, he could not help being somewhat appalled at the sight of so many dreadful objects; and he muttered in the ear of one of the attendant clergymen, "Home, this is terrible!" He was habited in dolful black, and bore a countenance which, though quite composed, wore the deepest hue of melancholy. The sight of his care-worn but still handsome figure, and of his pale resigned countenance, produced a great impression upon the spectators, many of whom burst into tears. The executioner himself was so much affected, that he was obliged to drink several glasses of spirits, to brace his nerves for the work of death.

From a rare contemporary print of the execution of Lord Kilmarnock, it appears that the scaffold was very small, and that there were not above six or seven persons altogether upon it at the time his lordship submitted to the block. The block is a piece of wood, considerably higher than may be generally supposed; the culprit only requiring to kneel and bend a little forward in order to bring his neck over it. The cloth which originally covered the surrounding rail, is turned up in such a manner as to give the spectators below an uninterrupted view of the dreadful circumstances of the scene. The culprit appears kneeling at the block, without his coat and waistcoat, and the frill of his shirt hanging down. The figures upon the scaffold, all except one of awfully important character, are dressed in those full dark suits of the fashion of King George the Second's reign, which our grandfathers used to call by the dignified appellation, "a stand of mournings;" and most of them have white handkerchiefs at their eyes, and express, by their attitudes, the most violent grief.

It was a little after mid-day when the unhappy Kilmarnock approached the scene of his last sufferings. After mounting the scaffold, and taking leave of Mr. Foster, who chose to retire, he stripped off his upper clothes, turned down his shirt, and arranged his long dressed hair, (previously in a bag,) under a large napkin of damask cloth, which he had brought for the purpose of forming it into a cap. He also informed the executioner, to whom he gave a purse containing five guineas, that he would give the signal for the descent of the axe, about two minutes after he should lay his neck upon the block, by dropping a handkerchief. Then he went forward and knelt upon a black cushion, which was placed for the purpose before the block. Whether to support himself, or as a more convenient posture for devotion, he happened to lay his hands upon the surface of the block, along with his neck; and the executioner was obliged to desire him to let them fall down, lest they should be mangled or break the blow. Being informed that the neck of his waistcoat was in the way, he rose once more upon his feet and with the help of one of his friends, (Mr. Walkingshaw of Scotstoun,) had that garment taken off. This done, and the neck being made completely bare to the shoulder, he again knelt down as before. Mr. Home's servant, who held a corner of the cloth to receive his head, heard him at this moment remind the executioner that he would give the signal in about two minutes. That interval he spent in fervent devotion, as appeared by the motion of his hands, and now and then of his head. Having then fixed his neck down close upon the block, he gave the signal; his body remained without the least motion till the descent of the axe; which went so far through the neck at the first blow, that only a little piece of skin remained to be severed by the second.

The head, which immediately dropped into the cloth, was not exposed in the usual manner by the executioner, in consequence of the prisoner's express request, but deposited with his body in the coffin, which was then delivered to his friends, and deposited in the hearse. The scaffold was then cleaned, and strewn with fresh saw dust, so that no appearance of a former execution might remain to offend the feelings of Lord Balmerino; and the executioner, who was dressed in white, changed such of his clothes as were bloody.

The under-sheriff then went to the apartment of Balmerino, who, upon his entrance, said that he supposed Lord Kilmarnock was now no more, and asked how the executioner had performed his duty. Being informed upon this point, he remarked that it was well done. He had previously maintained before his friends a show of resolution and indifference which perfectly astonished them; twice taking wine, with a little bread, and desiring them to drink him "a degree to heaven." He now said, "Gentlemen, I will detain you no longer, for I desire not to protract my life," saluted them with an air of cheerfulness which drew tears from every eye but his own; and hastened to the scaffold.

The appearance of Balmerino upon this fatal stage produced a very different sensation among the spectators from that occasioned by Kilmarnock. His firm step, his bold bluff figure, but above all his dress, the same regimental suit of blue turned up with red, which he had worn throughout the late campaign, excited breathless admiration, rather than any emotion of pity, and made the crowd regard him as a being of a superior nature. So far from expressing any concern about his approaching death, he even reproved the tenderness of such of his friends as were about him. Walking round the scaffold, he bowed to the people, and inspected the inscription upon his coffin, which he declared to be correct. He also asked which was his hearse, and ordered the man to drive near. Then looking with an air of satisfaction at the block, which he designated as his "pillow of rest," he took out a paper, and, putting on his spectacles, read it to the few about him. It contained a declaration of his unshaken adherence to the house of Stuart, and of his regret for ever having served in the armies of their enemies, Queen Anne and George the First, which he considered the only faults of his life deserving his present fate.

Finally, he called for the executioner, who immediately appeared, and was about to ask his forgiveness, when Balmerino stopped him, by saying, "Friend, you need not ask forgiveness; the execution of your duty is commendable." Presenting the fellow with three guineas, he added, "Friend, I never had much money; this is all I now have; I wish it was more for your sake; and am sorry I can add nothing to it, but my coat and waistcoat." He took off these garments, and laid them upon his coffin for the executioner.

In his immediate preparations for death, this singular man displayed the same wonderful degree of coolness and intrepidity. Having put on a flannel vest which had been made on purpose, together with a cap of tartan, to

they were brought to the bar, preceded by the gentleman jailer, who carried the axe with its edge turned away from them. When reciprocal compliments had passed between the prisoners and their peers, the indictments were read; to which Kilmarnock and Cromarty successively pleaded "Guilty," recommending themselves to the king's mercy. Balmerino, before pleading to his indictment—that is to say, before avowing himself guilty or not guilty,—asked the lord high steward if it would avail him any thing to prove that he was not at the siege of Carlisle, as specified in the indictment, but ten miles distant. His grace answered, that it might or might not be of service, according to the circumstances; but he begged to remind his lordship that it was contrary to form to allow the prisoner to ask any questions before pleading; and he therefore desired his lordship to plead. "Plead!" cried Balmerino, who knew nothing of the technicalities of an English court, and whose bold blunt mind stood in no awe of this august assembly; "why, I am pleading as fast as I can." The steward explained what was meant by pleading, and his lordship then pleaded, "Not guilty." The court immediately proceeded to his trial, which was soon despatched. King's counsel were heard in the first place, and five or six witnesses were then examined in succession; by whom it was proved, that his lordship entered Carlisle, though not on the day specified, at the head of a cavalry regiment, called from his name Elphinstone's Horse, with his sword drawn. The prisoners had no counsel; but Balmerino himself made an exception which was overruled. The lord high steward then asked if he had any thing further to offer in his defence; to which his lordship answered, that he was sorry he had given the court so much trouble, and had nothing more to say. On this, the lords retired to the house of peers; and, the opinion of the Judges being asked touching the overt act, they declared that it was not material, as other facts were proved beyond contradiction. They then returned to the hall; where the steward, according to ancient usage, asking them one by one, (beginning with the youngest baron,) "My Lord of —, is Arthur Lord Balmerino guilty of high treason?" each answered, clapping his right hand upon his left breast, "Guilty, upon my honour, my lord." The prisoners were afterwards recalled to the bar, informed of the verdict of the court, and remanded to the Tower till the day after next, when they were again to appear, in order to receive sentence. The House immediately broke up, and the prisoners were conveyed back to prison, with the edge of the axe turned towards them.

When the court met again, on the 30th, the lord high steward made a speech to the prisoners, and asked each of them, "If he had any thing to offer why judgment of death should not pass against him?" To this question, Kilmarnock replied in a speech expressive of the deepest contrition for his conduct, and imploring the court to intercede with the king in his behalf. He represented, that he had been educated in revolution principles, and even appeared in arms in behalf of the present royal family; that, having joined the insurgents in a rash moment, he had immediately repented the step, and resolved to take the first opportunity of putting himself into the hands of government; for this purpose, he had separated himself from his corps at the battle of Culloden, and surrendered himself a prisoner, though he might easily have escaped. He, moreover, endeavoured to make merit with the court, for having employed himself solicitously during the progress of the insurrection, in softening the horrors which the war had occasioned in his country, and in protecting the royalist prisoners from the abuse of their captors. Finally, he made a declaration of affection for the reigning family, not more incredible from his past actions than it was humiliating in his present condition; and concluded with an asseveration, that, even if condemned to death, he would employ his last moments in "praying for the preservation of the illustrious house of Hanover." The Earl of Cromarty pronounced a speech of nearly the same complexion, but concluding with a more eloquent appeal to the clemency of his majesty. "Nothing remains, my lords," he said, "but to throw myself, my life, and fortune, upon your lordship's compassion. But of these, my lords, as to myself, is the least part of my sufferings. I have involved an affectionate wife, with an unborn infant, as parties of my guilt, to share its penalties; I have involved my eldest son, whose infancy and regard for his parents hurried him down the stream of rebellion; I have involved also eight innocent children, who must feel their parent's punishment before they know his guilt. Let them, my lords, be pledges to his majesty; let them be pledges to your lordships; let them be pledges to my country, for mercy; let the silent eloquence of their grief and tears; let the powerful language of innocent nature supply my want of eloquence and persuasion; let me enjoy mercy, but no longer than I deserve it; and let me no longer enjoy life than I shall use it to efface the crime I have been guilty of. Whilst I thus intercede to his majesty, through the medium of your lordships, let the remorse of my guilt as a subject—let the sorrow of my heart as a husband—let the anguish of my mind as a father—speak the rest of my misery. As your lordships are men, feel as men; but may none of you ever suffer the smallest part of my anguish. But if, after all, my lords, my safety shall be found inconsistent with that of the public, and nothing but my blood can atone for my unhappy crime; if the sacrifice of my life, my fortune, and family, is judged indispensably necessary for stopping the loud demands of public justice; and if the bitter cup is not to pass from me; not mine, but thy will, O God, be done."

The mind of Balmerino was superior to such humiliation as this. When the question was put to him, he pleaded, that an indictment could not be found in the county of Surrey, for a crime laid to be committed at Carlisle in December last, in regard that the act ordaining the rebels to be tried in such counties as the king should appoint, which was not passed till March, could not have a retrospective effect; and he desired to be allowed counsel. On this, the Earl of Bath asked if the noble lord at the bar had any counsel allowed him, and was answered that he had never desired any. Balmerino replied, that, all the defences which had occurred to him or his solicitor having been laid before a counsellor, and by him judged to be trifling, he had not chosen to give the court needless trouble; and that the above objection had only been hinted to him an hour or two before he was brought into court. After some altercation, the court assigned Messrs. Wilbraham and Forrester, as counsel to his lordship, and adjourned till the 1st of August.

Being again brought to the bar on that day, the Earls of Kilmarnock and Cromarty were again asked if they had any thing to propose why judgment of death should not pass upon them, and answered in the negative. The lord high steward informed Balmerino that, having started an objection, desired counsel, and had their assistance, he was now to make use of it, if he thought fit. His lordship answered that his counsel having satisfied him there was nothing in the objection that could do him service, he declined having them heard; that he would not have made the objection, if he had not been persuaded there was ground for it; and that he was sorry for the trouble he had given his grace and the peers. All the prisoners having thus submitted to the court, the lord high steward made a long and pathetic speech, which he concluded by pronouncing sentence in these words: "The judgment of the law is, and this high court doth award, that you William Earl of Kilmarnock, George Earl of Cromarty, and Arthur Lord Balmerino, and every of you, return to the prison of the Tower, from whence you came; from thence you must be drawn to the place of execution; when you come there, you must be hanged by the neck; but not till you are dead; for you must be cut down alive; then your bowels must be taken out, and burnt before your faces; then your heads must be severed from your bodies; and your bodies must be divided each into four quarters; and these must be at the king's disposal. And God Almighty be merciful to your souls!" After sentence was passed, the prisoners were withdrawn from the bar, and the lord high steward, standing up uncovered, broke his staff, and announced that his commission was dissolved.

The Earl of Kilmarnock, who was only in his forty-second year, and extremely anxious for life, immediately presented a petition for mercy to the king, together with others to the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cumberland, entreating them to intercede in his behalf with their royal father. The tenor of these petitions was much the same with that of his speech, equally penitential and humble, and equally unworthy of his birth, rank, and former character. That to the duke contained a vindication of himself from some aspersions which had reached his royal highness, and which he understood had prejudiced that personage against him. It had been whispered that the earl was concerned in the order said to have been found in the pocket of a prisoner after the battle of Culloden, and that, moreover, he had exercised sundry other cruelties upon the prisoners in the hands of the insurgents. Both of these charges he distinctly denied—and probably with truth; though the assertion that he had voluntarily surrendered himself to government, contained in his speech, and in the petition to the king, was afterwards confessed by himself to have been made only with the view of moving his majesty to mercy.

The Earl of Cromarty, whose share in the insurrection

had been much less conspicuous, and who had not, like Kilmarnock, added ingratitude to his other misdeeds, made similar efforts to obtain the royal grace. The countess went about, after the sentence had been pronounced, delivering petitions in person to all the lords of the cabinet-council; and on the following Sunday, she went in mourning to Kensington Palace, to petition majesty itself. When the interesting condition of this lady is considered, it must be allowed that a more powerful mode of intercession could not have been adopted. She way-laid the king as he was going to chapel, fell upon her knees before him, seized the hem of his coat, and, presenting a petition, fainted away at his feet. His majesty raised her up with his own hand, received her petition, and gave it to the Duke of Grafton, who was in attendance; desiring Lady Stair, who accompanied Lady Cromarty, to conduct her to an apartment where she might be taken of her. A day or two after, the Duke of Hamilton and Montrose, the Earl of Stair, and several other courtiers, interceded with his majesty in the unfortunate earl's behalf.

Balmerino made no effort to save his life, but beheld after this period as one who had resigned himself to death, and who despises those who are to inflict it. On learning that his two brothers in affliction had made their applications for mercy, he said, with a sneer, that, as they had such great interest at court, they might have requested his name in with their own. On a gentleman calling upon him a week after his sentence, and apologizing for intruding upon the few hours which his lordship had to live, he replied, "Oh, sir, no intrusion at all—I have done nothing to make my conscience uneasy. I shall die with a true heart, and undaunted; for I think no man fit to live, who is not fit to die; nor am I any ways concerned at what I have done."

The Earl of Cromarty received a pardon on the 31st of August, and on the 11th an order was signed in council for the execution of Lords Kilmarnock and Balmerino. Cromarty and Kilmarnock had both alike hoped for pardon, and most people expected that Balmerino would be the only victim. But the resentment of the king at Kilmarnock's ingratitude, and the unfavourable impression which the Duke of Cumberland had received of his character, together with the gross prevarications upon which he had grounded his claims for mercy, determined it was supposed, that he should also perish. Two weeks therefore, passed the great seal on the 12th, empowering the Lord Cornwallis, constable of the tower, to deliver the bodies of the Earl of Kilmarnock and Lord Balmerino to the sheriffs of London, for execution, on the 18th.

Nothing could mark more strongly the different characters of these two unfortunate noblemen, than the way in which each respectively received intelligence of his final order. It was communicated to Kilmarnock by Mr. Foster, a dissenting or presbyterian clergyman, who had spent some time before with his lordship in religious exercises, and in some measure prepared his mind for the dreadful announcement. When the words of doom fell upon the ear of the culprit, their force was softened by the religious consolations with which they were accompanied; and Kilmarnock received them with tranquillity and resignation of a true Christian. Balmerino, on the contrary, heard the news with all the weakness and levity with which he might have some months before received an order for some military movement. He was sitting at dinner, with his lady, when the warrant arrived; and, on her starting up distractedly and swooning away, he coolly proceeded to recover her by the usual means, and then, remarking that it should not make him lose his dinner, sat down again to table as if nothing had happened. He could even scarcely help chiding her for the concern she had displayed in his behalf, requesting her to resume her seat at table, and absolutely laughing when she declared her inability to eat. The great pity and resignation of Kilmarnock excited universal admiration and pity among the whigs, while the indifference of Balmerino was hailed, by his own party, as the harbinger of a martyr.

The day appointed for the execution was Monday the 18th of August. On the Saturday preceding, General Williamson thought proper to give Kilmarnock an account of all the circumstances of solemnity and outward terror which would accompany it. He informed his lordship that, about ten in the morning, the sheriffs would come to demand the prisoners, who would be delivered to them at the gate of the tower; that from thence, if the lordships thought proper, they should walk on foot to the house appointed on Tower-hill for their reception, where the rooms would be hung with black, to make the more decent and solemn appearance, and that the scaffold would also be covered with black cloth; that his lordship might repose and prepare himself, in the room fitted up for him, as long as he thought convenient, remembering only that the warrant for execution was limited to one o'clock; that, because of a complaint made by Lord Kilmarnock in 1716, that the block was too low, it was raised to the height of two feet; that, to fix it the more firmly, props would be placed directly under it, that the certainty or decency of the execution might not be obstructed by any concussion or sudden jerk of the body. In all this Lord Kilmarnock expressed his satisfaction. But, when informed that two mourning-hearsees would be placed close by the scaffold, so that, when the heads were struck off, the coffins might soon be taken out to receive the bodies, he said it would be better to have the coffins upon the scaffold, for by that means the bodies would be sooner removed out of sight. Being further informed, that an executioner was provided, who, besides being expert, was a very good sort of man, he exclaimed, "General, this is one of the worst circumstances that you have mentioned. I cannot thoroughly like, for a work of this kind, your good sort of men. One of that character must be tender-hearted and compassionate; and a rougher and less sensible person would be much more fit for the office. He then requested that four persons might be appointed to receive the head, when it was severed from the body, in a red cloth, in order that it might not, as he had been informed was the case in some former executions, roll about the scaffold, and be thereby mangled and disfigured; adding, that this was a small circumstance in comparison, but he was not willing that his body should be exposed to any unnecessary indecency after the just sentence of the law had been executed. Throughout this trying conversation, his lordship is said to have maintained as much composure as the least compassionate reader can do in perusing a mere report of it. General Williamson advised him, in conclusion, to think frequently on the circumstances of his death-scene, in order that they might make the less impression when presented to his senses.

At six o'clock in the morning of the day of execution, a troop of life-guards, a troop of horse grenadier guards, and about a thousand foot guards, drew themselves up on Tower Hill, in the form of a battledore—the round part enclosing the scaffold, and the handle, formed by two lines, extending to the lower gate, with a proper space between for the procession to pass. About eight o'clock, the sheriffs of London, their undersheriffs, and their officers, namely, six sergeants at mace, six yeomen, and the executioner, met at the Mitre Tavern, in Fenchurch street, where they breakfasted. They soon after went to the house hired by them for the reception of the prisoners, which was about thirty yards distant, and in front of which the scaffold had been erected. At ten o'clock, the block was fixed, covered with black cloth, and several sacks of saw-dust were provided, to be strewn upon the scaffold. Soon after, the two coffins were brought upon the scaffold. These were covered with black cloth, ornamented with gilt nails, and upon that of Kilmarnock was a plate with this inscription, "Gulielmus Comes de Kilmarnock, decollatus 18^o Augusti 1746, Ætatis sue 42," with an earl's coronet over it; while Balmerino's bore, "Arthurus Dominus de Balmerino, decollatus 18^o Augusti 1746. Ætatis sue 58," surmounted by the coronet of a baron.

These preparations over, the officers to whom the management of the execution was by law assigned, went in procession to the Tower, and knocked at the gate, when the warder within asked, "Who's there?" and was answered by an officer, "The sheriffs of London and Middlesex." According to ancient usage, the warder asked, "What do they want?" and the officer answered, "The bodies of William, Earl of Kilmarnock, and Arthur, Lord Balmerino." The warder said, "I will go and inform the lieutenant of the tower." When General Williamson consequently informed the Earl of Kilmarnock that the sheriffs were waiting for the prisoners, his lordship, having completely prepared himself for the terrible announcement, was not in the least degree agitated, but said, calmly, "General, I am ready, and will follow you." In going down stairs, he met Balmerino at the first landing-place, who embraced him affectionately, and said, "My lord, I am heartily sorry to have your company in this expedition." The two unfortunate noblemen were then conducted to the Tower gate, and delivered over to the sheriffs, who gave receipts to the deputy-lieutenants for their persons. As they were leaving the Tower, the deputy-lieutenant, according to custom, cried, "God bless King George!" to which Kilmarnock made a bow, while the inflexible Balmerino exclaimed, "God bless King James!" The procession moved in a slow and solemn manner towards the house prepared for the reception of the lords; Kilmarnock, attended by Mr. Sheriff Blackford, with Messrs.

Foster and Home, two presbyterian clergymen, and Balmerino, supported by Mr. Sheriff Cockayne, accompanied by the chaplain of the Tower and another minister of the episcopalian persuasion. As they were moving along, some person was heard to exclaim from the surrounding crowd, "Which is Balmerino?" when that nobleman instantly turned half round, and politely said, "I am Balmerino." Two hearsees and a mourning coach followed the procession, adding an inexpressible solemnity and gloom to a scene already as melancholy as can be conceived.

On arriving within the area around the scaffold, the two lords were conducted into separate apartments in the house fitted up for their reception, where their friends were admitted to see them. The walls of this house were hung with black, as well as the passage leading from it to the scaffold, and the scaffold itself, at the expense of the sheriffs. When the pageant had come to the scaffold, the troops which lined the road from the Tower closed in behind the rest, and the scaffold was thus surrounded by soldiers six deep.

About eleven o'clock, Lord Kilmarnock received a message from Lord Balmerino, requesting an interview; which being consented to, Balmerino was introduced into Kilmarnock's apartment. The conversation which took place, is reported by Mr. Foster to have been precisely as follows:—BALMERINO. "My lord, I beg leave to ask your lordship one question."—KILMARNOCK. "To any question, my lord, that you shall think it proper to ask, I believe I shall see no reason to decline giving an answer."—B. "Why, then, my lord, did you ever see or know of any order, signed by the prince, to give no quarter at Culloden?"—K. "No, my lord."—B. "Nor I, neither; and therefore, it seems to be an invention to justify their own murders."—K. "No, my lord, I do not think that inference can be drawn from it; because, while I was at Inverness, I was informed by several officers that there was such an order, signed 'George Murray,' and that it was in the duke's custody."—B. "Lord George Murray! Why, then, they should not charge it upon the prince." His lordship then took his leave, embracing his fellow prisoner with great tenderness, and saying to him, "My dear lord Kilmarnock, I am only sorry that I cannot pay all this reckoning alone. Once more, farewell for ever!"

Lord Kilmarnock spent nearly an hour after this conversation, in devotion with Mr. Foster and the gentleman attending him, and in making declarations that he sincerely repented of his crime, and had resumed at this last hour his former attachment to the reigning family. His rank giving him a dreadful precedence in what was to ensue, he was led first to the scaffold. Before leaving the room, he took a tender farewell of all the friends who attended him. When he stepped upon the scaffold, notwithstanding all his previous attempts to familiarise his mind with the idea of the scene, he could not help being somewhat appalled at the sight of so many dreadful objects; and he muttered in the ear of one of the attendant clergymen, "Home, this is terrible!" He was habited in doleful black, and bore a countenance which, though quite composed, wore the deepest hue of melancholy. The sight of his care-worn but still handsome figure, and of his pale resigned countenance, produced a great impression upon the spectators, many of whom burst into tears. The executioner himself was so much affected, that he was obliged to drink several glasses of spirits, to brace his nerves for the work of death.

From a rare contemporary print of the execution of Lord Kilmarnock, it appears that the scaffold was very small, and that there were not above six or seven persons altogether upon it at the time his lordship submitted to the block. The block is a piece of wood, considerably higher than may be generally supposed; the culprit only requiring to kneel and bend a little forward in order to bring his neck over it. The cloth which originally covered the surrounding rails, is turned up in such a manner as to give the spectators below an uninterrupted view of the dreadful circumstances of the scene. The culprit appears kneeling at the block, without his coat and waistcoat, and the frill of his shirt hanging down. The figures upon the scaffold, all except one of awfully important character, are dressed in those full dark suits of the fashion of King George the Second's reign, which our grandfathers used to call by the dignified appellation, "a stand of mournings;" and most of them have white handkerchiefs at their eyes, and express, by their attitudes, the most violent grief.

It was a little after mid-day when the unhappy Kilmarnock approached the scene of his last sufferings. After mounting the scaffold, and taking leave of Mr. Foster, who chose to retire, he stripped off his upper clothes, turned down his shirt, and arranged his long dressed hair, (previously in a bag,) under a large napkin of damask cloth, which he had brought for the purpose of forming it into a cap. He also informed the executioner, to whom he gave a purse containing five guineas, that he would give the signal for the descent of the axe, about two minutes after he should lay his neck upon the block, by dropping a handkerchief. Then he went forward and knelt upon a black cushion, which was placed for the purpose before the block. Whether to support himself, or as a more convenient posture for devotion, he happened to lay his hands upon the surface of the block, along with his neck; and the executioner was obliged to desire him to let them fall down, lest they should be mangled or break the blow. Being informed that the neck of his waistcoat was in the way, he rose once more upon his feet and with the help of one of his friends, (Mr. Walkingshaw of Scotstoun,) had that garment taken off. This done, and the neck being made completely bare to the shoulder, he again knelt down as before. Mr. Home's servant, who held a corner of the cloth to receive his head, heard him at this moment remind the executioner that he would give the signal in about two minutes. That interval he spent in fervent devotion, as appeared by the motion of his hands, and now and then of his head. Having then fixed his neck down close upon the block, he gave the signal; his body remained without the least motion till the descent of the axe; which went so far through the neck at the first blow, that only a little piece of skin remained to be severed by the second.

The head, which immediately dropped into the cloth, was not exposed in the usual manner by the executioner, in consequence of the prisoner's express request, but deposited with his body in the coffin, which was then delivered to his friends, and deposited in the hearse. The scaffold was then cleaned, and strewn with fresh saw dust, so that no appearance of a former execution might remain to offend the feelings of Lord Balmerino; and the executioner, who was dressed in white, changed such of his clothes as were bloody.

The under-sheriff then went to the apartment of Balmerino, who, upon his entrance, said that he supposed Lord Kilmarnock was now no more, and asked how the executioner had performed his duty. Being informed upon this point, he remarked that it was well done. He had previously maintained before his friends a show of resolution and indifference which perfectly astonished them; twice taking wine, with a little bread, and desiring them to drink him "a degree to heaven." He now said, "Gentlemen, I will detain you no longer, for I desire not to protract my life;" saluted them with an air of cheerfulness which drew tears from every eye but his own; and hastened to the scaffold.

The appearance of Balmerino upon this fatal stage produced a very different sensation among the spectators from that occasioned by Kilmarnock. His firm step, his bold bluff figure, but above all his dress, the same regimental suit of blue turned up with red, which he had worn throughout the late campaign, excited breathless admiration, rather than any emotion of pity, and made the crowd regard him as a being of a superior nature. So far from expressing any concern about his approaching death, he even reproved the tenderness of such of his friends as were about him. Walking round the scaffold, he bowed to the people, and inspected the inscription upon his coffin, which he declared to be correct. He also asked which was his hearse, and ordered the man to drive near. Then looking with an air of satisfaction at the block, which he designated as his "pillow of rest," he took out a paper, and, putting on his spectacles, read it to the few about him. It contained a declaration of his unshaken adherence to the house of Stuart, and of his regret for ever having served in the armies of their enemies, Queen Anne and George the First, which he considered the only faults of his life deserving his present fate.

Finally, he called for the executioner; who immediately appeared, and was about to ask his forgiveness, when Balmerino stopped him, by saying, "Friend, you need not ask forgiveness; the execution of your duty is commendable." Presenting the fellow with three guineas, he added, "Friend, I never had much money; this is all I now have; I wish it was more for your sake; and am sorry I can add nothing to it, but my coat and waistcoat." He took off these garments, and laid them upon his coffin for the executioner.

In his immediate preparations for death, this singular man displayed the same wonderful degree of coolness and intrepidity. Having put on a flannel vest which had been made on purpose, together with a cap of tartan, to denote, he said, that he died a Scotsman, he went to the block and, kneeling down, went through a sort of rehearsal of the execution, for the instruction of the executioner; showing him how he should give the signal for the blow by dropping his arms. He then returned to his friends, took a tender farewell of them, and, looking round upon the crowd, said, "I am afraid there are some who may think my behaviour bold; but, (addressing a gentleman near him,) remember, sir, what I tell you; it arises from a confidence in God, and a clear conscience."

At this moment, he observed the executioner standing with the axe, and, going up to him, took the fatal weapon into his own hand and felt its edge. On returning it, he showed the man where to strike his neck, and animated him to do it with vigour and resolution; adding, "for in that, friend, will consist your mercy." With a countenance of the utmost cheerfulness, he then knelt down at the block, and, uttering the following words:—"O Lord, reward my friends, forgive my enemies, bless the prince and the duke, and receive my soul,"—dropped his arms for the blow. The executioner, recollecting the deliberation of Lord Kilmarnock, was thrown out by the suddenness with which the signal was given in the present case, and gave his blow without taking accurate aim at the proper place. He hit the unfortunate nobleman between the shoulders; depriving him in a great measure, it was supposed, of sensation, but by no means producing death. It has been said by some who witnessed this dreadful scene, that the unfortunate man turned his head half round, and gnashed his teeth either with rage or pain, while his eyeballs glared dreadfully, in the face of the executioner. If this was the case, it fortunately did not prevent the man from recovering his presence of mind; for he immediately brought down another blow, which went through two thirds of the neck. Death immediately followed this stroke, and the body fell away from the block. It was presently replaced by some of the by-standers; and a third blow completed the work.

The fate of those unfortunate noblemen excited more public interest than perhaps any other thing connected with the insurrection. The Jacobites, together with all such as were of a bold temperament, applauded the behaviour of Balmerino; while the Whigs, and all persons of a pious disposition, admired the placid and devout resignation of Kilmarnock. Every member of the state seemed to have chosen his favourite nobleman, in whose behalf he was prepared to talk, dispute, and even to fight. Innumerable publications appeared, regarding them, informing the public of their history, and discussing their respective and very opposite characters. Among these it is remarkable, that no one did justice, either to the profound humility and sorrow-struck contrition of Kilmarnock, or to the dauntless magnanimity and serenity of Balmerino. One set cants about Kilmarnock's long prayers and death-wrung petitions to King George: the other talks with indignation of Balmerino's continued rebellion and his soldier-like levity. It is still more remarkable, perhaps, that no publication of the time advocated the propriety of showing mercy to these or to any other of the rebels. All the fugitive writers seem to have been impressed, on this occasion, with a terrible idea of the power of government, and to have thought that the only way in which they could make sure of their own lives was to permit the law to be gorged with other victims. Almost the only remonstrance which appears to have been made, was the simple insertion in one or two of the Jacobite journals, of the well known passage in Measure for Measure:

"No ceremony that to the great belongs,
Not to the king's crown nor the deputed sword,
The marshal's truncheon, nor the judge's robe,
Becomes them with one half so good a grace,
As mercy does. — Alas! alas!
Why, all the souls that were, were forfeit once;
And he that might th' advantage once have took,
Found out the remedy. How would you be,
If he, which is the top of judgment, should
But judge you as you are? Oh, think on that,
And mercy then will breathe within your lips,
Like men new made.—
To-morrow? Oh! that's sudden; spare him, spare him!
He's not prepared for death."

James Nicholson, Walter Ogilvie, and Donald MacDonald, forming a selection from the Scottish officers taken at Carlisle, were the next victims of the offended state. They were condemned at St. Margaret's Hill, on the 2d of August (along with Alexander MacGowrie, who was afterwards reprieved,) and executed at Kennington Common on the 22d. Nicholson had kept a coffee-house at Leith, and was a man in middle life; but MacDonald and Ogilvie were both young men of good families, the first a cadet of the family of Keppoch, and the other a native of the county of Banff. They were conducted to the place of execution in a sledge, guarded by a party of horse grenadiers and a detachment of the foot-guards. MacDonald and Nicholson appeared at the last solemn scene in their Highland dress. They spent an hour in devotion upon the scaffold, and were then executed in precisely the same manner with Francis Townley and his companions, except that they were permitted to hang fifteen minutes before being dismembered; the horrid circumstances of the former execution having been found too much, even for the feelings of the unsensitive crowd, which usually assembles on such occasions.

During the course of the two ensuing months, many trials took place at St. Margaret's Hill, without any of the prisoners receiving sentence of death. But, on the 15th of November, judgment was at length pronounced upon no fewer than twenty-two persons, who had been convicted singly at different times; and out of these five were ordered for execution on the 28th of November. The names of the unfortunate persons were John Hamilton, Alexander Leith, Sir John Wedderburn, Andrew Wood, and James Bradshaw. Hamilton had been governor of Carlisle, and signed its capitulation; Leith was an aged and infirm man, who had distinguished himself by his activity as a captain in the Duke of Perth's regiment; Sir John Wedderburn had acted as receiver of the excise duties and cess raised by the insurgents; Andrew Wood was a youth of little more than two-and-twenty, who had displayed great courage and zeal in the regiment of John Roy Stewart; and Bradshaw was a respectable and wealthy merchant of Manchester, who had abandoned his business, and spent his fortune in the cause for which he was now to lay down his life.

The execution of these gentlemen, which took place on the 28th of November, was attended with some affecting circumstances. Before nine o'clock in the morning, the servants of the keeper unlocked the rooms in which Sir John Wedderburn, Mr. Hamilton, and James Bradshaw were confined, and, uttering the awful announcement that they were to die, desired them to prepare themselves for the sheriff, who would immediately come to demand their persons. Although this was the first certain intelligence they had of their fate, they received it with calmness, and said they would soon be ready to obey the sheriff's request. They then took a melancholy farewell of a fellow-officer of the name of Farquharson, who had been respited, and was confined on the same side of the prison. The keeper's servants proceeded to rouse the rest of the doomed men, besides one of the name of Lindsay, who was as yet expected to share their fate. When they were told to prepare for the sheriff, Wood enquired if Governor Hamilton had been finally consigned to execution; and being answered in the affirmative, remarked, "that he was sorry for that poor old gentleman." They were led into the fore part of the prison, and provided with a slight refreshment. On account of the policy of government in granting reprieves at the last hour, Bradshaw still hoped to be pardoned, and endeavoured, on this occasion, to display a confident cheerfulness of manner. Wood, entertaining no such expectations, called for wine, and drank the health of his political idols, boldly assigning to each his treasonable title. Lindsay's reprieve arrived at the moment when he was submitting to have his hands tied, and produced such an effect upon his feelings as almost to deprive him of the life which it was designed to save. The sanguine Bradshaw, whose halter was just then thrown over his head, eagerly enquired "if there was any news for him."—"The sheriff is come, and waits for you!" was the awful answer knelled upon the poor man's ear.

They were drawn to the place of execution in two sledges, Bradshaw shedding tears of disappointment and wretchedness. They arrived at the foot of the fatal tree a little after noon, and the execution immediately took place, in the midst of a vast crowd of spectators. Bradshaw, and also Sir John Wedderburn, were observed to look earnestly at the gallows as they drew near to it. The whole prayed for King James, and declared they did not fear death. Bradshaw was tied up first, and the rest as they were taken out of the sledges. The wagon was drawn away from beneath them, while they were yet imploring the Almighty to receive their souls. On being cut down, their bowels were taken out and thrown into a fire which blazed near the gallows. Their bodies were afterwards surrendered to their friends.

In the meantime, this bloody work had been proceeding with still greater energy at Carlisle and York, where it was thought necessary to try the most of the insurgents who had been taken at Culloden, by the forms of an English court of Oyer and Terminer, instead of placing them at the mercy of their countrymen, who were now too generally suspected of disaffection to be intrusted with a commission so important. Carlisle, the principal scene of their misdeeds in England, was selected for the trial of most of the prisoners, as a place more likely than any other to produce a jury of the stamp required by government. The result proved that, however much the Scottish people might labour under the imputation of humanity, their Cumbrian neighbours were not in the least degree tinged with that disloyal vice.

About the beginning of August, a herd—for such it might be termed—of these ill-starred persons was impelled, like one of their own droves of black cattle, from the Highlands towards Carlisle, where, on being imprisoned, they were found to amount to no less than three hundred and eighty-five. To try so many individuals, with the certainty of finding almost all of them guilty, would have looked something like premeditated massacre; and might have had an effect upon the nation very different from what was intended. It was therefore determined that, while all the officers, and others who had distinguished themselves by zeal in the insurrection, should be tried, the great mass should be permitted to cast lots, one in twenty to be tried, and the rest to be transported. Several individuals refused this extrajudicial proffer of grace, and chose rather to take their chance upon a fair trial. The evidences were chiefly drawn from the ranks of the king's army. Bills of indictment were found against a hundred and nineteen individuals; and the 9th of September was appointed the day of trial.

The time which intervened between the indictment and trial of the Carlisle prisoners, was occupied by the judges, at York, where the grand jury found bills of indictment against seventy-five insurgents there confined, whom the judges appointed to be tried on the 2d of October. Notice has already been taken of the countenance which was given to the bloody proceedings of government by a party in the nation, and the publications by private individuals, in which severity to the vanquished Jacobites was not only inculcated, but assisted on. The reader will learn, with equal surprise and horror, that even the pulpit was occasionally made a vehicle for such inhuman sentiments. A dreadful instance occurred here, on the 21st of August, when the chaplain of the high sheriff of York profaned the Christian faith and that glorious minister by preaching, before the judges, a sermon, the spirit of which is sufficiently indicated by its text—[Numbers, xxv. 5.] "And the Lord said unto the judges of Israel, Slay ye every male man that were joined unto Baal-peor!"

The judges again sat down at Carlisle on the 23d September; on which, and the two following days, all of the hundred and nineteen prisoners were arraigned. On the 12th, the grand jury sat again, and found against fifteen more. Out of the hundred and thirty-three persons in all, thus brought to the bar at Carlisle, one obtained delay, on account of an allegation that he was a peer, eleven pled guilty when arraigned, thirty-one pled guilty when brought to trial, thirty-seven were found guilty, eleven found guilty but recommended to mercy, thirty-six acquitted, and five remanded to prison to wait for further evidence.

The trials at York commenced on the 2d of October, and ended on the 7th, when, out of the seventy-five persons indicted, two pled guilty when arraigned, and fifty-two when brought to trial; twelve were found guilty, four found guilty but recommended to mercy, and five acquitted. Seventy in all received sentence of death. The process of all these trials appears to have been extremely simple. Most of the prisoners endeavoured to take advantage of the notorious slavery in which the clans were held by their chiefs, by pleading that they had been forced into the insurgent army against their will; but their defence was in every case easily repelled.

Before the middle of October, an order was sent to Carlisle for the execution of thirty, out of the ninety-one persons then imprisoned under sentence; ten at Carlisle on the 18th October, ten at Brampton on the 21st, and ten at Penrith on the 28th. But of the first ten, one afterwards reprieved. The names of the remaining nine were Thomas Cockpock, Edward Roper, Francis Buchanan of Arnprior, Donald MacDonald of Kinkaidart, Donald MacDonald of Tyendrich, John Henderson, John MacNaughton, James Brand, and Hugh Cameron. They were executed, according to order, with all those circumstances of barbarity which had already attended the former executions. Out of the ten who were appointed to die at Bampton, only six eventually suffered; James Innes, Patrick Lindsey, Ronald MacDonald, Thomas Park, Peter Taylor, and Michael Delard; one having died in prison, and the remaining three having been reprieved. Mercy was also extended to three of the ten who were designed for execution at Penrith. The names of those who suffered at the latter place, were Robert Lyon, David Home, Andrew Swan, James Harvie, John Robottom, Philip Hunt, and Valentine Holt.

In addition to the twenty-two persons thus executed in the west of England, other twenty-two suffered at the city of York; namely, on the 1st of October, Captain George Hamilton, Daniel Frazer, Edward Clavering, Charles Gordon, Benjamin Mason, James Main, William Colony, William Dempsey, Angus MacDonald, and James Sparks; on the 8th of the same month, David Roe, William Hunter, John Endsworth, John MacLean, John MacGregor, Simon Mackenzie, Alexander Parker, Thomas Macginnies, Archibald Kennedy, James Thomson, and Michael Brady; and on the 15th, James Reid. Eleven more were executed at Carlisle on the 15th of November; namely, Sir Archibald Primrose of Dunnipace, Charles Gordon of Dalpersy, Patrick Murray, goldsmith in Stirling, Patrick Keir, Alexander Stevenson, Robert Reid, John Wallace, James Michell, Molineux Eaton, Thomas Hays, and Barnaby Matthews.

All these unhappy individuals are said to have behaved, throughout the last trying scene, with a degree of decent firmness which perfectly astonished the beholders. Every one of them continued, till his last moment, to justify the cause which had brought him to the scaffold; and some even declared that, if set at liberty, they would act in the same manner as they had done. They all prayed in their last moments for the exiled royal family, particularly for Prince Charles, whom they concurred in representing as a pattern of all manly excellence, and as a person calculated to render the nation happy, should it ever have the good fortune to see him restored.

The lives of nearly eighty persons had now been destroyed, in atonement of the terror into which the state had been thrown by the insurrection; and the appetite of the common people for bloody spectacles had been satiated almost to loathing. There yet remained, however, a few individuals, who, having excited the displeasure of government in a peculiar degree, were marked as unfit for pardon. The first of these was Charles Ratcliffe, younger brother to the Earl of Derwentwater who had been executed in 1716, and who had himself only evaded the same fate by making his escape from Newgate. This gentleman, taking upon himself the title of Earl of Derwentwater, was made prisoner, in November 1745, on board a French vessel on its way to Scotland with supplies for Prince Charles. After lying a year in confinement, he was brought up to the bar of the king's bench (November 21, 1746,) when the sentence which had been passed upon him thirty years before, was again read to him. He endeavoured to perplex the court regarding his identity; but it was established satisfactorily, and he was condemned to be executed on the 6th of December. That day he came upon the scaffold in a suit of scarlet, faced with black velvet, and trimmed with gold, a gold laced waistcoat, white silk stockings, and a white feather in his hat; and conducted himself, throughout the dreadful scene, with a manly courage and proud bearing, which seemed to indicate, that he held the malice of his enemies and the stroke of death in equal scorn.

The last of all the martyrs, as they were styled by their own party, was Lord Lovat. This singular old man was impeached by the house of commons on the 11th of December; his trial took place before the house of peers on the 9th of March 1747, and several successive days. On this momentous occasion, he seems to have exerted all the talents for dissimulation and chicanery which had carried him through life with so much distinction. But the evidence produced against him was of that kind which no artifice could invalidate. He was confronted with a prodigious number of letters, which he had written to the exiled family, and in particular to the Young Chevalier, promising them his assistance, and negotiating the proposed elevation of his family to a dukedom. These had been procured from Murray of Broughton, who preferring to live the life of a dog to dying the death of a man, had engaged with government to make all the discoveries in his power for his own pardon. Lovat could make no effective stand against such documents, and although he uttered an exculpatory and palliative speech some eloquence, he was condemned to die.

During the space of a week which intervened between his sentence and his execution, he maintained, without the least interruption, that flow of animal spirits and lively conversation for which he had been so remarkable throughout his life. He talked to the people about him of his approaching death, as he would have talked of a journey which he designed to take; and he made the circumstances which were to attend it the subject of innumerable witticisms and playful remarks. When informed, in the forenoon before he left the prison, that a scaffold had fallen near the place of execution, by which many persons were killed and maimed, he only remarked, "The mair mischief, the better sport." He was so weak as to require the assistance of two persons in mounting the scaffold. Here he maintained the same show of indifference to death. He felt the edge of the axe, and expressed himself satisfied with its sharpness. He called the executioner, gave him ten guineas, and told him to do his duty with firmness and accuracy; adding that he would be very angry with him, if he should hack and mangle his shoulders. He professed to die in the Roman catholic faith, and spent some time in devotion. One of his last expressions was the "Dulce et decorum" of Horace. With the same cool resignation, he submitted to the executioner, who fortunately performed the work by one blow.

It remains to be stated that an act of indemnity was passed in June 1747, granting the king's pardon to all who had committed acts of treason previous to the year 1745, except about eighty persons, whose names were specified.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

PRINCE CHARLES IN FRANCE.

Bru. Come, poor remains of friends, rest on this rock.
Julius Caesar.

Prince Charles terminated his voyage at the small port of Roscort, near Morlaix, after having sailed in a fog through the midst of the British fleet, then cruising on the coast of Bretagne. Immediately on stepping ashore, he is said to have sunk down upon his knees, and returned thanks to Heaven for having preserved his life through so many dangers. He and his company were still dressed in the miserable attire which they had worn in Scotland; but they were speedily refitted by the gentlemen of the neighbourhood.

Intelligence no sooner reached the French court that he was landed, than the castle of St. Anthoine was fitted up for his reception, and his brother, attended by a great number of young noblemen, set out from Paris, to meet and congratulate him. On arriving at that capital, he did not stop for any refreshment, but drove on to Versailles. The king was at that time engaged in council upon affairs of importance; but when he heard that the prince was come, he immediately rose and came out to give him welcome. The fame of Charles's proceedings in Scotland had made a strong impression upon the breast of this monarch, as upon the nation in general, ever so strongly disposed to admire deeds of extravagant heroism; and in now meeting the gallant youth who had braved and suffered so much, he could not help embracing him with emotions of the tenderest nature. "My dearest prince," he exclaimed, "I thank Heaven for the great pleasure of seeing you returned in safety, after so many fatigues and dangers; you have proved yourself possessed of all the qualities of the heroes and philosophers of antiquity, and I hope you will one day receive the reward of such extraordinary merit." After spending a quarter of an hour in conversation with the king, Charles passed to the apartment of the queen, who received him with the same demonstrations of respect and affection. As he was withdrawing from the palace, the whole court crowded around him, to express the admiration which they entertained for his exploits, and the satisfaction with which they saw him once more safe in France. Scarce could they have testified greater joy, was the observation of an eye witness, or expressed themselves in terms more warm, had the dauphin himself been engaged in the same dangerous expedition, and returned from it in safety.

Subsequent events gave rise to a supposition that Louis XV. was but little sincere in his expressions of welcome. It would appear, however, that the monarch really entertained a strong personal regard for Charles, and that to previous friendship was now added a feeling of a still warmer nature, a generous admiration of the constancy and fortitude which he had displayed in his late campaign. If his most Christian majesty afterwards consented to sacrifice Charles to a necessity in state policy, it must be held to have been only one of those unfortunate circumstances in which monarchs are obliged to violate their own feelings for the sake of their country. There was still less reason for supposing the kindness of the queen to be equivocal. Her majesty was prepossessed in favour of Charles, on account of his resemblance to his mother, who had been her early and most intimate friend. She is thus said to have regarded him rather with the fondness of a mother than the favour of a queen. This affection for him was heightened by her interest in his fate. She beheld him with all that indefinable mixture of love and respect with which it seems so strikingly the characteristic of the female heart to treat those who acquire a name for "the dangers they have passed." She is said to have often detained him in her chamber for hours together, relating to her and her attendant ladies the strange and varied adventures he had met in Scotland; and with so lively a feeling of pity were these recitals usually attended, that he seldom failed to leave the fair assemblage drowned in tears.

The attentions which he received at court, and even the applause which his appearance every where excited amongst the public, agreeable as both must have been to a youthful mind, were entirely neutralised by the intelligence which was every day arriving, of the cruelties exercised by the British government upon his unfortunate adherents. In the language which a poet afterwards put into his mouth, "nought could seem pleasant, and nought could seem fair," so long as his mind was occupied with the gloomy sensations which naturally arose from that cause. He was nevertheless obliged, soon after his arrival, to pay a public and ceremonious visit to the French king, in the character with which his father had invested him, that of Regent of Scotland, England, and Ireland, the interview which he had already had being only private and incognito. On this occasion he moved in procession from his castle of St. Anthoine, with the Scottish gentlemen who had come over with him; Lords Ogilvie and Elcho, together with the venerable Glenbucket, and Kelly his secretary, in one coach; he himself in the next, along with Lord Lewis Gordon and the elder Lochiel; the third contained four gentlemen of his bed chamber; and young Lochiel and some other gentlemen followed on horseback. The whole made a very respectable appearance, especially Charles himself, who wore a dress as remarkable for its costliness and splendour as his late attire was shabby and wretched. His coat was of rose coloured velvet, embroidered with silver tissue. His waistcoat was of rich gold brocade, with a spangled fringe set on in scallops. The cockade in his hat and the buckles in his shoes were diamonds. The George at his bosom, and the order of St. Andrew, which he wore at one of the button holes of his waistcoat, were illustrated with large brilliants. "In fine," says the good Jacobite who records his appearance, "he glittered all over like the star which appeared at his nativity." He supped with the royal family; and all his friends and attendants were entertained at various tables, which had been appointed for them, according to their rank.

Whatever was the extent of friendship which the French king entertained for Charles, it was destined soon to give way before the more powerful influence of politics. The only motive which he had ever had for urging the claims of the house of Stuart against the reigning family, or for entertaining Charles at his court, lay in his wish to annoy, by this means, a powerful enemy, and in a certainty that, by resigning him at some period, he might make a peace, when such could not otherwise be well obtained. It has been already seen that, after he had succeeded in fairly embroiling Britain in a civil war, he left Charles in a great measure to work out his own fate; contented with having achieved the object of the moment, and as indifferent to the fate of the tool as the archer is to that of the arrow which he drives through the mail of his foe. Now that Charles was returned, although he felt personally an affection for the gallant young man, he had no scruple in seeking to employ him once more in the same heartless policy. He embodied several regiments of the exiled cavaliers, at the head of which he placed Lochiel, Lord Ogilvy, and others who had distinguished themselves in the late insurrection. He removed the minister who was chiefly blamed for having withheld the supplies promised to Charles when in Scotland, and put another in his place, whose attachment to the Stuart family was unquestionable. He posted the new regiments at Dieppe, Boulogne, and Calais; and caused the report of a new invasion to be loudly proclaimed.

Charles, however willing in his turn to veil his better feelings to the dictates of policy, had too much good sense not to comprehend the true motive and object of these preparations, and too much pride not to resent them. He told the French ministry in plain terms that the force provided was quite insufficient, and that he would neither hazard his own person nor those of his friends in so romantic an expedition. He also took care to declare in public, that he would never again set his foot within the British territories, unless called by the people, or with a force sufficient to overawe all opposition, and save the effusion of blood, too much of which, he added, had already been shed. Louis, however, achieved in some measure the object of his policy; for, in consequence of the preparations which seemed to be making on the French coast for an invasion, the British troops were prevented from embarking for Flanders so early in the year as they were required.

It may here be mentioned, that Charles never was heard to express any satisfaction on account of the numerous victories which France gained over Britain and her allies, during this unfortunate war. He either affected, or did feel as a Briton, and considering the honour of that country as his own, regretted every incident which tended to degrade her in the eyes of Europe. He even expressed himself in this manner to the royal family and the ministers; and never permitted any Frenchman to follow the bent of his nature in his presence by depreciating the English, without retorting some reflection upon the French which at once silenced him.

Though thus unajcoiled by the French, he did not think it necessary altogether to reject the slender assistance they offered him, but, on their representing that they could give no more at present, declared he would wait their time, and in the meanwhile proposed to apply to some other friendly courts for additions to his armament. He proposed Spain; and the French ministers had no hesitation in sanctioning the measure, because they knew that that country was then even more unable than themselves to increase his force. He was aware of this himself; but thought it advisable to sound his most catholic majesty regarding his affection to the interests of the House of Stuart.

Accordingly he visited Madrid, where he was most kindly received by the king, queen, and queen-dowager. That he procured no levies, was abundantly plain from the event; but the king is said nevertheless to have treated him with great attention. Besides contributing fifty thousand pistoles towards the object of his enterprise, he presented him with a fine gold hilted sword, set with brilliants. The queen, moreover, gave him a small box adorned with her picture, and a ring valued at fifteen hundred pistoles.

Charles remained only five or six days in Madrid, but was absent from Paris four months; a space which it was supposed he had employed in visiting two other courts friendly to his interests. Before his return, an incident had taken place which is said to have occasioned him the greatest uneasiness. His younger brother, Henry Benedict, had been induced, during this interval, to accept of a cardinalate, which was offered to him by the Pope. The diminished prospect which now remained of the restoration of his family, and the desire of enjoying an independent revenue, were the urgent and sufficient motives which sanctioned this step. But Charles rightly judged that nothing could have been contrived better calculated to increase the dislike of the English people to his dynasty, and was accordingly so much incensed at his brother, that for some time he forbade his name to be mentioned in his company.

It would have perhaps been better for Charles if he had imitated the prudent conduct of his brother, and at once renounced the pretensions which were destined to occasion him so much pain and calamity. He might have now retired with a good grace into the shades of private life, and spent many respectable years in the enjoyment of that fame, which he had certainly acquired by his Scottish campaign. Nothing, in that case, would have been remembered of him, but the glory of that enterprise alone, and, like a child who dies before its character, good or bad, has been developed, he would have been esteemed for expected good, more than for known evil. Unfortunately, his ambitious and restless spirit caused him to persist in his claims, till they had become in a great measure ridiculous, and finally occasioned an incident which degraded him in the eyes of all Europe.

It would appear, that so long as he was upheld by the admiration of the public, and whilst the prospects of his cause were still not altogether clouded, his spirit maintained its full tide of pride, and seemed as incapable as ever of stooping beneath the character he affected. A scheme was conceived by Cardinal Tencin, the French minister, for restoring his family through the intervention of France, on condition that Ireland was to be yielded as an appanage of that kingdom; and the cardinal, who had been raised to his present distinguished situation entirely by the influence of the House of Stuart, had an interview with Charles, to disclose the project. Scarcely had he concluded the proposal, when the fiery Chevalier started from his seat in the greatest rage, and repeatedly exclaiming, "Non, Monsieur le Cardinal! tout ou rien! point de partage!"—(No, no, Lord Cardinal! all or nothing! no partitions!)—strode through the room with the air of a man who has been insulted on the keenest point. The cardinal, alarmed at his demeanour, entreated him not to mention the project to the king or ministry, as it was entirely an idea of his own, which he had conceived out of his great affection for the exiled family. Charles assured him he should not so much as think of it.

But the period at length arrived when this spirit was to be effectually controlled, and the unhappy Stuart was to fall the victim of that heartless policy whose tool he had already so conspicuously been. Towards the end of the year 1747, France began to be heartily tired of a war, which, though attended with innumerable victories, was leading to no result, except the impoverishment of her purse, and the stagnation of her commerce; and some overtures of peace were made to the British government. The latter incidents of the war had been decidedly favourable to this state, inasmuch that many who previously looked upon it as absurd, were now willing that it should be continued; but the enormous expense which it cost, and the danger in which it had involved the very government itself, determined the ministry to enter into the terms proposed by France. A treaty was accordingly signed at Aix-la-Chapelle (October 18, 1748,) by which, upon the simple grounds that each state should resign all its conquests, it was resolved to conclude the war. By one article it was stipulated, that France should finally acknowledge the right of the House of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, and that, in terms of a treaty entered into in 1718, she should utterly renounce all alliance with the Pretender and his family, and not permit the residence of these persons upon her dominions.

During the twelvemonth which intervened between the proposal and final settlement of this treaty, all Charles's friends expected that he would anticipate the necessity of his fate, by retiring from a kingdom where he had met with so little faith. The world was even prepared in some measure to treat him with the pity which his circumstances seemed to demand; and in France, at least, where he was in the highest degree beloved, his motions were watched with intense interest. To the astonishment of all, he never himself expressed the least chagrin regarding his fate, or even seemed to entertain a supposition that he was to be sacrificed. According to a custom followed by his grandfather and father at all treaties in which Great Britain was concerned, he had presented a protest against the proceedings of Aix-la-Chapelle; but he took no notice of the particular stipulation which promised so much distress to himself. He even took measures to prove his indifference to that pacification. He hired a splendid hotel upon the Quai de Theatin, in order, he said, to be near the play, opera, and other diversions of Paris; and he threw into his air a still higher strain of gaiety than he had ever formerly displayed. Whenever the agitating question of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle was mentioned, he affected to feel no personal interest in its objects, but either fell a singing, or took an opportunity to change the conversation.

Thus apparently resolved to brave his fate, he did not even refrain from paying his customary visits to the court; though, it was remarked, he now sought to avoid personal rencontres with the king. At this time he adopted a measure, which seemed not only to avow his sentiments negatively, but to urge them positively, and that in a style which, though pardonable and perhaps even laudable, was to the last degree imprudent. He caused a medal to be struck, on the obverse of which was delineated the emblematical figure Britannia, with a busy seaport, and a fleet of war-vessels by her side, and the emphatic legend, "Amor et Spes Britannie," [the Love and Hope of Britain.] By this he evidently meant a compliment to Britain and her navy, at the expense of France, whose bad successes at sea had been the chief reason of her suing for peace. But that the insult was effective in the proper quarter, was proved by the ministers complaining of it to the king, and demanding that some notice should be taken of it. Louis, probably conscience-struck at the bad faith he had kept with Charles, is said to have answered, without warmth, that no doubt the prince had reasons for his conduct, and could not well be called to account for them.

This affair made a considerable noise in Britain as well as in France, as the medals were extensively dispersed, and the implied satire every where understood. Although it was of such a nature as to forbid the French court from resenting it in a public manner, it did not pass altogether without reproof. The Prince of Conti, who was accounted the proudest man of his day in all France, and who felt it with peculiar keenness, one day met Charles in the Luxembourg Gardens, and immediately made allusion to the device of his famous medal. Assuming an air of pleasantry, but at the same time speaking with a sneer, this noble personage remarked that the device was perhaps scarcely so applicable as had been generally thought, in as much as the British navy had not proved the best possible friends to his royal highness. Charles instantly replied to this taunt, in a manner which silenced the prince. "C'est en vain, Prince!" he said, "mais je suis nonobstant l'ami de la flotte, contre tous ses ennemis; comme je regretterai toujours la gloire d'Angleterre comme la mienne, et sa gloire est dans la flotte." (True, Prince! but I am nevertheless a friend to the navy against all its enemies; as I shall always look upon the glory of England as my own, and her glory is in her navy.)

When the king perceived that Charles made no motion to leave his dominions, he despatched the Cardinal de Tencin, with instructions to hint to him, in as delicate a manner as possible, the necessity of his taking that step. The cardinal performed his office with the greatest discretion, and endeavoured with all his eloquence to palliate the conduct of his master. The Charles treated him only with evasive answers, and he was obliged to withdraw without having obtained any satisfactory account of his royal highness's intention. The king waited for some days, in the hope that Charles would depart; but was then obliged to despatch another messenger, with still more urgent entreaties. The person selected for this purpose was the Duke de Gesvres, Governor of Paris, who, besides instructions to urge his departure, carried a carte blanche, which the prince was requested to fill up with any sum he might please to demand as a pension, in consideration of his obeying the king's wishes. When this ambassador disclosed his proposals to Charles, he is said to have treated them with unequivocal marks of contempt, crying that "peux-je être quitte out of the question in the present case, and that he only wished the king to keep his word." The cardinal pointed out the necessity of the negotiations which required his departure from France; but Charles, on the other hand, insisted upon the previous treaty between his most Christian majesty and himself, by which they had become mutual allies. The Duke de Gesvres being the unsuccessful, the Count de Maurepas and the Papal nuncio were one after another sent upon the same errand, and the king even wrote a letter to him with his own hand, but all without effect.

As no attempt was made by either party to end these strange proceedings, they soon became known to all Europe. In Paris they excited a degree of interest such as no public event was ever before known to occasion. For a person in such peculiar circumstances, to thwart the intentions and disregard the power of the grand monarch, was esteemed in that region a most extraordinary instance of daring, and almost caused Charles to be regarded as something superior to his kind. His exploits in Scotland, and the fascinating graces of his person, had previously disposed the Parisians to this extravagant degree of admiration; and it was completed when, to these charms, was added that arising from his unmerited distresses. He now became an object of even more attraction than the king himself, to this generous and romantic people. Whenever he appeared upon the public walks, the whole company followed him. When he entered the theatre, he became the sole spectacle of the place. On all occasions he seemed the only person who was insensible to the sorrows of his fate; and, while he talked with his usual gaiety to the young noblemen who surrounded him, no one could speak of him without admiration, and few beheld him without tears.

The public feeling so liberally excited in his favour was by no means agreeable to the king, and far less to the ministry, who had been chiefly instrumental in bringing the prince into this distressing predicament. There were other personages whom it yet further offended. Those were, the Earl of Sussex and Lord Cathcart, two British noblemen, then residing in Paris, as hostages to guarantee the restoration of Cape Breton to its original proprietors the French, in terms of the late treaty. Charles was known to have commented with bitterness upon the meanness of the British Government in giving hostages to France; and the two noblemen could not help, moreover, feeling personally piqued at the respect which was every where shown to the public enemy of their country, while they themselves were treated with ill-suppressed contempt. They therefore complained to the French monarch, that he had not executed one important article of the treaty. His majesty gave them for answer, that he only awaited the return of a messenger from Rome, with an answer to a letter which he had written to the old pretender, demanding that Charles should be withdrawn by paternal authority from the kingdom, before taking active measures to that effect.

The messenger mentioned by the king, returned on the 9th of December (1748), with a letter from the old Chevalier, enclosing another under a flying seal, addressed to his son, in which he commanded the prince to obey the king's wishes. His majesty, after having read the last epistle, sent it to Charles, by way of giving him a last chance of declaring his submission to the royal authority; but the inflexible prince, though always said to have entertained the utmost respect for his father, thought proper to hold out even against his commands. He declared openly that no pensions, promises or advantages whatever, should induce him to renounce his just rights; that, on the contrary, he was resolved to consecrate the last moments of his life to their recovery. The king no sooner learned that he was still unwilling to depart, than he called a council of state, where it was determined to arrest him, and carry him out of the kingdom by force. Louis was still so averse to treat his unfortunately with disrespect, and still entertained so warm an affection for him, that when the order for his arrest was presented for his signature, he exclaimed, with unaffected sorrow, "Ah, pauvre prince! qu'il est difficile pour un roi d'être un véritable ami!"—(Ah, poor prince! how difficult it is for a king to be a true friend!)—The order was signed at three o'clock in the afternoon, but it was blazoned all over Paris before the evening. A person of the prince's retinue heard, and carried him the intelligence; but he affected not to believe it. Next day, as he was walking in the Tuilleries, a person of condition informed him that he would certainly be seized that very day, if he did not prevent it by an immediate departure; but, resolved to brave the very extremity of his fate, he treated the intelligence as chimerical, and, turning to one of his followers, ordered a box to be hired for him that night at the opera.

The preparations made for his arrest were upon a scale proportioned to the importance of his character, or rather were dictated by the extent of public favour which he was supposed to enjoy. No fewer than twelve hundred of the Guards were drawn out and posted in the court of the Palais-Royal; a great number of sergeants and grenadiers armed in cuirasses and helmets, filled the passage of the Opera-house; the Guet, or city police, were stationed in the streets to stop all carriages. The sergeants of the grenadiers, as the most intrepid, were selected to seize the prince. Two companies of grenadiers took post in the court yard of the kitchens, where the Duke de Biron, commander of the French Guards, and who was commissioned to superintend, waited in a coach, disguised, to see the issue of the enterprise. The Mousquetaires had orders to be ready to mount on horseback; troops were posted upon the road from the Palais-Royal to the state-prison of Vincennes, in which the prince was to be disposed. Hatchets and scaling-ladders were prepared, and locksmiths directed to attend, in order to take his royal highness by escalade, in case he should throw himself into some house, and there attempt to stand out a siege. A physician and three surgeons, moreover, were ordered to be in readiness to dress whoever might be wounded.

Into this well prepared and formidable trap, Charles entered with all the unthinking boldness of a desperate man. Scorning the repeated warnings he had received, and disregarding a friendly voice which told him, as he passed along in his carriage, that the Opera-house was beset, he drove up as usual to that place; where he no sooner alighted on the ground, than he was surrounded by six sergeants dressed in plain clothes, who seized his person; one taking care of each limb, while other two crossed their arms, and bore him off the street into the court-yard of the Palais-Royal; the soldiers in the mean time keeping off the crowd with fixed bayonets, and seizing the few persons who attended him. When he was brought into the court-yard, Major de Vaudrouil, who had been deputed to act by the Duke de Biron, approached his royal highness, and said, "Prince, your arms; I arrest you in the name of the king." Charles immediately presented his sword; but, that not satisfying his captors, they searched his person, and found a pair of pistols and a poniard, together with a penknife and a book, all of which they removed. They then bound him with silk cord, of which the Duke had provided ten ells on purpose, and hurried him into a hired coach, which was immediately driven off, attended by a strong guard. Another party in the mean time entered his palace, and arrested all his followers and servants, who were immediately conveyed to the Bastille, though soon afterwards liberated. Charles was conveyed to the castle of Vincennes, and thrust into an upper room of narrow dimensions, where he was left to seek repose, attended by only a single friend—the faithful Neil MacEachan, who, with Flora MacDonald, had accompanied him in his journey through Skye. So long as he was in the presence of the soldiers or any officers of the French government, he had maintained a lofty air, and spoken in a haughty tone, as if to show that he was superior to his misfortunes; but, when finally left in this desolate chamber, with only a friend to observe him, he gave way to a tumult of painful feeling which agitated his breast. Throwing himself upon a chair, according to the report of MacEachan, as afterwards communicated to a family in Skye, he clasped his hands together, and, bursting into tears, exclaimed, "Ah, my faithful mountaineers! you would never have treated me thus: would I were still with you!"—his mind apparently reverting, at this moment of peculiar distress, to the transient glories of his late brilliant, though unhappy enterprise.

The ill-fated prince was soon after conveyed out of the French dominions, which he never again entered. He spent the remainder of his life chiefly at Avignon, a city in Provence, but belonging to the pope. He did not immediately resign all hope of a restoration to the throne of his ancestors, but on the contrary, entered into at least one conspiracy, which was set on foot for that purpose by his English adherents in the year 1753. On that occasion he even ventured to visit London, in order to transact the business of the proposed insurrection. The king knew of his arrival in the capital, but adopted the wise resolution not to molest him. The conspiracy, though said to have involved many of the most honourable names in England, did not arrive at any head; being probably repressed by a well-timed act on the part of government—the execution of Dr. Archibald Cameron. Charles is affirmed to have taken the opportunity of his visit to London, to make open renunciation of the Catholic faith, for the satisfaction of his friends. It is also said—for these facts hang but on vague authority—that he was once more in the metropolis at the period of the coronation of George the Third, and that he caused the challenge of the king's knight on that occasion, to be answered by a female adherent, who threw her glove down into the arena, after the champion had deposited his gauntlet. Perhaps nothing could have better emblematised the weakness of his pretensions or prospects, in opposition to the monarch then crowned, than the light trifle which he charged with them, as contrasted with the mailed and ponderous strength of the object which represented the claims of his rival.

Charles, in his latter years, was degraded by the vices of a disappointed and aimless man. After his transactions in Scotland, during which he displayed so much moderation and humanity, and after the numerous testimonies of his dying adherents, which paint him with so many excellences, it is impossible to doubt that he originally possessed both a noble mind and a good heart. If, after miseries such as it is the lot of few men to bear, and haunted by a fate than which none can be considered more deplorable, he sunk from the gallant and generous prince into the domestic tyrant and the sot, he is not perhaps to be either wondered at or condemned. In ordinary life, instances are seen every day of men who entered into life with good prospects, and principles equally good, but whom some unlucky accident has "spited at the world," and finally precipitated down the long descent of folly and crime. If pity and pardon are to be allowed to such errors—and they are not easily withheld, the same may surely be extended to the feelings of a man whose misfortunes were not only many times greater in degree, but took their rise in his birth, and continued with his existence.

CONCLUSION.

The insurrection of 1745 was no sooner suppressed by the stern course of policy which has been described, than the members of the legislature began to take into consideration a number of measures, by which it was proposed not only to prevent any such revolt for the future, but to annihilate, if possible, the spirit which excited it. These measures were in a general sense salutary, and, in the estimation of at least one party of the nation, absolutely indispensable. But it is to be regretted, by every one who can appreciate the mild government of the Brunswick dynasty, or the security which it has given to the national liberties, that they were also tyrannical in spirit, and severe in execution. The old remark, that a suppressed rebellion strengthens the hands of a government, held good in this instance; and perhaps the best apology which can be offered for both the military and civil cruelties of this period, is that no man, or body of men, can well manage a sudden accession of arbitrary power.

The first act of the legislature, as a matter of course, related to the Scottish mountaineers, whose share in the war had been so pre-eminently conspicuous. It was denominated the Disarming Act, and proceeded upon two acts of George the First, which had aimed at the same object, without, as it but too obviously appeared, having produced the desired effect. In order that this enactment might not be defeated like its predecessors, penalties of a peculiarly severe nature were imposed upon all who should directly or indirectly endeavour to evade it. If any man, residing within the Highland line, should fail to deliver up his arms before the 1st of August 1747, or if any man should attempt to conceal arms either in his house, or in the fields, he was to be, for the first offence, fined in fifteen pounds, and imprisoned without bail till payment. If payment was not made within one month, he was to be transported to America as a common soldier, if able to serve; if not able to serve, he was to be imprisoned for six months, and then only liberated on finding security for his good behaviour during the next ten years. If the offender was a woman, she was to be fined in the same sum, imprisoned till payment, and afterwards confined for six months. A second offence against this ungracious law, was to be visited with no less a punishment than transportation for seven years.

Not only were the Highlanders deprived of their arms, but their very dress was proscribed, and by still severer penalties. The same act ordained that, after the 1st of August 1747, if any person, whether man or boy, within the same tract of country, were found wearing the clothes commonly called "the Highland clothes," that is, the plaid, philabeg, trows, shoulder-belts, or any part whatsoever of the Highland garb, or if any person were found to wear a dress composed of tartan or party-coloured cloth, he should be imprisoned six months without bail, for the first offence, and, on its repetition, be transported for seven years.

It was thus hoped, that not only would the Highlanders be incapable of again levying war against the state, but that, their distinction as a nation being destroyed, they would with all haste become obedient servants to government, like the rest of the community. As might have been expected, the result was very different. The clans were, it is true, effectually prevented from ever again plotting against the house of Hanover. But they were not induced to regard that family, or their government, with any additional degree of favour. On the contrary, their previous disaffection was exasperated by these harsh measures into absolute hatred. "Even the loyal clans," says Dr. Johnson, "murmured, with an appearance of justice, that, after having defended the king, they were forbidden for the future to defend themselves, and that the sword should be forfeited which had been legally employed." But, if the loss of their arms occasioned discontent, the change of their dress produced feelings still less favourable to the existing government. Had the whole race been decimated, as their lively historian General Stuart remarks, more violent grief, indignation, and shame, could not have been excited among them, than by this encroachment upon their dearest national prejudices. It may be said, in conclusion, that, if the Highlanders have eventually become good servants to the state, and undistinguishable in dress and demeanour from the rest of the population, no part of the blessing is to be ascribed to either of these most ungenerous and unjust enactments.

The next act of the legislature also regarded the Highlanders, though, for the sake of uniformity, it was extended to the whole of Scotland. This was the celebrated act for abolishing heritable jurisdictions. It was supposed that, by putting an end to the power which all landed proprietors had hitherto possessed, of judging in civil and criminal cases among their dependents, the spirit of clanship would receive a mortal blow. Accordingly, it was resolved to buy up all these petty jurisdictions from the proprietors, and to vest them in sheriffs, who should be appointed by the king. It was also resolved, that the hereditary justiciarship of Scotland, vested in the family of Argyle, should be purchased, and transferred to the high court and circuit court of judicature, and that all constabularies should be abolished, except the office of high constable. This act was not carried into effect, without considerable remonstrance on the part of the country. It was by some represented, that the affections of the Highlanders to their chiefs was independent of local jurisdictions; in proof of which it required only to be stated, that some of the insurgent leaders in the late war were not in possession of lands, but exerted only a claim of kindred over their troops. There was injustice, moreover, in extending to all Scotland a severe law, which was only aimed at a small portion of the country. But the strongest argument against the measure, lay in the power which it was calculated to throw into the hands of government.

The two acts already mentioned were accompanied by another, which, while it had no such noble end in view as was proposed for the rest, could only be understood as dictated by the spirit of revenge. The act alluded to was one for the suppression of such Episcopalian ministers in Scotland, as did not mark their allegiance to the existing government, by taking the oaths and praying for the king by name. It continued, however, to be the faith by far the greater part of the wealth, rank, and intelligence of the country, down to the year 1745, when, its chapels sent forth not a few enthusiasts to join the standard of Prince Charles, and of course attracted the determined hostility of the existing government.

It was now resolved to subject it to a system of persecution which might have the colour of law. An act was accordingly passed, less than three months after the conclusion of the war, by which it was ordained, that an Episcopalian clergyman, officiating after the 1st of September 1746, without having taken the oaths of allegiance, abjuration, and assurance, or without praying once, during the performance of worship, for the king, his heirs and successors, and for the royal family, should, for the first offence, suffer six months' imprisonment, for the second (upon conviction before the high court of judicatory) be transported to the American plantations for life, and, in case of returning from banishment, be subject to perpetual imprisonment.

Cruel as this persecution was, it might not eventually have injured the church so much, if it had not also extended to the laity. The act declared, that if, after the 1st of September 1746, any person should resort to an illegal Episcopalian meeting house, and not give notice within five days of such illegal meeting to some proper magistrate, he should be subjected to fine or imprisonment. It declared further, that no peer of Scotland should be capable of being elected one of the sixteen peers of parliament, or of voting at such election; and that no person should be capable of being elected a member of parliament for any shire or borough, who should, within the compass of any future year, be twice present at divine service in an Episcopalian meeting in Scotland not held according to law.

That those statutes were not mere matters of form, but that the penalties were rigorously put in execution, could be proved by numerous instances. One clergyman, not more distinguished by his well-known poetical genius than by his piety and private worth—the Reverend John Skinner of Longmay in Aberdeenshire—was imprisoned, in terms of the second act, for six months, in the public jail of the county-town, although he had previously taken all the loyal oaths, and for two years prayed for the king by name. Other clergymen, who did not pray for the king by name, suffered similar imprisonments, and a few were obliged to take refuge in England and elsewhere, from the penalties with which they were threatened.

The general result of the two statutes was, simply, to annihilate utterly the conscientious portion of the church. It was now impossible for a clergyman of that sort to have a congregation, and, consequently, to maintain himself by his profession. It was equally impossible for a lay member of the church to continue in the faith of his forefathers and that of his own youth, without incurring disqualifications of the most grievous sort. Altogether, the persecutions to which the church was subjected, were of a nature even more severe than those with which the presbyterian church was visited in the reign of Charles II. In what are considered the hottest periods of that persecution, the clergymen were permitted to retain parish churches, upon the simple condition of yielding verbal obedience to the government, and not one individual suffered punishment who was not also a rebel against the state. But, in this persecution of a later and milder time, the whole clergy were deprived of even the privileges of dissenters, and exposed to the severest punishment, except death, for simply withholding their allegiance. The presbyterians could at any time have saved themselves by pronouncing the scriptural phrase, "God save the king." But the episcopalians could not escape, without actually perjurying themselves—without swearing (by the oath of abjuration) that they believed, what no man in his senses could believe, that the pretender was a supposititious child.

However much the historian of this period may be disposed to condemn the cruelty displayed in these statutes, he must certainly acknowledge that they were attended eventually with the desired effect of disabling the malcontent part of the community. By the first, the Highlanders were deprived of the means of carrying on an active warfare; and put in a fair way of becoming amalgamated with the rest of the community. By the second, the whole people of Scotland were emancipated from their obligations to the aristocracy, and enabled to prosecute commercial and agricultural enterprise with increased effect. By the third, a religious community, which had formerly cherished unflinching affection for the house of Stuart, was completely broken up, and in a manner compelled to transfer their allegiance to the existing government.

It is true that these good effects did not immediately result from the statutes; that, on the contrary, something quite the reverse was for some time observable; and that it was only when a new and more liberal sovereign had assumed the throne, that the affections of the persecuted could be prevailed upon to run in the proper channel. But it is at the same time certain—and it is enough that such facts are certain—that from this time forward, the Highlanders began to employ their energies in the defence, instead of the annoyance of the State; that the people turned their attention more generally towards the true sources of national greatness, trade, manufacture, and the cultivation of the soil; and that the unfortunate Episcopalian Jacobites, persecuted out of all countenance, at last saw fit to become equally perjured and peaceable with the rest of the British nation.

The spirit of Jacobitism, during its period of decay, was something very different from what it had been in the year 1745. It had, till that period, been the spirit of young as well as old people, and possessed sufficient strength to excite its votaries into active warfare. But, as the Stuarts then ceased to acquire fresh adherents, and their claims became daily more and more obsolete, it was now left entirely to the generation which had witnessed its glories; in other words, became dependent upon the existence of a few old enthusiasts, more generally of the female than the male sex. After this period, indeed, Jacobitism, become identified with the weakness of old age, was supposed incapable of moving any heart, except one which might have throbbed with love for Prince Charles, or heaved to the stern music of Glads-muir and Culloden.

Malcolm MacLeod—See conclusion of Chapter 31.

In Boswell's Tour to the Hebrides, a vivid portraiture has been preserved of this excellent specimen of the Highland gentleman, as he appeared in 1773. "He was now," says Mr. Boswell, "sixty-two years of age, hale, and well proportioned, with a manly countenance, tanned by the weather, yet having a ruddiness in his cheeks, over a great part of which his rough beard extended. His eye was quick and lively, yet his look was not fierce; but he appeared at once firm and good-humoured. He wore a pair of brogues—tartan hose which came up only near to his knees—a purple camblet kilt—a black waistcoat—a short green cloth coat, bound with gold cord—a yellowish wig—a large blue bonnet with a gold thread button. I never saw a figure which gave a more perfect representation of a Highland gentleman. I wished much to have a picture of him just as he was. I found him frank, and polite, in the true sense of the word." Mr. Boswell afterwards describes Flora MacDonald, then the wife of Kingsburgh, and advanced in life, as "a little woman of genteel appearance, and uncommonly mild and well-bred." When Kingsburgh, Dr. Johnson slept in the bed which had been occupied, eight-and-twenty years before, by the unfortunate prince.

"The curious reader" may desire some further notice of a lady so celebrated as Flora MacDonald. It may be mentioned, from the tradition of her family, that she was indebted for her liberation to Frederick, Prince of Wales, father to his late majesty, King George III. His royal highness had the curiosity to visit "the Pretender's deliverer," as she was called, in prison. He asked her how she came to do a thing so contrary to the commands of her sovereign, and so inimical to the interests of her country; to which she answered, in a firm but modest style, that she conceived herself to have only obeyed the dictates of humanity in doing what she had done, and that, if it ever were his royal highness's fate, or that of any of his family, to apply to her under circumstances equally distressing with those of the Chevalier, she would, with God's blessing, act again precisely in the same manner. Frederick was so much pleased with this reply, that he exerted himself to get her out of prison.

After she had been set at large, she was taken into the house of a distinguished female Jacobite, named Lady Primrose, and there exhibited to all the friends of the good cause who could make interest to get admission. The presents which she got at this period were perfectly overwhelming; and the flattering attention which was paid to her, might have turned the heads of ninety-nine out of a hundred such young ladies. Instances have been known, according to the report of her descendants, of eighteen carriages belonging to persons of quality, ranking up before the house in which she was spending the evening. Throughout the whole of these scenes, she conducted herself with admirable propriety, never failing to express surprise at the curiosity which had been excited regarding her conduct—conduct which, she used to say, never appeared extraordinary to herself, till she saw the notice taken of it by the rest of the world.

After retiring to her native island, which she did with a mind totally unaffected by her residence in London, she married Mr. MacDonald of Kingsburgh, the son and successor of the venerable gentleman to whose house she had accompanied Prince Charles. When past the middle of life, she went with her husband to America, and met with many strange mischances in the course of the colonial war. Before the conclusion of that unfortunate contest, she returned with her family to Skye. It would appear that, at this advanced period of her life, she retained all the heroic courage which so remarkably distinguished her early years. It was told by her venerable daughter, Mrs. Major MacLeod, who accompanied her on the occasion, that a French ship of war having attacked them in their homeward voyage, and all the ladies being immured in the cabin, she alone could not be restrained, but came upon deck, and endeavoured by her voice and example to animate the men for the action. She was unfortunately thrown down in the bustle, and broke her arm; which caused her afterwards to observe, in something like the spirit of poor Mercutio, that she had now risked her life in behalf of both the house of Stuart and that of Brunswick, and got very little for her pains.

She lived to a good old age, continuing to the last a firm Jacobite. Such is said to have been the virulence of this spirit in her composition, that she would have struck any man with her fist, who presumed, in her hearing, to call Charles by his ordinary epithet "the Pretender."

A SUBALTERN'S FURLOUGH.

The ensuing number of the "Library" will commence a remarkably pleasant book just received from London, entitled "A Subaltern's Furlough: descriptive of scenes in various parts of the United States, Upper and Lower Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia during the summer and autumn of 1832. By E. T. Coke, Sergeant of the 45th regiment." We are much mistaken if it does not prove one of the most popular works on the subject of America which has appeared. The London Metropolitan for July says of it:—

"Mr. Coke is an author of much merit and little pretension. 'He only speaks right on, and tells you what he himself hath seen,' and truly he has seen a great deal, and tells it pleasantly." Mrs. Trollope's book appeared under the impression of one writhing through neglect and mortified feelings; Captain Basil Hall under the bias of tory prejudices. Both turned instinctively to the absurd and the ridiculous of the manners of those whose hospitality they were sharing; they described the dirt that was gathered at the base of the columns, or the soiled and green weather-marks on the shaft without regarding its height or contemplating its magnificence. Mr. Coke, without being guilty of any thing like adulation, has praised where praise was due, and not goaded by a dissimilarity of manners into the assumption of contempt, has been able fully to appreciate the bright surface as well as the dusky spots of the American character. Our transatlantic brethren must for some considerable time look at essentials; refinements are the polish of old countries, and are always concomitant with a great degree of vice among the higher, and misery among the lower orders of society."

Great Britain in 1833.

BY BARON D'HAUSSEZ,

EX-MINISTER OF MARINE UNDER KING CHARLES X.

INTRODUCTION.

After the last number of the "Library" went to press, we received from London the new work of Baron D'Haussez, and concluded to make it supersede the "Subaltern's Furlough" for the present. This production of an exiled minister will be found to possess uncommon interest, and it is now published in America, probably in a shorter time after its appearance in London, than has ever been the case with a foreign work. The London Literary Gazette of the 27th of July, says of it:—"The volumes are not yet published. We believe they will be ready next week." Thus the work is prepared for distribution over our whole country, in six weeks from the date of its issue in Great Britain, and may be read from Louisiana to Canada in the shortest possible period, realising completely the advantages of the "Library" mode of circulation. We mention this incidentally, not that we think the rapidity of its issue adds to the intrinsic merits of the book. The London Journal above quoted remarks:—

"To the production of Baron D'Haussez we would particularly invite attention. We enjoyed the gratification of his acquaintance, and can vouch for his partaking in character more of what we would call strong English sense and sterling ability, than of French vivacity and imagination. His remarks, therefore, even where not profound, are not superficial, and the errors into which he has fallen, though they amuse us, ought not to warp our minds from the consideration due to his more accurate and original remarks, or the conclusion to which they lead him. Having premised so much, we shall not detain our readers from the worthy baron, who has thus profitably occupied his time, which his more unfortunate associates, De Polignac, Peyronnet, and Montbel, have spent so painfully within the fortress of Ham."

The reader will naturally be prepared to find a Bourbon ex-minister favourably disposed to their cause; but this very adherence to an exiled benefactor, evinces a fidelity of principle that does credit to the Baron.

ADVERTISEMENT.

To the English reader some account of the author of this work cannot fail to be interesting. It is but fitting that he should know who and what the individual is who so freely criticises his country. With this view, we have thought it necessary to give the following sketch of the life of the author.

Descended from an ancient family of the Parliament of Normandy, the Baron D'Haussez was still young at the epoch of the first revolution. Devoted, like his ancestors, to the royal cause, he entered the ranks of the army of Brittany. He formed part of the division of M. de Proté, when that general surrendered and was assassinated in the contempt of the terms of capitulation.

M. D'Haussez was arrested upon that occasion; and afterwards, when being restored to liberty, was subjected to a strict surveillance. Nevertheless, he did not hesitate to take an active part in the conspiracy against the consular government, being one of those concerned, in 1804, in the abortive attempt of Pichegru and Cadoudal. Although arrested upon the discovery of the plot, M. D'Haussez escaped trial; but was subjected to a stricter and more rigorous surveillance than he had hitherto undergone.

From this period he took no part in public life, nor do we hear more of him till the period of the restoration.

He was returned to the chamber of deputies in 1815, and prominently opposed the majority of that chamber.

An official career now opened to M. D'Haussez. Being called to fill successively some important prefectures, he distinguished himself by his talents, and still more by an activity and political energy which were crowned with marked success. His labours, together with the various projects which he had in contemplation, are recorded in the works he has published concerning the departments under his control. These departments are indebted to him for excellent roads, handsome and useful public buildings, bridges, &c. Nor was he inattentive to agriculture: in his Etudes Administratives sur les Landes, published in 1826, he proves what well directed efforts may accomplish, even on the most sterile soils; indeed the country between the Garonne and the Adour attests the advantages derived from his able superintendence.

The reader who may wish for a further account of the agricultural improvements effected by M. D'Haussez, and of the efforts made by him in favour of the poor of the different departments over which he presided, is referred to the Etudes sur les Landes.

It may not be irrelevant to observe in this place that while M. D'Haussez was prefect at Bordeaux, he was distinguished by kindness and hospitality towards our countrymen; and men of the most varied and opposite political sentiments allow him to have been an active and enlightened prefect.

In 1829 M. D'Haussez was appointed to the ministry of the marine. Some idea may be formed of his activity while holding this important office, when it is stated that he was charged with the whole of the preparations for the expedition to Algiers. In a few months he assembled, in the roads of Toulon, a fleet of more than a hundred ships of war, and six or seven hundred transports. It is generally known in France that to the unaided energy of the minister of marine the conquest of Algiers was mainly owing: the French navy did not very willingly enter on the task.

The events of July, on which it is not necessary to dwell at length, compelled M. D'Haussez to fly his native country. Thanks to his presence of mind, and to the courage of a friend, he escaped the fortress of Ham.

Upon his arrival in England, Baron D'Haussez sought to divert the tedium of exile by literary composition, which had been always familiar to him; and these pages, as well as certain memoirs, relating to events in which he has borne a part, are the results of his labours.

These sketches of England were composed after an experience of three years' residence. They are certainly written in a free—it is for the public to say whether in a fair, spirit. The object of Baron D'Haussez appears to be to speak the truth honestly as regards the institutions, customs, and manners of England; to avoid servility on the one hand, and on the other to steer clear of intemperate abuse.

London, June, 1833.

PREFACE.

Brought to the shores of England by the force of circumstances to which my will was subservient, it became my anxious care to profit from the time I should have to reside in that country, by studying its manners, its customs, and its institutions. Thanks to the benevolent disposition which the English are wont to display towards foreigners, to that innate and exclusive curiosity which rivets itself to every object, living or inanimate, out of the common sphere, their eagerness to become acquainted with those who have played a conspicuous part in human affairs, I have to record to their praise, the testimonies of interest which I received at their hands, and which have converted my esteem into a feeling of attachment. My exile has thus assumed the appearance of a visit, and my proscription gave me a title to the confidence and marked attentions.

An alternate state of frequent intercourse with a numerous and distinguished society, apparently not unwilling to yield a free range to my remarks, and of absolute retirement, tended alike to give me the command of the most valuable materials, and of the leisure and solitude so indispensable for arranging and acquiring a thorough knowledge of them. To this varied occupation I devoted all my time. Availing myself of the advantageous position in which I was placed, in order to form a correct judgment of a people who have been in France the theme of exaggerated blame or censure, according to the dictates of pure caprice, I hope to have steered a course altogether free from both extremes. To those who, in their ignorance of England, or in their appreciation of it through the perverted medium of a conventional enthusiasm, affect to speak of that country in a language of ecstasy and admiration which no argument can shake,—to such the opinions I have uttered will doubtless appear fanciful or too rigorous. Others again will condemn them as too favourable, who, tenaciously adhering to prejudices which should long since have been banished, and encouraging these prejudices by their insatuated blindness and hostility, disdain to acknowledge that there can exist any thing noble, honourable, or of value, out of their own country, and beyond the sphere of those customs in the midst of which they have been reared. Such is the fate reserved to impartiality; and I submit to it without complaint. If my observations are tinged with criticism, I may venture to declare that they never can assume a character of personality or of calumny.

It will be gratifying to me to bestow praise on what may appear deserving of it. If occasionally called upon to use the language of censure, I shall never give utterance to expressions which might call in question the attachment I so unfeignedly entertain for the English nation, in return for the noble and generous hospitality of which I have been the object during my residence in England.

LONDON.

Few foreigners land in England without being impressed with the conviction that a difference, manifested almost at every instant, exists between her manners and customs and those of other countries, and, above all, those of France—a difference which should be the subject of surprise and study; and that one is met at every instant by a sentiment of national superiority to which one is obliged to yield. After a little this opinion disappears: one sees that the costumes of all classes of society differ in nothing from those of the Continent—that the mode of address is the same, though in a certain degree less courteous; and that there exists not much more difference in the hotels, or in the prices which they demand. The comparison between England and the Continent ceases when one examines the roads and carriages: in this respect all is admirable, in reference to appearance or convenience, and it must unhesitatingly be admitted that in these matters England enjoys an immense superiority.

The country from the sea-coast to London has the aspect of the greater part of the maritime provinces of France; meadows, fields surrounded by ditches surmounted by hedges. The farm houses and dependent buildings have nothing which distinguishes them from buildings of a like nature on the continent; the only difference one perceives is, that in England there prevail more neatness and order: the cottages, which are dwellings inhabited by people of very small means, are numerous and of an agreeable aspect; their fantastical architecture is covered over, if one may so say, with a fringe of flowers or of ivy, which the English employ with much taste. You occasionally obtain a faint view of mansions situated in the midst of extensive parks and plantations of trees.

The small towns that you pass through, from the irregularity with which they are planned, and from the fact of the houses being situated on the very borders of the road, or some few feet from it, with gardens or a patch of green before the door, have, in truth, the appearance of large villages. No public promenade, nothing, in a word, which on the continent gives to a collection of houses the character of a town, presents itself to the eye of a traveller. Something vague and confused, which one cannot account for—a species of foggy envelope of vast extent, across which you think you can distinguish objects of a conical form, then an imposing mass which crowns the whole of this vaporous picture, fixes the attention of the stranger—it is London, with its sombre and smoky sky, its numerous steeples, and its majestic St. Paul's. None of the long avenues, the imposing luxury of the approaches to contimental towns—none of those magnificent, yet often impracticable roads which conduct you to them: the only indications of a rich metropolis are handsome houses separated from each other by gardens, diminishing in extent as you approach, and disappearing to make way for the houses which form the suburbs of London;—winding roads of unequal breadth, but bounded on either side by commodious trottoirs kept in admirable order, and filled with carriages of all kinds and fashions, circulating with inconceivable rapidity. At last you have reached London.

Here are new subjects of wonder, for every thing is presented under a different aspect from any thing in France which could form a subject of comparison. In London there is a crowd without confusion—a bustle without noise—immensity with an absence of grandeur. One sees large streets ornamented with trottoirs, paved with slabs of stone. These are separated by iron railings from brick houses two stories high, devoid of style, symmetry, or ought that resembles architecture. Some compensation is afforded for all that is wanting in art by the existence of squares whose centre presents a garden embellished by statues, flowers, and green sward, with the additional ornament of fine trees.

Here, also, are numerous bridges, two of which rival the most magnificent works of the kind; docks in which are sheltered thousands of vessels with the rich freights they are to transport; churches with colonnaded porticoes, and steeples more remarkable by their fantastic form and the boldness of their elevation than by their elegance. Few of the public buildings are distinguished from private habitations; but every thing partakes of the animation imparted by the movement of a numerous, active, and busy population.

In the evening, the scene changes: disengaged from the crowd of actors, it is illuminated by a row of gas-lamps ranged on either side of the streets. The beholder, in following their astonishing development, which throws into the shade the dark façades of the houses that line them, might fancy himself in the midst of the vast avenues of a palace lighted up on the occasion of some great event.

The parks are within the limits of this great city, or of its suburbs; their chief attractions are a copious supply of water, and trees the growth of centuries; they offer the additional advantages of a road for carriages and horses, and of walks on the green turf for pedestrians. The prospect from them is varied by the number and diversity of the surrounding houses, and by the picturesque disposal of massy clumps of trees scattered here and there by chance, rather than by design.

In the more recently built parts of London there is nothing imposing but the breadth and handsome proportions of its streets; and in the city, nothing but its immense population and the impress of life which commerce imparts to it. With the exception of the churches, whose style, whether Greek or Gothic, is tolerably pure, few buildings fix the attention of a stranger; but a great number may surprise him into admiration by the profusion or the singularity of their ornaments, or by the beauty of their site. To this cause, and the irregularity in the line of buildings, is chiefly owing the effect produced by the houses in Pall-Mall, Waterloo Place, Regent Street, and Regent's Park. So much pains have been taken to reproduce the ancient style of architecture, that one might fancy oneself in an ancient Greek or Roman city: there is not a house which has not a monumental character. The slightest examination reveals the numerous imperfections, the glaring faults of imitation without taste, without reason, and at variance with the commonest rules of art. The only object in studying such an architecture would be to record its defects and endeavour to avoid them. It is more pleasing to consider and enjoy it in its general effect, without minutely examining the impression it produces.

Among the public buildings to be excepted from this rigorous censure are Somerset House, the New Post Office, the Orphan Asylum, Newgate, the Mansion House, the Bank, and, in a less elevated order, some Club-houses, such as the Union, the United Service, the Athenæum, and the Travellers'. Three of the theatres, the Opera, Covent Garden, and Drury Lane, are deserving of notice rather for their vast proportions than for their architecture. The Colosseum, which contains a panorama of London, is a noble edifice: it has the appearance of being transported from the banks of the Tiber to those of the Thames.

St. James's can only be mentioned as a collection of brick houses piled together, without symmetry, without plan, and without effect; it is conventionally called a palace, because it is the dwelling of kings. Buckingham Palace, which is intended to be substituted to St. James's, appears to have been specially constructed to prove how many millions an architect may expend on a work of such extravagantly bad taste.

Westminster Hall, the seat of both houses of parliament, is an edifice in the semi-Gothic style, in which have been heaped together all the inconveniences of this kind of architecture, without any of its redeeming beauties.

There only remains of White-Hall that beautiful part forming the ante-chamber and hall through which Charles I. passed to the scaffold, to lay down the first kingly head which a tribunal of blood presented as a sacrifice to the delirium of a rebellious people.

It should appear, that inspired by the sight and study of Westminster and St. Paul's the English architects have drawn from the sensations inspired by these sublime compositions the courage to repudiate the bad taste which is apparent in the other classes of building. Their churches offer in general much more matter for praise than for blame. Beauty of proportions, purity of style, situation, effect, all are here united. There are few churches which do not present, either in their ensemble or in their details useful subjects of study; and there are many of them which may be cited as perfect models.

Not less remarkable for a character of graceful solidity and a justness of proportions than by the granite exclusively used in their construction, Waterloo and London bridges are among the most stupendous and the most beautiful monuments of hydraulic architecture of which a nation can boast. And if the bold enterprise of an under-water communication, destined to unite the eastern extremities of Southwark and of the city, can be completed, London will be in possession of the most surprising work of its kind which art has ever produced.

The vast basins known by the name of Docks, wherein are classed, according to their destination, those vessels which carry on the commerce of the universe, together with their cargoes, prove what a combination of wealth and talent may effect. Nothing is more calculated to convey a just idea of the commercial prosperity of England than these establishments.

Many of the squares are decorated with bronze statues, whose feeble effect is impaired, and whose merit it would be difficult to appreciate, incrustated over as they are with thick coats of black smoke, which not only obliterates the sculptural details, but spoils every thing else in London. But, to judge them as they are, these productions do not give a favourable opinion of the talent of English sculptors. St. Paul's and Westminster contain several works of better execution; but there are few even of these which can be classed among the chef d'œuvres of the art.

The hospitals of London are numerous; two among them, Bedlam and the London hospital, are alone remarkable for their architecture; the rest are but large private houses applied to this service.

Among the prisons, the Penitentiary (the costly experiment of system-mongers and benevolent theorists who seek the improvement of the physical and moral condition of the prisoners.) deserves an attentive examination, from which one may draw useful results. Here, in observing all that has been done, we may study all that should be avoided.

The aspect of the Thames claims in its turn the observer's attention. No river ever bore on its bosom a greater number of vessels, or lent its aid to a more active navigation. It presents the most animated coup d'œil; it is a water city, with its streets, its lines, its quarters, its hospitals, its churches, its population, its manners, its customs, its laws. Nothing but a sight of the Thames can give one an idea of it. But where is this view to be obtained? Commerce has seized on both banks; she has even encroached on the very bed of the river to build her establishments, reserving to herself but winding and narrow ways to transport thither all sorts of merchandise. It is only through the balustrades forming the parapets of the bridges, or from the gliding barks that plough the waters, that one can seize the ensemble of a perspective which is unique in the world, holding admiration in continual exertion without exhausting it.

One is often tempted to ask, not if there is a police in London, (its agents clad in a blue uniform with numbered collars, scattered every where night and day, would render that question superfluous,) but what the police does, so little attention is paid to its details—so great is its seeming negligence, in order not to appear over-moddling: certain it is, however, that the interference of the police is not visible in the cleanliness of the streets, nor in the indication of their names (for the names are wanting at the ends of most streets,) nor in the passing to and fro of carriages, which are drawn up pile à pile at the entrance of all public places, according to the irresponsible caprice of their drivers. It often happens, in consequence of this confusion, that vehicles of all sorts become locked together; this gives rise to a reciprocation of abuse and blows; nor is the interference of the police here apparent as regards animals, which, in being driven on market-days from one end of the town to the other, occasion frequent obstructions and often serious accidents. A certain class of women too, in spite of English modesty, exercise their shameless calling in a most brazen manner, unchecked by the police; neither do they abate those nuisances of stalls, dangerous to the health and safety of the public; nor bestow their attention on an infinity of objects which in other countries claim and deserve the attention of this part of the municipal administration. In England, trifles like these are disregarded, and interference is limited to matters of more importance. On the other hand, there are few capitals where robberies are more infrequent, where robbers are so soon discovered and punished, or where popular movements (brought about generally, it is true, by a populace without courage, and unaccustomed to the use of fire-arms) are more repressed; where there are fewer disastrous occurrences; fewer collisions between the different classes of society; or where all these results are obtained with so little constraint, vexation, and noise.

In this rapid summary I do not pretend to make the traveller acquainted with London; I describe it such as it presents itself to his examination on first passing through its streets. I limit myself to explain the first impressions which it produced on my own mind. It is, in fine, a bird's-eye-view, the details of which will be developed as we go along.

The environs of London afford at every step the clearest indications of prosperity. The number and outward appearance of the country-houses, the wealth and extent of the villages, and the activity of the population, answer to the idea that one has formed of the importance of this capital. Windsor, with its Gothic castle, its parks, and its beautiful site—Kew, with its garden—Hampton Court, with its parks, its fine trees, and a valuable collection of pictures—Richmond, with its picturesque sites and abundant vegetation, present to the indolent native, as well as to strangers, objects and prospects for highly interesting excursions. Chelsea, Greenwich, Woolwich, and Chatham, on the other hand, have attractions for those whose graver thoughts seek useful instruction in the study of monuments and establishments destined to create and maintain the power of nations.

DINNER.

To judge of the English by the simplicity of their cuisine, one might be disposed to think that they pay to the taste those gratifications which they accord to the other senses. I know not whence arises that strange delicacy which prevents people from avowing that they find a pleasure in tasting well-cooked dishes, while at the same time they vaunt their capability of being able to appreciate a pleasing melody, a handsome object, sweet perfumes, and the numerous enjoyments tributary to the sense of feeling.

Without taste, the organisation of man would be imperfect. To refuse to this sense the means of accomplishing its full gratification would be to counteract the will of Nature, which in her infinite foresight has attached a pleasure to the gratification of each want. Such, however, is the dominion of a false susceptibility, that many people hesitate to admit that they attach any importance to the enjoyments of the table. For a long time the French language wanted an expression to render the idea of a man exercising with discernment the exquisite faculty of taste, and until the word gourmet was invented, one was obliged to brand with the noble name of gourmand any one who sought more at his meals than to appease his hunger, or satisfy the cravings of his appetite.

To enjoy oneself at table is, in France, an axiom of good sense and good company. In England, on the contrary, to eat to live, seems to be the sole object; there the refinements of cookery are unknown. It is not, in a word, a science; neither does the succession in which dishes should be served up appear to be studied. To cover a table with immense pieces, boiled or roasted, and to demolish them, in the confusion in which chance has placed them, appears to be the whole gastronomic science of the country. The most ordinary seasoning of the English cuisine is a profusion of spices unsparingly thrown into the sauces. To correct the effect of this, recourse is had to the insipid simplicity of plain-boiled vegetables, which continually circulate round the table, and with which the host would fain load the guest's plate. The meat is either boiled or roasted. The fish is always boiled, and is served invariably with melted butter. The numerous transformations which the natives of the deep undergo before appearing on a French table are altogether unknown in England. Eggs are excluded from English dinner tables, and even when produced at other meals, they are served in the shell: for the talent of making an omelette enters not into the education of an English cook. English fowls are of an indifferent quality; and game is subjected to a process of roasting which deprives it of all its flavour. The confectionary is badly made and without variety. The vegetables, condemned only to figure as correctives of a too exciting cuisine, do not appear upon the table. The extremes are limited to a very scanty supply of creams and insipid jellies.

The following is the order in which an English dinner is served. The first course comprises two soups of different kinds; one highly peppery, in which float morsels of meat; the other a soup à la Française. They are placed at either extremity of the table, and helped by the master and mistress of the house. They are succeeded by a dish of fish, and by roast beef, of which the toughest part is served round. Where there is no plat-deu, a salad occupies the middle of the table. This course being removed, regular entrées are brought in, and the servants hand round dishes with divisions, containing vegetables. The course which follows is equivalent to the second course in France; but, prepared without taste, it is served confusedly. Each guest attacks (without offering to his neighbour) the dish before him.

The creams have often disappeared before the roast is thought of; which, ill carved, always comes cold to him who is to partake of it. The English carve on the dinner table, and as, before proceeding to this operation, each person is asked whether he wishes to taste of the dish or not, a considerable time is lost in fetching the plate of the person who accepts. A dinner never lasts less than two hours and a half or three hours, without including the time the gentlemen sit at table, after the departure of the ladies. The salad appears again before the desert, flanked by some plates of cheese. After the cloth is removed, dried and green fruit with biscuit are placed on the table. These compose the not very brilliant dessert. The serving up of the dinner, however, is the part about which the English give themselves the least trouble. Their table only presents an agreeable coup d'œil before dinner. It is then covered with the whitest linen, and a service of plate of greater variety, richer, and more resplendent than is to be seen in any other country.

The dessert served, conversation commences. The gentlemen lean their elbows on the table to converse more familiarly with their neighbours. The ladies draw on their gloves, and, in order not to soil them, eat the dessert with their forks. Now drinking commences to some purpose. Up to this period, the guests have only, as it were, slaked their thirst with a few glasses of wine taken with each other.

It is a civility in England for one to take a glass of wine with you. On this occasion, you are begged to name what wine you choose. This proposition, which is not to be declined, imposes on you the necessity of drinking when others are thirsty. It is often renewed, without much real inconvenience, however, for those who do not wish to drink; for custom allows you merely to sip a little from the glass, which you seem to fill on each fresh challenge. Sometimes, between these frequent libations, but not commonly, a glass of beer is swallowed. This is not wonderful, for the strength of the English wines is more calculated to excite than allay thirst. The same want of regularity and system which is observable in the service of the dinner, exists in the distribution of the wine. The different species of wine succeed each other without regard to their respective qualities. To empty bottles and wine-season (aviner) the conversation, appears to be the only object of the guests. England, accordingly, is as deficient in gourmets as in gastronomes.

At a signal given by the mistress of the house, the company rises, but only the ladies retire. The master of the house takes his plate and his glass, and places himself near the person he wishes to honour. The other guests draw near to each other, and then commences without interruption the circulation of four glass decanters, which each man, after helping himself, passes to his neighbour. Sometimes idle conversation springs up on this occasion; sometimes interesting political discussions, which, from the warmth of manner and the force of argument exhibited, are not unlike those parliamentary discussions, of which they may be often considered as the rehearsals. Local interests are sometimes talked of, and above all hunting and coursing, which are in England important affairs. Presently the conversation becomes more animated, is carried on across the table, and grows confused and noisy. After three quarters of an hour or an hour, they are interrupted by the announcement of coffee; but instantly after this announcement, the conversation is resumed; nor does it cease till all the subjects under discussion are exhausted.

At length, the gentlemen quit the dinner table, and go to join the ladies, who are found round the tea-table, or occupied in turning over a collection of caricatures. Coffee, which has been poured out since the moment of its announcement, and consequently cold, awaits the guests, who in general take but a little, preferring two or three cups of very strong tea. The party is prolonged till twelve or one o'clock.

There are many exceptions to the state of things I have been describing. In many houses there are French cooks; but the dinners which they send up are neither appreciated nor remarked. In order that the arts may spring up in a country, something more than artists is necessary; it is essential also to have connoisseurs; and if England, in cookery as in music, borrows her professors from foreign lands, she will never obtain either a national cuisine or a national music.

THE DRAWING-ROOM.

Ten o'clock has already struck: the ladies, who have been more than an hour in the drawing-room, await round the tea table, the end of the conversation which is still prolonged in the dining-room. Some strangers arrive; shake the hand of the mistress of the house, and exhibit a like politeness to such of the ladies present as they are acquainted with. They group themselves afterwards round the fire-place, to chat together if they are intimate, or if they have been introduced; that is to say, if their names have been interchanged by the friendly agency of a third person. Without this formality, custom does not sanction any intercourse between strangers. The dinner-guests enter the drawing-room one after another; they approach the ladies; they take coffee or tea, and sometimes liqueurs; they then form groups, and return to the eternal subject of politics, always, it must be admitted, discussed without violence or warmth, and with much forbearance towards opposite opinions. Some form parties to play at cards. Others approach the piano to hear a sonata coldly executed; or romances sung by voices often agreeable, but rarely animated: for in England music is not a passion nor even a taste. It is but an affair of ton and convenance, a means of killing time. Some of the ladies range themselves round a table covered with knick-knacks, which are passed from hand to hand with a lazy curiosity, and have no other merit than their exorbitant cost. How much better had the money squandered on them been applied to the purchase of clocks, wanting in all the English apartments, or to a more elegant species of furniture than that covered with printed calico, which one sees in the greater part of the best furnished salons of the capital.

Albums, chiefly composed of engravings and coloured lithographs, as well as caricatures, are turned over, till the moment when the sated appetite is again stimulated by the display of cold meats, confectionary, and fruits in an adjoining room. Sometimes the sound of the piano provokes a country-dance, wherein figure those pretty persons who have at last borrowed from France the graces which have always distinguished her dancers.

The dress of English women differs very little from that of the French. Some additions of finery, some jewels of an equivocal taste, alone protest against the invasion of our fashions; but these exceptions cause the elegant recherche of the toilet, which distinguishes the ladies of the higher ranks of society to be more highly appreciated.

An English saloon presents in its ensemble and arrangement a coup d'œil quite different from a French one and without partiality it may be averred that the comparison is quite in favour of the latter. The cause of this is owing to the grouping and incongruity of the English furniture; you seldom see the furniture of an English room uniform, rarer still is it to find it ranged in order. Among a dozen chairs and fauteuils there are not two alike in height, size, and destination. The greater part of them are so low, that one falls down rather than sits; and a disagreeable effort is necessary to rise from this position. The posture of the body is accordingly ungainful, and it provokes a negligence of manner which extends into the usages of society. A disuse of those immense and heavy fauteuils, which appear calculated to produce sleep rather than conversation, and the substitution of furniture better adapted to elegant society, would be a step made towards a nobler carriage. The distinctions heretofore established by the hierarchy of ranks are now hardly remarked. It is only in set parties that pretensions of this kind can be gratified; in the ordinary intercourse of English life they are not remarked.

French is spoken with much grace, and with evident complaisance towards foreigners, in almost all distinguished families. The English ladies, above all, speak it as their maternal language.

There is one English custom which makes a disagreeable impression upon a stranger on his admission to English society. He is not conducted down stairs; the master of the house, who scarcely comes forward to receive him when he enters, dispenses with the ceremony of accompanying him when he withdraws. English politeness confines its duties on this occasion to a pull of the bell, as a notice to the servant who is intrusted with the duty of doing the honours of the ante-chamber. In a word, if the saloons of London present less gaiety, noise, and bustle, than those of Paris, they exhibit a higher degree of courtesy towards social superiors, and particularly towards foreigners, who are received with cordiality and treated with distinction.

A BALL.

Great importance is attached to a ball in England; a long time before it takes place the newspapers announce it, and they entertain their readers with it after it is over. No detail escapes them, and the most pompous terms are employed to describe the most uninteresting circumstances—"Lady N." say they, "gave on such a day, at her magnificent mansion in Berkeley square, one of the most brilliant balls we remember to have witnessed. Her ladyship's long suite of superbly furnished apartments were thrown open on this occasion. In one of the rooms, the choicest refreshments were served with a profusion which did honour to the generosity and good taste of the noble hostess. The guests began to arrive at ten o'clock; at eleven o'clock the saloons were full. An hour elapsed ere the curiosity of the assembly had sated itself in admiring the splendour of the decorations. At length Collinet's band was heard, and a great part of the company flocked towards the ball room."

"The seductive Miss —, wearing in her hair a garland of roses, and dressed in white satin; the graceful Miss Helen —, in a robe of scarlet crape; the exquisitely shaped Miss Adelaide —, in a robe of black satin, and the lofty Lady —, in a robe lamée, in silver and gold, opened the ball with Lord —, Lord —, Sir William —, and Sir —."

"A splendid supper, consisting of every delicacy of the season, succeeded the refreshments served during the country dances. At four o'clock in the morning the company separated, deeply impressed with the graceful reception and refined politeness of the lady of the mansion, and the hospitality of her noble husband."

To this account of a ball, at which I was present, extracted from the principal London newspapers to which it had been officially sent, I will append a faithful recital of what I witnessed.

The house in which the fête was given, though handsome enough for an English mansion, was, nevertheless, of moderate size: by comparing its extent with the number of persons invited, it was obvious that (as at most of the London fêtes) space was really wanting.

The receiving room was divided by a sliding partition, which was removed for the occasion. Two lustres, lighted with about fifty wax candles, and reflected by handsome mirrors, contrasted disadvantageously with the deep red drapery of the saloon. Some vases of flowers lined the foot and angle of a staircase, which two people could scarcely ascend abreast.

Having made my appearance at half past ten o'clock, I found the master and mistress of the house alone, seated near the principal door of the salon awaiting the company, which did not arrive till eleven. Twenty large fauteuils and two sofas placed perpendicularly to the chimney, and in a very inconvenient position, were soon occupied. Two hundred ladies, detained at home by the tyranny of bon ton in all the ennui of a domestic fire side till twelve o'clock, now filled the two salons. Beyond, was a small room, whose originally narrow dimensions were still further reduced by a table covered with caricatures, albums, and knick-knacks. This room communicated with a small ante-chamber, and led into a gallery crowning the staircase, on the steps of which the last comers ranged themselves in couples.

At twelve o'clock the ball room was thrown open. For a few minutes the other rooms were freed of the unpleasant crowd; but the respite was of short duration, for the carriages which every moment continued to set down fresh company in a ratio disproportioned to the extent of the apartments, obliged, at length, a part of the assembly to take refuge in the hall, which was quietly abandoned by the servants, these latter establishing their head quarters on the steps outside the door. To move was now impossible for those who had not the strength to use their elbows, or the courage to leave a portion of their dress in the midst of the crowd.

The supper room was thronged with people who could not make their way out: they who, dying with thirst, in vain attempted to enter this apartment, accused those within of immoderate appetite.

In the ball room there was the same crowding, the same suffocation, with this additional difference, that the male dancers opposed to the approach of the crowd effective coup de pieds, and the ladies a certain portion of their person which shall be nameless. The orchestra was composed of a piano, a harp, violins, a violoncello, a trombone, and a key organ, which mingled its sharp tones with those of the other instruments, and sometimes executed solos.

At three o'clock, such of the party as suffered most from suffocation, proceeded home. Two hours were consumed in getting up the equipages, owing to the confusion which reigned among them: at length, however, the owners entered their carriages, their dresses which three or four hours before were so smart, now all discomposed; but there was the next day the consolation of reading in their morning papers of the pleasures one was supposed to have had at the ball, and those details of it which one could not have observed there.

A PRIVATE CONCERT.

"Were I not obliged to have recourse to my talents in order to exist," said L. B—— to me, "I should prefer ten thousand francs earned at Paris to fifty thousand in London. In France the arts are understood, and there they know how to class artists in the order of their respective talents: in England, however, they understand music as little as they know how to compose it. Noise, plenty of noise, is all that is necessary to ears which are content to hear, provided they are not obliged to listen."

L. B—— was chagrined when he thus addressed me; he had been singing: they had heard him, but they had not listened.

A few days after this conversation, I was invited to another concert. There were about sixty ladies present, promiscuously seated. Their conversation, carried on in a loud voice, did not announce much inclination to listen to the music. A handsome person, rather strangely dressed, entered without being announced; four or five very young men followed her: they all placed themselves near the piano-forte. At the instant when conversation was most animated, the sound of a voice was heard, which, aided by the thumping on the instrument of the person who accompanied it, tried to raise itself above the tumult. People now began to talk louder. A concerted piece was not better received. This medley of voices talking, crying, singing, joined to the sounds of a discordant instrument and the clinking of tea-cups, produced the effects of the best organised charivari. Occasionally the singing ceased; then it commenced again, without these interruptions being at all remarked.

I was told that the artistes were pupils of the Royal School of Music; a species of forlorn hope, who are put forward on these occasions, to encounter the first effects of the little sympathy felt by the English for music, and who would soon make way for virtuosi likely to claim more attention. Presently a thick-set man, with a counter-tenor voice, sat down to the piano; then another large man, with a faint treble; then a tall woman, who, opening her mouth with an unpleasant grimace, afforded a wide passage for a voice really well suited to an inattentive auditory.

Some pretended amateurs approached the musicians; but it was only for the purpose of talking more at their ease than in the more crowded part of the room, where the noise was too deafening. These people seemed to think that their presence alone (for attention they bestowed none) exhibited an unequivocal desire to be thought amateurs and courteous towards the artistes.

The performers, after executing some few more pieces, the merit of which was altogether lost, retired, recompensed by the money they received for the cold reception given to their musical efforts. Their exit appeared to cause as little sensation as their singing, and the merit of the concert will have been appreciated only in exact proportion to its cost.

AN EVENING AT VAUXHALL.

The English people have yet to complete their education in respect to public amusements. They seem to think that it is enough to be spectators at public places. All other species of participation, all that enthusiasm which communicates its pleasure from one to another, must not be looked for. The real lovers of art are necessarily few in a crowd, composed chiefly of people who go to theatres and public places, for the purpose of occasionally breaking in on the monotony of their habits. John Bull shows himself silent, grave, heavy, on these occasions; he does not dance: he is quite satisfied with appearing at places to which his curiosity is attracted.

Vauxhall is the most celebrated garden in England for evening amusements, yet the divertissements exhibit little variety. A noisy orchestra, musicians in grotesque dresses, grimace-makers, optical illusions; porter, fowl, and salad; brilliant illuminations, and sometimes ingenious fire-works; these are the attractions which Vauxhall holds forth. When one has walked here till one is completely tired, eaten to perfect satiety, and drank in proportion, one returns home with the gravity of demeanour of monks quitting their chapels to repair to their cells.

The two classes of society which, in Paris, give éclat and piquancy to these meetings are wanting in London. The "beau monde," disdains them, and the bourgeoisie cannot frequent them on account of the expense. Add to this, that Sunday in England not being devoted to those diversions to which a part of that day is devoted in other countries, the English bourgeoisie would be obliged to give to Vauxhall the time required either for labour or repose. Besides, it would be necessary to dress better on these occasions than the English tradesmen are accustomed to do on a week day.

Nothing, therefore, is more triste than the long corridors of Vauxhall, notwithstanding the thousands of small lamps with which they are lighted, and the hundreds of tables, on each of which a cold fowl is placed to tempt the ever ready appetite of the visitors. Neither the singers, who make themselves hoarse by dint of bawling, from the balustrade of a Chinese temple, for a public which hears them not; nor the ventriloquists; nor the imitators of birds and beasts; nor mills turned by a cascade in this corner, nor a transparency in that, can give to these gardens a passing interest. In leaving them, one asks, why one went thither? And one is surprised that nothing has been reaped from the journey, but a lighter pocket and heavier limbs, together with a plentiful crop of ennui and yawns, the heralds of a needed sleep to which the visitant is about to surrender himself.

FAMILY CONNECTIONS.

English families are too numerous to be long knit together. It is a rare occurrence, indeed, if the affection of parents and relatives should spread itself over the numerous progeny of each house connected with them, and display that delicate care, that affectionate kindness, which is remarked in other countries. If these attentions are bestowed in infancy, they relax in a precise ratio with the development of bodily and mental faculties. As soon as an education fitting for the future career of a young man is given him, so that he may be enabled to provide for himself, he is trained to do without those parental cares. This is one of the reasons why a too numerous family causes so little anxiety to the parent, his paternal fortune being insufficient to secure to each of them an appropriate establishment. The family increases without the father giving himself any uneasiness as to what shall become of them. The eldest son will inherit the greater part, sometimes the whole of the fortune, and will be charged with the duty, often faithfully fulfilled, of protecting the family. The other brothers follow a profession or some employment. An Englishman has all the world before him: independently of the lucrative employments at home—independently of the numberless sinecures which the government offices, the army, and above all the church, offer to the ambition and cupidity of powerful families, India presents assured fortunes not only to these, but to families of middle condition. The young men sent thither make their fortune or die, and thus the relations have nothing more to trouble themselves about. As to girls, all being by law excluded from the inheritance of the real estate, all have an equal chance of forming establishments. Happy they whom nature has endowed with personal charms,* or who belong to respectable families! (d des maisons en crédit.)

The second generation little engages the solicitude of relatives, who often are unacquainted with all the members of it. In support of this assertion, I will cite the following anecdotes, however improbable they may appear to French readers.

I arrived at a country mansion at the same time as one of the sons of my host. We found in the saloon a family composed of the father, the mother, two young persons, and a child ten years old. We bowed to these strangers, and after some moments of silence, we opened the conversation by some common-place remarks. A few moments afterwards, the host and hostess entered, embraced in an affectionate manner the lady who preceded us, shook hands with the husband, asked the names of the children, and were astonished to find them so tall and handsome. They then presented their son to the members of the strange family, telling him that these were his sister, his brother-in-law, two nieces and a nephew. An almost incredible story, yet a fact! The brother had never seen his sister, who was much older than himself, and he was totally unacquainted with his family. If he was even of the name of his brother-in-law, it was as much as he knew. After this, let those sympathies produced by ties of blood be vaunted if you will.

"I should like to dance," said a young lady dressed in black, on hearing the violin of a village fiddler. "I should like to dance, but I dare not."

"For whom are you in mourning?" said I.

"For my eldest brother."

"Is he long dead?"

"A fortnight."

"That is very recent."

"Oh, but I had no great reason to love him; we did not know each other."

"He did not live in England, then?"

"Oh yes; but on his estate, far from London, where he hardly ever came, and where I very rarely go. From my earliest infancy I have been brought up by an uncle, whom I never left, not even to visit my father's house. Thus it has happened that I have never once seen my brother, and I learn his death through the newspapers."

"If he returned, then, to this earth, he would not love you?"

"Impossible."

"In that case, then, you may dance. That is just what I mean to do;—give me your hand,"—and in a moment we were on the floor of the ball-room.

A kind of social position, unknown in other countries, and the singularity of which is not even remarked here, is created in England by separations and divorces, and the second marriages entered into after those conjugal partings. The children, whose birth has preceded the divorce, maintain their social relations with their parents. Do they go to their father's house? They meet a step-mother. Does duty draw them towards their mother? They pay their respects to a father-in-law. They are well received every where—they put up with every thing—nothing astonishes or afflicts them. One would be tempted, indeed, to believe that they rejoice in an event which has doubled the objects of their affection, owing to the friendly intercourse and kindness interchanged between them and those new relatives given to them by the disunion of their families.

MARRIAGE.

"Marriage," says Figaro, "is the drollest of all serious matters." A witticism which was not without its truth in Paris at the epoch at which Beaumarchais wrote is without point in London. There are few things which are allied to drollery in an English marriage, and nothing which gives rise to gaiety. Elsewhere, marriage is a tie which joins, if it does not completely unite, two beings who have agreed to pass their lives together. In England it is a chain which binds one's movements, one's wishes, even one's thoughts. There is no country in the world where more attention is bestowed on the subject of marriage, with more satisfactory results.

Youth is already passed before people in England think of entering into this state. Few men think of marrying before thirty, and few women before twenty.

* Beauty in England is most frequently preferred to fortune. The consideration of fortune, which in other countries balances the choice of men, and too often influences it, is avoided by the nature of the English laws as regards the rights of women. It is not impossible that this may have an effect on the physical perfection of the English race.

two or twenty-four. This is the most suitable age, because the heyday of the passions is over, and the character is formed, without the habits having become fixed. Marriage is not, as in France, an affair of convenience, of condition and fortune, of love and etourderie. The parties study each other's character, and scrutinise each other's tastes. Should this first scrutiny prove favourable, an intimacy commences, and it is after this only that formal overtures are made. These overtures once accepted by the family, the intended is already considered as united to the person whom he is to marry. He sees her on all occasions, and alone; he goes out with her, while she presides over the arrangement of their projected household, and occupies herself with a future which is not yet guaranteed by any irrevocable engagement.

This state of things, which permits no shade of character, no quality, no defect, to escape the observation of either party, lasts several months, and the engagement is only rendered binding when the certainty of a reciprocal good understanding is no longer a matter of doubt.

The happiest experience of its effects attests the advantages of a proceeding chalked out by the plainest reason and good sense. English marriages, notwithstanding the restrictions they carry along with them, the privations they impose, the rigorous duties which they exact as a law, are in general productive of happiness. Husbands may dispense with the necessity of exhibiting themselves as jealous, tyrannical or exacting, in all that relates to their honour and dignity. Custom has in this case provided against every contingency; and custom exhibits a greater severity than husbands themselves could decently do. As the men command without tyranny, the women obey without reluctance. On the part of the one and the other, it is an affair of custom and manners. The rule is uniform; that which happens in one house happens in all others. In none is therefore found any lively pleasure; but as the parties did not count on this, it is not a matter of chagrin. They live without emotions, it is true, but this very calm is in itself a happiness.

When the question has been well examined, it may be asserted, thanks to the influence of custom and manners in England, that the marriage state is a happier one in that country than it is in any other.

All marriages are not, however, made with that maturity of reflection, and those wise precautions, which so much contribute to the happiness of the conjugal state. Sometimes a hasty and impetuous passion, in opposition to the wishes of relations and the usages of society, terminates in a runaway marriage. In order to get rid of difficulties, the parties, in this case, proceed to Gretna Green. What is Gretna Green? It is a village on the frontiers of Scotland, where, in virtue of I know not what custom, a family of blacksmiths have had, for a series of generations, the privilege of legally marrying people in that locality, who wish not to be subjected to the marriage-laws prevailing in their own country. At Gretna Green no preparatory acts, no consent of parents, is necessary. No enquiries are made; no obstacles present themselves.

You appear before the blacksmith; you declare your wish to unite yourself with such a person, and straightway you are married. All that is necessary, is to reach the spot called Gretna Green. But herein lies all the difficulty; the road from London to Gretna Green is a species of race-course, on which the lovers, who fly the pursuit of father and brothers, put to the test the speed of post-horses. The first-named have in general the start by some hours; but when one is in love, one cannot always fly. One must stop to speak more at leisure concerning one's happiness, one's projects, one's dreams; one thinks not of pressing the paces of the horses; and the father, who is pre-occupied with nothing but the matter in hand, who pays the postilions handsomely, gains ground on the fugitives, at length overtakes them, despatches after the lover a police-officer (with one of which fraternity it is usual on such occasions to be accompanied, were it only to beguile the tediousness of the road,) seizes his daughter, and, without paying the least attention to her tears and cries, forces her into his carriage, and drives off, whilst his travelling companion (the police officer) goes fifty-cuffs with the abductor. The parties in the end return home, each to his respective domicile, and it ordinarily happens, and for the best reasons, that a marriage on the point of being contracted in the shop of a blacksmith is celebrated with pomp in the parish church.

It is by no means an uncommon occurrence, to see men of the very first rank seeking wives behind the scenes of a theatre, and, under the protection of their titles, introducing them from the stage into the presence of royalty. The rigidity of English manners is at first startled; but, in the end, people yield on these points. A few years of staid and regular conduct cause less favourable antecedents to be forgotten; and the ex-actress, having now become a marchioness or duchess, soon numbers in her salons all that patrician pride accounts most stately and high-bred, and all that morality reckons as most rigidly severe.

Now and then it happens, that a man seduces the wife of his friend. The friend is angry thereat, as is natural. In France, in such a case, there would be a duel; here there is a law suit. Instead of a ball through the body or a sword-thrust, the husband obtains an award of some thousands of pounds sterling, as a compensation for the loss of his wife. By the same judgment he is rid of his guilty partner,* and she becomes the wife of her seducer; often exhibiting, in her new position, a rigour of principles and a regularity of conduct, of which her past life gave no promise. Morality is thus made to harmonise with private feelings.

It is now observed, that abductions, which were very frequent some years ago, become each year of rarer occurrence. Shall we seek the cause of this in improved manners, or ascribe it to a progress in immorality? Opinions are very much divided on this subject, and I shall not declare mine.

MISCELLANEOUS OBSERVATIONS.

One of the most commonly vaunted pretensions of English society is that of thoroughly knowing the interests and the people of other countries. From this to absolute judgments there is but a step, and that step is so rapidly taken that reflection has not time to intervene. It is to be regretted, that the gravity which the English carry to the consideration of other subjects, on which they exercise their good sense, abandons them on these occasions; more especially, when one hears them put forth such fallacious opinions regarding men and things, mistake facts so strangely, give implicit belief to such contemptible authorities, and exhibit so little discernment and spirit of enquiry when examining the considerations on which they form their judgment. Cautious and sensible in all that touches the interests of their own country, they are rash and inconsiderate in all that concerns other nations. And nevertheless, they are in a better position than any other people to avoid these freaks of judgment. They travel much, visit every thing, question on all occasions, write copious notes. One is tempted to ask, why take so much trouble and fatigue to carry back incorrect accounts? Why observe so much, and after all see so ill? Hasty as they are in their opinions and judgments on the political affairs of other nations; prejudiced as they are towards those who figure therein; disposed to interfere, as they must be admitted to be, not only with their purse, but their persons, in quarrels with which they have no concern; the English nevertheless allow a stranger, with manifest reluctance, to form an opinion of what passes in England. Among the politest Englishmen, an unequivocal impatience is exhibited; and those who are less courteous, take no pains to dissemble their feelings. Nobody could find fault with the English, if they exhibited towards other nations the reserve which they exact from strangers in speaking of their own.

The English proclaim themselves the friends of liberty and the enemies of despotism: in England, love of country is a worship. Enter their houses, you shall every where see the bust or portrait of Napoleon. Do they perceive in the character of this extraordinary man a favourable leaning towards liberal ideas, hatred of despotism, some faint inclination to prefer the interests of Great Britain to those of France? This is hardly possible. Should not one rather seek the cause of this infatuation in a leaning towards opinions and things which are out of the common line? In this case one must either sacrifice the patriotism or the good sense of the English; and I do not hesitate to pronounce in favour of their patriotism.

There is this peculiarity in the English character, that the defects of individuals and classes, far from militating against the general interest, operate rather in its favour.

Thus, from the want of courage in the common people results the maintenance of order; from the pride of the better classes, national pride; from the thirst after riches, public wealth; from the sluggishness of imagination, the hatred of change and consequent stability of institutions; from the mania to distinguish oneself strange but useful institutions; from the severity of the religion, a severity of manners; from a spirit of propagandism, the extension of English commerce in all quarters of the globe; from the distress of the parent state, the establishment of useful colonies; from the sale of public places, even of seats in the national representation, more aptitude and stronger guarantees on the part of those who devote their fortune to the pursuit of such objects; from the revolting inequality in the division of property, a hierarchy which connects the state and private individuals in a common bond of union.

This disposition of the social order, taken in its general sense, re-acts upon all the minor details; and the effect of it is that, notwithstanding the inconsistencies discoverable in its institutions, and the real and obvious defectiveness of its organisation, England holds a very distinguished rank amongst the best governed and the most flourishing nations of the present day; and that, so far as they go back, all its historical recollections must, on a comparison with other countries, redound to its advantage.

Duels are of rare occurrence in England. The calm tone in which the English carry on their discussions—their habitual coldness of disposition—the absence of susceptibility, even as respects certain words, which, however offensive in other languages, have no meaning in theirs—the extreme severity of the law, which, when a duel has been attended with death, subjects the victor to the fate of the vanquished—the stigma which attaches alike to duelling and duellists, these circumstances limit to a very few cases the necessity of seeking redress for injuries by an appeal to personal courage or skill. Instead of fighting, recourse is had to law, and this mode of settling differences is sanctioned by public opinion as the only natural one. Are we, then, to infer that the English are deficient in bravery because they sue for an award of pecuniary damages instead of giving a sword thrust or firing a shot in return for a box in the ear? Assuredly not. British valour is admitted on all hands, and the praises universally bestowed upon them are borne out by their glorious deeds. The courage we speak of is less common than it is in France: it displays itself in a manner and according to rules peculiarly English; but it is quite as solid, and may prove quite as beneficial to the state, as the courage of any other nation.

The English have a custom of showing every thing: when they undertake the task of gratifying a stranger's curiosity, they overwhelm it, and are unsparing of the most minute and insignificant details. In a town, no part of it, however repulsive to the sight—no building, however wretched, escapes their zeal as ciceroni. In a house, they take you from the cellar to the garret, and draw your attention to every thing it contains: there is no getting out of a library, a museum, or a collection of works of art; they make you open every book in succession, examine the most insignificant painting, admire the object least worthy of attention. There is in this habit nothing open to serious criticism, and I mention it only as conveying to the mind the idea of a species of national tic.

There is a great difference between an Englishman on the continent, and an Englishman in London. Hence originates the erroneous opinion formed of the English on the other side of the straits—an opinion founded on the defects as well as the virtues of their character. The fault of this error lies not in the judges, but in the judged: the former pronounce an opinion on what they see; the latter exhibit themselves in an assumed character, and this fictitious character is not so estimable as their natural one.

An Englishman abroad advertises, in a manner, his desire to preserve the customs of his country; he even exaggerates these, lest any of the details should escape: he pushes his prejudices even to this extent, that he wishes to bend the customs of every country he visits to those of England; he evinces susceptibility, disdain, pride; he requires attention without making any effort to deserve it, and is every where at his ease. Does he enter a salon, he hardly bows to you—awaits an introduction (a usage foreign to every country except England) before he commences a conversation, and is offended at the least neglect of those observances of which he fancies he should be the object. The crowd should, in his idea, pack itself tighter in order to give a free passage to himself, his wife, and three or four daughters, who hang upon him, and would not for the world be separated. He is inexorable on the point of conceding the smallest English custom, lest it should tend to impeach that nationality of which he is so proud.

An Englishman at home is quite a different being: prejudiced in favour of strangers, he lays himself out to please them by adopting their manners and their language, and exaggerating the advantages of both. On these occasions he divests himself altogether of his national habits, to sympathise more fully with strangers, and exhibits a politeness, a courtesy, and a readiness to oblige, which the persons who had seen him out of his own country could form no idea of.

There is some radical vice either in the character, domestic organisation, or customs of the English, for they are contented no where: they appear tormented by a rage of locomotion which drives them from town to country, from their native land to other countries—from their estates to the sea side. It is a matter of little moment to them whether they shall be happier at this place than at that; their great object is, not to be tomorrow where they are to-day. The variety and amusement which other people seek in the exercise of their imagination, the English look for in a change of place: when they have exhausted land-journeys, they shut themselves up within the narrow wooden walls of a yacht—behold them exposed to the inconveniences and dangers of the sea, sailing about without definite end or purpose, unlimited as to time, without prospect of present or future enjoyment, and already looking forward to the end of that pleasure they are about to indulge in.

This mania is not confined to individuals; it is common to a great number of families of all classes and ranks, and of various fortunes. Without speaking of Brighton, where, in subservience to fashion, some of the winter months should be passed, (fatiguingly enough it must be admitted,) one sees on all the public roads numbers of families who quit commodious habitations, and all the agrémens attached to actual ownership, in order to establish themselves as lodgers in other countries, there to undergo all the miseries which result from non-possession. Customs, affections, habits, love of soil, every thing is sacrificed, before an English family are informed what they shall find at their new abode; for their preference is not determined on any ground of reason, but suggested by the whim of the moment: people travel to Italy, to Saxony, to France, to Scotland, from one county to another, without any precise object in view.

On leaving England, families let their houses: and if the term is not expired on their return, they hire another house for a month, for a week, or for a year, as the case may be. When they find it inconvenient to travel to any distance, they remove from one quarter of the town to another, rather than remain stationary.

A foreigner is tempted to ask whether that comfort, which is the Englishman's boast, is so general that he finds it wherever an unreflecting caprice may conduct him; and if, supposing it to exist in England, the English carry it with them to the continent? Compelled to answer negatively, he asks if this "comfort" is, after all, so real and so extensive a blessing as the English pretend?—and, from question to question, he proceeds to doubt whether this summum bonum is really so valuable and necessary, sacrificed as it is so very lightly by the English themselves.

LIFE OF A FOREIGNER.

There are two indispensable conditions necessary to the foreigner who wishes to pass his time agreeably in London: plenty of money, and a distinguished social position, a celebrity, or a name which stands in the place of it. He should prepare himself to pay very dearly for the hospitality which he is obliged to seek in furnished apartments, as well as for every article with which he has not had the prudence to provide himself. The comparatively dear price at which all consumable and other articles are sold, is still further enhanced to foreigners, by the established custom of charging them double for every thing. This is a custom observed in all countries, but in none is it so religiously followed as in England.

A foreigner should be pleased in English society, so much is he the object of delicate and unwearied kindness; so great are the efforts made to obtain his good opinion, in return for the services heaped upon him. The pleasure which he finds in society ought above all to be attributed to the English ladies, who, with a grace free from coquetry, a kindness without affectation, occupy themselves in doing the honours of the house. Almost all Englishwomen speak French with fluency, and they employ this language exclusively in conversations in which strangers take a part. They know how to show their learning without pedantry, and they have the talent to keep up a conversation, whatever be the turn it takes.

The men are colder, more reserved, more penetrated with their national dignity. Their politeness is neither apparent, nor engaging. One may say of it, indeed, that it consists in desiring to be asked for that which they ought to offer.

To the two conditions already mentioned, as indispensable towards an agreeable existence in London, a third must be joined. It is a title; a qualification which precedes your name. You are then sought for, preached up, lionised. You become an object of curiosity, that is looked at, studied, and sometimes questioned to importunity. On a foreigner's complaisance in lending himself to this national habit depends the sort of reception he meets with. If you are in a condition to gratify it, you should not hesitate in complying, the more especially as, in consequence of the delicacy of the questioner, you can do so without any sacrifice of personal dignity. The English ladies are grateful for this obligingness and for the polite manners of strangers; their endeavours to justify these marks of attention prove that they are not insensible to them.

Possessed of the advantages we have laid down, one is sure to enjoy in England all the agrémens which can grace the life of a man of the world. But, if those advantages are wanting, you must fly a country where you are only considered in relation to the part you can play in it, or to that which you have played elsewhere; however severe, however multiplied the privations which you impose upon yourself, they are unable to contend against the enormity of the prices and the continual demands upon your purse.

ENGLISH FORTUNES.

The extreme inequality in the distribution of all sorts of property in England can alone explain the marvellous wealth of some individuals. The effect of the law of primogeniture (securing, as it does, the greater part of the fortune to the eldest son) is to throw after a few generations the whole fee of the soil into a very small number of hands. The equality that might be produced by dissipation, on the one hand; on the other, the chances of commercial speculation and the different circumstances which change the social position; can have no influence on the greater part of noble families, on account of the system of majorate and entails, which constitute the bases of real property, and ensure the maintenance of large fortunes.

This system of inequality must have advantages compensating for those disadvantages which common sense appears to point out; for here competency is general. The exceptions are not at all so numerous as those which afflict the observer in a country governed upon the system of an equal distribution of property.

Whilst the younger children, excluded from the division of the paternal property, obtain an advantageous position by the resources which a varied industry presents, the eldest maintain the splendour and augment the wealth of their house. They often employ their fortunes less according to the suggestions of their own will, than according to public opinion and irresistible custom. In truth they are but the stewards and dispensers of their revenues. The tendency to accumulation is prevented by their expensive pleasures, by the luxury and elegant style of their houses, by the necessity they labour under of keeping up their grounds, by the attention they are obliged to give to agriculture. The circulation of their capital is also promoted by the golden suffrages they buy of electors, who send them or their relatives to parliament, thus perpetuating an influence which they are very eager to uphold. The sums expended on these occasions not only exhaust whatever savings may have been made, but often trench upon anticipated resources. Be this, however, as it may, this expenditure has a very remarkable effect, and in the actual state of society in Europe, one should consider the sway exercised by a large fortune and an illustrious name over interested or grateful dependents as a phenomenon worthy of remark.

For the middle classes, commerce and places in the colonies offer sure asylums; military and naval rank, and church preferment, with the rich emoluments thereto attached, offer to the elder branches of great families the means of nursing, or improving, their private fortune. Honours obtained in these professions repair in some sort the unequal distribution of real property, and often raise up to eminence those of lowly fortune. Thus a brilliant lot awaits the elder branches, while an advantageous position is assured to the younger. The general aspect of the country presents an orderly and satisfactory air which announces a real prosperity.

Viewed under the relative well-being of classes and individuals, England bears off the palm from the most favoured countries of the universe. In no kingdom does such a wide spread competency prevail. To what are we to attribute this result, if not to the distribution of property?

If one took only into account the immensity of certain large fortunes, whose overgrown magnitude would seem to depend on the absolute poverty of a vast number of individuals, one would have some difficulty in discovering the secondary causes of this general prosperity. Of how many small fortunes are composed the colossal incomes of a Duke of Bedford, a Duke of Buccleuch, of a Marquis of Worcester, of a Marquis of Stafford, whose rent-rolls vary from four to eight millions of francs? and those of a number of private individuals, who would consider themselves poor if their income did not amount to six or eight thousand pounds a year, (one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand francs!) London, the city alone excepted, is the property of a dozen persons, upon whose ground the houses and squares are built. The ground-rent amounts to several times the revenue of the soil, and after a certain number of years, the houses revert to the ground landlord. There are some individuals who possess two or three thousand, other five or six thousand houses. This kind of proprietorship exists in almost all towns which have increased of late.* It is an inexhaustible source of wealth for the proprietors.

The fortunes of corporate bodies are not less remarkable than those of private individuals. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford have property in land, which produces to each an annual income of many millions of francs.

The corporations of London, and those of the principal towns, possess in houses, lands, and public funds, immense properties. These are sufficiently well managed with a view to productiveness, but very ill managed, if one considers the application which is made of their produce. This may or may not increase the sum of general wealth. Every thing depends on the caprice of those who happen for the time to be the managers, and on the conditions which they impose on the distribution and arrangement of the property.

Governed by a spirit of prudence, or by the routine of unreflecting habit, the English people have been content with this state of things. It is now wished to persuade John Bull, that he ought to consult common sense, or rather sound reason, and allow himself to be carried away by theories and changes, which would establish a more equal distribution of wealth. The last is attractive. The mind must be powerfully seduced by all the considerations which present themselves in support of the new system, and above all, a system à la this, which interests so many people. It is difficult to refrain from trying a remedy which offers so many spoils. Let, however, the machinery of such a system be once put in action, and its consequences are irresistible. That social order which exists at present will disappear, and who can say what shall occupy its place? Who can tell the extent of the sacrifices at the price of which it will be necessary to purchase the change?

The administration and expenditure of those fortunes of which I have been speaking would appear to require vast combinations, and a machinery not in harmony with the manners of the age. Were the possessor of an income of 160,000*l.* sterling to keep forty men-servants in his ante-chambers, one hundred horses in his stables, a sumptuous table, and a sporting establishment, he would appear to have attained the limits assigned to luxury, by the habits of our social state.

An inconsiderable part of such a fortune would suffice for these expenses, excessive as they appear; but the taste for improvements demands another portion of it. Roads and canals are made, palaces and châteaux are constructed, the proprietor gives himself up to the expensive mania of innovations and improvements; he wishes to become a member of parliament, and to bring in along with him, his relations and dependents, and forty or fifty thousand pounds a year are devoted to these purposes. But this is not all; his estates must be looked to; and forty men are perhaps paid for the purpose of protecting his game. In order to avoid the inconvenience of being constantly attended by a numerous suite of domestics, a complete set remains at each establishment, although it sometimes happens that the proprietor only resides there for a few days in each year. An extravagance commanded by bon ton, and a prodigality to which ideas of grandeur and dignity are attached, dispose of the rest of his wealth. Such are the means adopted by the people of large fortune in England in the disbursement of their wealth, which has the effect of producing a competence in all classes of society.

COUNTRY LIFE.

It is in their vast and magnificent chateaux in the country that the English display all their luxury. Here it is that the appointments of their servants, the profusion of their table, the beauty of their equipages, are in the highest degree remarkable. In the month of July, London is abandoned by that portion of society which piques itself on governing the fashion and giving the ton. The portion of London society which cannot afford to leave town assumes a species of incognito, goes out rarely, and receives no visits. In addition, they cause the front windows of their houses to be closed, so that nobody may suspect that they are still in London.

The first two months of sojourn at their country-seats the English consecrate to business: they invite few strangers, and limit their visits to a few near neighbours. In the month of October visiting commences: a numerous host of visitors, with a numerous suite of servants and horses, fill the chateaux of the high nobility. Whilst affecting perfect freedom, and proclaiming absolute liberty, these country réunions are, nevertheless, remarkable for the minute observance of a rigorous etiquette. Each house is but a fraction of the court, with its customs, its laws, its pretensions.

An English day is much cut up by the frequency of meals. Tea is served up at nine o'clock: and at this meal nobody is waited for, hardly even the master of the house. When the clock strikes, the first comers place themselves round the table, make the tea, and help themselves unceremoniously to bread, butter, and eggs, of which the breakfast is composed. On a side-board are placed cold meats: those who wish for a slice of meat, stand up, cut off a suitable portion, and return to their places. Neither wine, beer, nor water are served at this meal—one has only tea or coffee to quench one's thirst, for which one must frequently ask the person officiating at the tea-table. Custom excludes the presence of servants; and the persons composing the company, generally occupied in reading the newspapers, or with their letters, do not think of supplying the want of servants by transmitting from hand to hand such things as others have need of.

Another meal unites the greater part of the company between one and two o'clock. Lunch is better managed than the breakfast, and is served as the dejeuners à la fourchette in France.

At six o'clock the company assembles in the drawing-room. The toilet of the men is expected to be made with great care: the ladies, dressed as for the most brilliant soirées of the capital, make a display of their diamonds, and of those dresses which they have received from London or Paris. In the ante-room, the servants are ranged in straight lines on either side. The master and mistress of the house occupy arm-chairs at either extremity of the table: the guests place themselves without affectation according to their respective ranks.

About twelve o'clock, a fourth and last repast, served on trays, is placed at the disposal of those whose stomachs are not contented with the repasts of the day. This last meal is composed of cold meat and broiled fowls, covered with a layer of cloves, pepper, capsicum, and salt. A few glasses of hot wine, or of Sherry or Madeira, facilitate the digestion of this last repast.

The intervals between meals are devoted to riding, hunting, coursing, or shooting, to visits in the neighbourhood, or to reading, ample materials for which are presented by the immense newspapers of the capital and the well-stored library of the mansion.

There are occasions on which all superiority of rank disappears, and when all classes are confounded together. Such are a marriage, a birth, or a recovery from ill health. Every one in the house from the lord to the lowest groom, is admitted on these occasions.

After dinner the company (on this day more numerous by invitations addressed to neighbours not generally visited,) passes into the largest apartment of the mansion, where the tenants and servants are already assembled. The principal personage walks through the crowd, and speaks to every body. He then sits down at one of the extremities of the hall with his private friends, who are ranged in files on either side of him. At the other end, and in the same order, are ranged the servants, not even excepting the lowest. The men are in their liveries, the women in their best dresses; a dance now commences, and a general mélange soon takes place. Ranks are confounded, and the glove of the mistress of the house, and of the most disdainful lady, is soiled in the hand of a gamekeeper or a kitchen boy. At twelve o'clock the company retires, and leaves the scene to the servants, who prolong the ball and their momentary equality, till the hour when it is necessary for them to resume their accustomed avocations and return to their inferiority.

To sum up, this kind of country-life does not present all the pleasures which so considerable an expense, and the apparent liberty enjoyed, ought to procure. One does not always escape the prevailing ennui, resulting from morning meals without order, or from the solitary walks which follow them. Nor does the etiquette practised on these occasions add to ease or good fellowship; for it is not generally the custom to meet or acknowledge each other's acquaintance, unless in the evening. The interminable dinners which wind up the day do not tend much to enliven it. At country-seats in England, there is certainly much display of fortune, and all the éclat and pomp which vanity can desire; but there is wanting the freedom, the pleasure, the ease, which one finds in a French chateau. After a sojourn of some months, we discover that we have spent our time and our money, and obtained in return a change of scene and place and little pleasure—noise without gaiety, much society and little true affection; in a word, a great deal of luxury and little enjoyment.

ENGLISHWOMEN.

Notwithstanding the efforts made to persuade them to the contrary, Englishwomen play in society a very unimportant part. Their education would appear to prepare them for a very different future from that which is reserved for them. But the national manners impose a yoke upon them; and one sees the most decided characters prostrated before custom, assuming that apparent uniformity which distinguishes the exterior of the English people. Happy effect of the empire of custom, amongst a grave and reflecting nation, which has had the wisdom, up to the present time, neither to examine nor discuss its manners and constitution, which has consequently preserved both from change.

English female education proposes not to itself to create special beings—a species of idols, destined to be placed on a pedestal to attract the attention, command the admiration, and receive the homage of mankind. It is in general rather private than public; masters attend to teach history, music, and drawing. A Swiss governess (for Switzerland generally supplies governesses to Great Britain) familiarises the pupils with the principles and practice of the French language. Habits of order and subordination result from the nature of the intercourse between parents and their children. Maternal affection is seldom accompanied with that officiousness so prevalent in France. Instead of an interchange of caresses, it is limited to attentions on the one part and respect on the other; and the admirable subordination which distinguishes the political arrangement takes its origin from the bosom of domestic life. The direction given to their infancy and youth indisposes Englishwomen to display. Their education leaves something to desire, it is true, on trivial points; but these imperfections may in some sort be considered as advantages. Englishwomen do not hesitate to make a sacrifice of talents, of which a too complaisant flattery might render them vain, to their duties as wives and mothers. Reason applauds such sacrifices. The piano is no longer opened unless it be to supply the place of the violin at an off-hand ball; and the albums, for which the pencils and crayons of a whole society had been laid under contribution, are only turned over by the idle. The greater number of English ladies are thoroughly conversant with French and Italian literature; they know how to avail themselves of these advantages without either pedantry or affectation.

The freedom which girls enjoy in the interval between the completion of their education and their marriage appears to be a singular initiation into the seriousness and reserve of the conjugal state: you see them shopping or making visits, followed by a servant, talking with men of their acquaintance whom they meet, as well as riding out on horseback. They keep up a correspondence without giving the least account of it; and often appear at balls without their mothers, attended by a friend, who accompanies them thither and brings them home, without concerning herself about them while at the ball.

This state of freedom presents either rare or trivial inconveniences, since it prevails without influencing, in any degree, the habits or duties which women contract in marrying. Subject, thenceforward, to the most trifling wishes of their husbands, they renounce, in order to please him, almost all the enjoyments of youth; above all, dancing, which is forbidden to English wives by the greater part of English husbands. They ride out less frequently, and only when it suits the husband's pleasure to accompany them. Never interfering with the government of the household, their sterile prerogative is limited to do the honours of their table, and their drawing-rooms—those enjoyments of self-love which custom reserves to them. These serious habits are rendered necessary by the rapid increase of their families.

A sort of presentment of the privation attendant upon married life renders Englishwomen less forward to enter into this state. They rarely marry earlier than between twenty-two and twenty-four. The ten first years of wedded life are generally spent in giving effect to the command of "increase and multiply;" the ten years which follow are bestowed upon the education of their children, over whom they exercise the most constant and praiseworthy superintendence. Their youth has already passed; their tastes have now disappeared. Without effort, without regrets, almost without reflection, they begin to grow old in the practice of a kind of life rendered the more supportable, because no contrast or comparison is placed before their eyes to make them feel its désagrément.

In observing English ladies occupied in their houses, one might be led to suppose that they were exclusively engaged in the regulation of them. Here would be a great mistake; they hardly know the names of the guests invited by their husbands. In all that relates to household economy they are not better informed; the husbands order every thing. But the ladies recompense themselves for their passive nullity by spending largely on their toilet. Their equipages are brilliant. From time to time, they display their diamonds in their salons, and their plumes of feathers in an opera-box, or at the queen's drawing-room.

Twice or three times a year they do the honours of balls or routs to a company invited in their names. Their happiness is complete, when they see a long article in the newspapers, composed by themselves or by an officious friend, and paid for as an advertisement, informing all London and all England of the most minute details of the fêtes they have given.

English ladies owe to their education, if not to their character, a great deal of their internal happiness. The ill humour of a husband is never sharpened by a reply on the part of the wife. The brusquerie is blunted by the patience of a wife; and an observation, however sharp, never provokes a quarrel on her part.

Englishwomen employ, moreover, an officiousness and an active care, which attach and fix their husbands. They never make the state of their health the pretext for complaint or opposition. An extreme neatness, a recherche even, in their dress, habitual to Englishwomen, and not neglected at any hour of the day, indicates to the husband (who cannot fail to remark it) the desire to be agreeable. Kindness and attentions of all kinds coerce the husband into a reciprocity of good offices; and love, at first a duty, becomes at length a habit, a sort of second nature.

Englishwomen thus attain (after having passed through a life without variety, without lively pleasure, without great chagrins) an honoured old age, preserving the attire, the neatness, and many of the tastes of youth.

The Englishwomen want that vocation to which France has been indebted for the excellent ton which is so much admired in the world. They do not seek to reign over society; to regulate and maintain its usages; to call before their tribunal the young men who permit themselves to violate these usages: they do not, in a word, exercise that sort of censorship which anticipates invasion, and represses the errors of the mauvais ton. It is to their neglect of this, one of the most precious of their prerogatives, that is attributable the laissez-aller observable in many of the salons of London, but which abound nevertheless in the elements of a first-rate society. Here would be a part to play for those ladies who had lost the empire of youth; a part which would surround them with much consideration and a respect accompanied with fear. It would create in England that which was in France (when a society really existed there;—namely a council of venerable ladies, whose censure all feared to whose judgments all bowed acquiescence.

English literature is indebted to the female pen for a great many works of distinguished merit, chiefly in the walk of romance. The social habits of their country render the occasions rare indeed when Englishwomen can shine in society. They are, therefore, necessitated to write, and they do so with a grace and refinement of observation, which give a very piquant character to their productions.

To some of these literary ladies is given, I know not why, the name of blue-stockings. They cultivate the sciences, and do not, any more than in France, escape the ridicule which overtakes the claim to bel esprit.

It may be asked what are religion and manners in the midst of this contrast of an uncontradicted youth, and a riper age enjoying so little liberty?

Religion and manners are just what they are elsewhere.

Religion? With some women religion is an ardent piety, eager to know and prone to discuss theology, and not exempt from intolerance. But among the greater part of women, it is a neglected Bible lying on a bedroom table; it is the rigorous observance of the Sunday; precision in going to church, a grave demeanour, and a solemn look within the house of God, an apparent zeal in the external practices of religion, and a great indifference at the bottom of all.

Manners? With prudent women it is an affectation of doubt of the virtue of women of other countries, and of susceptibility regarding those of their own nation; it is a prudery of language pushed to the most laughable affectation; a life passed in the society of husbands; the continual presence of a growing family; it is, in a word, a prudent demeanour on the part of women, and an extreme reserve on the part of men.

With those women who form the exceptions, and on whom the malignity of the public has seized to produce scandal, it is sometimes a mixture of passion and love, of amour propre, and of those sudden and violent bursts of feeling which no consideration can restrain; sometimes it is guilt produced by surprise, by inability to guard against the lures of the seducer; an opportunity neither sought for nor shunned—sometimes it is crime without love, éclat without happiness, faults without remorse, perhaps even without recollections, as they have been without foresight or calculation.

It has pleased some people to institute comparisons between the women of England and those of other countries; but they have not shown themselves just in their judgments on the subject. The protection afforded to the one by the social system has not been sufficiently taken into account; nor has the abandonment in which the others are left by the usages, the manners, the prejudices, nay, the very laws of their nation, been considered in the estimate.

In conclusion, it must be admitted that the English are among the most remarkable women in Europe. They combine in their persons not only beauty, but all that renders beauty valuable, devotion to their duties, varied accomplishments, cultivated minds; the union, in a word, of all that constitutes the happiness of their domestic circle and the charm of society.

WATERING PLACES.

The busiest and the poorest among the better classes of England have always a certain portion of time and money on their hands, the employment of which embarrasses them. This arises at once from the importance and infrequency of the business requiring their attention, and from the order and economy which preside over their expenses. Be this as it may, after having passed the winter in the country and the spring in town, it is proper they should devise the means to while away the idle time of summer. Rich people travel; poor people go to the continent, to seek a place where they can live economically, cheating themselves into the belief that they make a tour. The middle classes fix themselves (under the pretext of bathing) upon the sea-side, at some place to which a short vogue has been given by the caprice and casual presence of some fashionable families. Such has been the mania for sea-bathing in England, that towns on the sea-coast have sprung into existence from the effect of this prevailing passion. Far removed from the capital, destitute of safe or sheltering harbours, without industry or commerce, these creations would, under other circumstances, never have been called into being.

Among these towns Brighton may be cited as a proof of the power of whim among a people, who do not pique themselves upon excluding singularity from their habits and their conduct. On an arid soil, unfavourable to vegetation, without a single tree, there existed a few years ago, at Brighton, a few huts of fishermen and smugglers, which have on a sudden been metamorphosed into an extensive and magnificent town. A fixed population of thirty thousand souls (which is doubled during certain months of the year) dwells in superb houses, constructed round the palace built by George the Fourth; a sovereign who secluded himself from the public view, and who, in the latter years of his life, exhibited a dislike of the society of those whom he ought to have admitted to his intimacy. The nobility went to pass some days, and afterwards some weeks, in the town which was his favourite residence. Many persons of distinction built houses at Brighton; others rented them. At length it became fashionable to have a residence there. It soon, however, appeared that too many houses were built for the wants of the nobility. Another class of visitors which came afterwards occupied them; and in a few years this town became one of the richest and most frequented in England, its rapid progress being almost unaccountable. What would become of it, if that fashion, which has favoured its development, should take it into her head to bestow her capricious favours elsewhere, and create another city? or, if the population which comes there to dissipate its ennui, should discover that a country without trees, a sea without ships, a shore without a harbour, a town without public institutions, without public walks, without any other means of diversion than perpetual motion—in a word, a place created God knows why,—what, I say, if the population which comes thither, should at length discover that Brighton offers few resources for killing time, and that there are a host of other towns where the hours would hang less heavily? A complete desertion of Brighton might then be predicted. Its houses, unsustained by trade or industry, would fall into their ancient poverty; the momentary interruption of which would be evidenced by ruins of brick, and by the grass which would spring up among the stones in its deserted streets.

Margate and Ramsgate, by their position at the mouth of the Thames, as well as by their pleasant site, had, before Brighton arrived at its palmy state, drawn to themselves the crowd of rich who had nothing better to do. In these places, deserted for Brighton, the brilliant equipages of former days have not re-appeared. A few job-carrriages, drawn by one horse, and chairs on three wheels, drawn by a man down the sloping streets, are at the service of the city of London, who wish to ape people of consequence. The value of the houses at Margate and Ramsgate, as well as their trade, decreases or increases in the ratio of the number or the rarity of the birds of passage who come to visit them.

Other towns, such as Hastings, Eastbourne, Weymouth, have sought to invite the neighbouring gentry, and to tempt some illustrious whim or royal prodigality in imitating the older watering-places. In one part of this speculative attempt, these towns have at least succeeded. They contain a moving population, not so numerous, so titled, or so wealthy as Brighton, but as much tormented by idleness, and as little capable of creating amusement for themselves, as the inhabitants of the rival towns. You may there see families pacing silently up and down the same walks, without accosting, without even saluting other families quite as ennuyées as themselves. There also you may perceive ladies seated in the balconies with book in hand, while their husbands behind them raise above their heads their telescopes, with which they follow the vessels that pass within view of the shore. There also may be perceived nurses and governesses superintending the children committed to their care, but in the countenances of all and each is imprinted an air of lassitude and weariness which no one seeks to dissemble. Those gay réunions to be seen in France are not known in England. In France the very sound of a violin is sufficient, at places of summer resort, to get up a ball in the middle of a wood or the corner of a meadow; and the flagging interest is in turn excited by cards, by readings, by shows, scenes of plays, walks in picturesque sites, or by conversation, for which food is found in the most frivolous anecdote, as well as in the knottiest political discussion. At Dieppe, at Plombières, in the Alps, in the Pyrenees, people amuse themselves; at the English watering-places people bathe, eat and drink, walk and sleep, and when ennui becomes insufferably heavy, go elsewhere in the hope of dissipating their disorder on the road; but it nevertheless generally happens, that they carry their distemper home with them.

Some exceptions should undoubtedly be made to this unattractive but true picture of the customs of these occasional resorts of the richer classes of English. Some towns are pointed out by them, where it is fashionable to amuse oneself. Leamington, Cheltenham, Brighton, are among the number. But in escaping one excess, one falls into another. At one place, people know neither how to form parties nor to divert themselves; at another place all is noise, crowd, and bustle; pleasure becomes a business, and seizes upon every moment; but pleasures are solemn and exigeant. It is necessary to be always under a species of constraint to taste of them, and to allow oneself to be carried unresistingly away by the whole current, without a single exception. Unless one wishes to be read out of society, one must take a ride out on horseback or in a carriage, or walk—one must hunt and pic-nic in the morning, and in the evening accept one dinner engagement, and appear at two balls. Among so many amusements and enjoyments, it ends in the fashionable victim having only one desire left, and that is to see the end of the watering season.

COMFORT.

The English are very proud of that which they call comfort. This word serves to define their real, as well as their fancied enjoyments. It is employed also to extol that superiority of fortune to which they affect a great pretension as a contrast with other nations. The English have now recovered from the prejudice that they eat in France the legs of frogs, instead of rounds of beef, they have not yet persuaded themselves that the enjoyments and pleasures of life are known on the other side of the channel.

For strangers who do not take the trouble to observe, comfort is a conventional word, a sort of common-place, by means of which they analyze and recapitulate the sum of their enjoyments in England.

Among the wealthy English comfort means great luxury and an expensive establishment. In the middle classes, comfort means a heavy, well-stuffed arm-chair, in which the master of the house goes to sleep after dinner. You think I jest: no, verily! it is the exact truth. Independently of this chair, there is nothing which justifies the idea of general comfort which the word would seem to indicate. A dinner of boiled fish, and of plain vegetables destined to be mixed by way of sauce with all one eats—a piece of roast beef cut from the hardest and most tasteless part of the carcass; in place of napkins, a corner of the table-cloth; in lieu of dessert, nuts, chestnuts, raisins; chairs with rush bottoms, sometimes covered with a cushion, which the least movement causes to fall to the ground; immense four-post beds, with feather bed, beneath which is a pailasse so arranged as to produce the effect of an ill-jointed table—no clocks—and in each room a coal-fire, whose dust and smoke soil every thing—grooved window-shutters, windows with running Venetian blinds, and sometimes ill-draped calico curtains of a dark pattern: these are some of the English comforts, of which the natives of Albion are so boastful. But on the other hand it must be admitted, that great neatness and cleanliness are observable as well in the apartments as in the furniture. Amongst the lower classes the word comfort is never uttered.

SOCIAL RELATIONS OF THE MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL FAMILY.

The position which the princes of the blood royal occupy, is one of those customs of high society which most confounds the ideas of Frenchmen. You see there is a drawing-room unattended with any greater mark of respect than that which is bestowed on other persons of elevated rank. They are invited to dinners and soirées like private gentlemen. They mix, talk, and discuss with every individual in the room without exception. The dignity which should be inseparable from their rank, never interposes a barrier between them and any individual who is carried too far by the heat of argument. In these conflicts they are victorious or vanquished, as they are right or wrong, or have more or less talent of address. The politeness of their adversary spares them none of the chagrin of a defeat. There are great advantages, and as notable disadvantages, attached to this state of things. By this continual contact, the princes acquire a more profound knowledge of the wants, of the resources, of the manners of society, of the character and capacity of its members; but this knowledge is reciprocal, and exposes them to rigorous judgments; and it can only be obtained by sacrificing the prestige so necessarily attached to the situation and person of princes, but which, nevertheless, so suddenly disappears when they have to undergo the sort of ordeal to which the scions of the blood royal expose themselves in England. It is not only in the salons of the higher classes that the princes are to be met with. You meet them in clubs, to the customs of which they conform without the least exception. They are also to be seen at political meetings, where they accept the president's chair, or the less elevated functions accorded to them by the capricious suffrages of the members. At charitable meetings, or those having for object some question of public utility, they rival in philanthropy those who lay claim to that species of reputation, without any increase of esteem, affection, or popularity as their reward for such a departure from the convenances of royalty. Nor do they preserve that dignity which might, to a certain degree, be mingled with such habits. They live, think, and act, in a manner which does not permit them to sustain it. They embrace political opinions with the zeal of partizans, and, in place of directing and controlling the opinions they profess, they follow in the train, and are almost at the command of those leaders who are the Coryphees of the party, and are only distinguished by their extreme opinions.

The English princes display little ostentation in their habits of life, or in their domestic economy. Their general mode of paying a compliment to those they like, is to ask a dinner of them, a species of civility which causes no more expense to those who are the objects of it than if it proceeded from one of their equals; it is but a dish or two added to the family dinner. The political discussion which follows the repast partakes of its usual frankness and absence from restraint. The opinion of the prince is often unceremoniously contested, nor does his royal highness take offence at this freedom of debate. In the sporting season the male members of the royal family are accustomed to visit some of the principal nobility or rich gentry, whose houses become on such occasions the rendezvous of the nobility of the neighbourhood.

Does England or her princes reap any substantial benefit from the mode and manner of life which the latter have adopted? Assuredly not. If one were to judge by the reign of George the Fourth and by that of his successor, kings so brought up, have no greater stores of acquired knowledge, no better natural abilities, than sovereigns entrenched behind the etiquette of their courts or the dignity of their position. One is accustomed to see them perpetually, and they are therefore searchingly watched. People wish to find them on the throne such as they have observed them in the salons. They regard their faults more than their good qualities. They look more to the prejudices they have inspired than to the qualities they possess. They are, in a word, kings, such as other kings are, shorn however of that respect which they cannot obtain in an equal degree. It is well then that other people should not envy England the education or citizen habits of her princes. It is well that continental nations should preserve for those destined to govern them that severe and rational etiquette, which renders their princes impervious to an almost always unfavourable, because rarely kind and well-disposed, investigation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

In England, more than in any other country, the administration of justice must be understood to mean the interpretation, capricious in its form, and strange in its effects, of laws of every date, without any homogeneity of spirit, and at variance with the actual condition of society. Co-ordinate with tribunals of exception for facts, there exist other tribunals of the same kind for certain classes, and even for certain individuals, having each their code, their rules, their jurisprudence. Justice, which is in certain cases very expeditious, is very slow in others. Her manner of proceeding is prompt, her motions are quick enough when it is a question to imprison a man, to send him to Botany Bay, or to hang him outright. She moves heavily, slowly, she temporises when the subject is a disputed succession, or the possession of a single field. Can it be, that in the first case the haste is gratuitous on the part of the judge, while in the second each of his delays is an immense profit to the court, its officers, and the bar! There are many people who think so, and there appears ground enough for this opinion, when each cause supplies exorbitant fees not only to the magistrates before whom it is brought, but also to other magistrates who are never likely to hear of it. These fees are renewed in the event of the most insignificant motion being made to the court. It often happens that years elapse before judgment is given in the simplest case, and law suits are bequeathed from generation to generation, till an heir more favoured by fortune than his fellows finds himself rich enough to seek to revive the suit, or his opponent too poor to sustain it.

In this boasted land of freedom, individual liberty can hourly be compromised. Let a man go before a magistrate—let him declare on oath that another is indebted to him a certain sum; and, without being held to proof of the debt—without the exhibition of any document or acknowledgement—without the privilege for the adverse party to contest his right, the creditor obtains a warrant of arrest, which is executed by bailiffs undistinguished by any exterior badge of office. Behold the pretended debtor imprisoned, and obliged, if he wishes to obtain his liberty, to find two persons who are to give bail for his appearance, under penalty of paying the sum which he is supposed to owe. Failing to obtain bail, he is locked up in prison till it may suit the creditor (and in this there is generally a considerable delay) to justify his action or to drop the suit. There is certainly a remedy provided against the creditor, but he often takes precautions to escape the action which may be commenced against him by the adverse party. Often, too, looking to the enormity of the expense and the glorious uncertainty of the law, the latter hesitates to place his money in jeopardy, and puts up with the momentary sacrifice of his liberty.

A magistrate in England never hesitates to pronounce in a case of affiliation, when the woman declares, on oath, that a person whom she names is the father of her child. Moral proof; rebutting testimony; nothing is admitted in favour of the man in a case like this, and a sum, large in proportion to the defendant's worldly means, is awarded to the complainant.

It is not long since the killing of a hare or a pheasant was punished by the transportation of the poacher. The robbery of a few shillings renders the thief obnoxious to capital punishments, and one can hardly foresee what might be the consequences if a zealous protestant magistrate took it into his head to bring into operation the un repealed laws of Elizabeth against the catholics.

The dispensation of criminal and civil justice is confided to judges of assize. In criminal cases, the judge pronounces sentence on the verdict of the jury. A frightful list of condemnations appears on one and the same day. The effect of these is mitigated by the thought that the royal clemency will lighten the excessive severity of the sentences. But nevertheless, the number and severity of the penalties amply vindicate society, the only end which the English criminal law completely attains; for, if we take our data from the continually increasing proportion of crimes, it must be admitted that the English system does not attain the end of prevention.

MUNICIPAL ADMINISTRATION.

People in France are astonished that a country can subsist where private interests are so regulated as to concur towards the public interest without any interference on the part of government—where births, marriages, and deaths reach the knowledge of all, notwithstanding the almost total absence of registers of the état civil—where there is no risk of being murdered at every corner of a street in a country where there are no gens d'armes: it is a mystery to them how one can be found out in a land where there are no passports—how the safety of the state can be assured without the employment of spies—how there can be good roads without either a school of ponts et chaussées or engineers, and how the march of government should be progressive in a community where these and such like anomalies are so obviously discoverable. "Who and what," says the Frenchman, "supplies the place of functions and functionaries which appear indispensable in a well-organised society? Who and what supplies their place? In truth, nothing; or, if you will, peu de chose—reasonable beings, good sense, custom, imitation, instinct, patriotism, self-love, property applied to the public interests—these are the indefinable somethings which stand instead of the complex machinery of government boards and controlling committees, and which, varying in form in each locality, serve as the substitutes for the uniform codes of other countries, very sensible and very rational, no doubt, in their functional organisation, but, nevertheless, producing mischief the moment they are put into action.

Some explanation is necessary to support this theory: it would embarrass me much to give any other than that supplied by facts. The English ministry govern without attempting to meddle or control: it leaves this last care to county and municipal institutions. The English government is tenacious of that unity of ideas, that uniformity of plan and action, which, at first sight, should seem indispensable to good order and useful to society: the wheels of government are put in motion by an impulsion and force often resulting from different and opposite interests; nevertheless, every thing which contributes to the simultaneous movement of the machine, operates as though it had been the effect of a united power directed to a common object. A Frenchman would wonder, if he were told that in the English counties there is no special administrator, no corporate or official body charged with the direction of the general interests, having fixed functions and coercive means of carrying into execution those detailed measures which they deem necessary. There are sheriffs and lord-lieutenants in the English counties; but they have no really permanent authority: they are but a species of supervisors chosen from the superior class, who substitute their personal influence for the power which the law has not thought proper to give them.*

Below the sheriffs are the justices of the peace, chosen unlimitedly among the country gentlemen. At fixed epochs they assemble together at the quarter sessions to administer justice. In the interval between the sessions of the peace, those among the justices who happen to be assembled at the principal county town, regulate affairs of local interest, without any other guide than their knowledge of the suitability of such and such measures to the condition of the particular county in which they reside. The justices are listened to rather than obeyed by the parish officers—a body of men not appointed in a more regular manner, who, in virtue of their offices, have the conduct of parish affairs. Is a road to be made? The whole parish machinery is at work. The large landed proprietor points out the direction of this road, the surveyor traces its outline, the mason constructs the bridges, and every one, according to the nature of his employment, without the intervention of any fixed rules or administrative forms, contributes to accomplish the matter in hand. Commenced by one parish, the road is continued by another, and thus extends across the county, perhaps across the kingdom. Who first thought of this road?—Who superintended the making of it? Nobody and every body; the road, however, exists—you travel on it, and society is benefited.

Should the expense of making a road exceed the local means, the parish, by its organs—the county, by its representatives, demand the establishment of a toll. The Parliament accedes to the demand, after instituting an inquiry distinguished by the simplicity of forms as those of the justices in the first instance. A company, an individual speculator, the county itself, or the particular parish, undertakes, as the case may be, the completion of the work on being guaranteed the receipts of the toll. Thus is the road finished, and its constant repair assured.

All local interests are governed by a system as little complicated as the foregoing. The functionaries (if one can give this appellation to the individuals of whom I have been speaking, whose personal position, rather than election, places them at the head of parochial affairs) prosecute crimes and pursue the culpable: they enquire, they order the seizure of malefactors by any by-stander, if necessary. Nor does their power end here; for they can place these malefactors in the stocks, in order to prevent their escape, until the constables (a species of gardes champêtres in the country, and of sergeants in the town) arrive on the spot. These take them to the county prison; and at the quarter sessions, a jury composed of land owners, rich farmers, and manufacturers, under the presidency of a justice of the peace, tries for such offences as are within its jurisdiction. The cognizance of crimes is reserved for a court of a higher order.

However numerous the taxes, however varied in their forms, however exorbitant in their amount, they are laid on and paid with an equal simplicity. The king's taxes are voted by the house of commons; the parish taxes are agreed to in vestry; both are collected by a species of overseers or attendants, whose conduct is guaranteed by securities. The functions of these collectors are not indicated by any external badge, or by any particular costume.

The disinterestedness of the English administration of public matters is loudly extolled: in reality, the members of the local administration have no fixed salaries; but, on certain occasions, they obtain certain allowances, and are prodigal of them towards their inferior officers. The great vice of the English system is the want of that control necessary to restrain disorder and the laissez aller system. Despite the eulogiums bestowed on the economy of the English government, it is much more expensive than that of other countries. Such a state of things would appear, and would be in effect, the cause of disorganisation every where else. If it did not already exist in England, the idea of creating it would never suggest itself; it would break down, on the mere attempt to modify it. Yet it is the fashion in France to cite

*It is not to be expected that a foreigner should be very intimately acquainted with English law, which, according to Lord Coke, required the "viginti annorum lucubraciones:" it is, therefore, not wonderful that the Baron should here make a mistake. The English sheriff has much personal influence, no doubt, but more legal power.—Translator.

this system, and to invoke its application. In order to the success of it on our soil, there should be ten centuries of antecedents and of practice. It should have for its basis an influential and respected aristocracy rooted in popular affection and in the institutions of the country, as in the feudal times, and impart to the people that habit of confidence in the superior classes which disposes their minds to a complete submission. These conditions fulfilled, it might be possible to introduce the English system of administration into France; but without these necessary adjuncts, the French people should be content to abide by their own institutions, and profit by those gleams of wisdom and of calm which appear at long intervals, in order to strengthen institutions which have not yet taken deep root, whatever strength may be erroneously ascribed to them. Since the chief requisites are wanting in France for such a system of government—since the people wish neither aristocracies nor social distinctions—since they do not even admit of intellectual superiority, they stand in need of energetic laws, magistrates invested with extraordinary powers, gens d'armes, and spies, to control them. This is a sad but indispensable condition of existence; it is the consequence of the systems adopted; it is the counterpoise, however inadequate, of an independence which has exceeded all bounds.

NAVY AND ARMY.

THE NAVY.

The navy of Great Britain is composed of 380 ships, of which there are ninety-four of the line, manned by a force of 29,000 officers and sailors, and employés of various grades. This immense force is distributed in magnificent harbours, and sustained by arsenals, the extent and organisation of which correspond with the importance of the service.

The cost of the navy amounts to 4,500,000*l.* sterling, or 112,500,000 francs.

Though this sum may, at the first blush, appear large, yet it really is not so when the vast national uses of the English navy are taken into consideration. A hundred and fifty ships, spread over the surface of the seas, maintain the relations between the colonies and the parent state. A hundred and eighty ships are always in commission, ready for immediate service: the remainder are on the stocks.

A stranger, however, would be led to conclude that some vice of organisation or of administration exists in this department of the public service, were he to judge of the facility afforded for an immediate demonstration by the isolated fact of the admitted tardiness with which even a small armament could lately be brought to co-operate with a French fleet in interposing between Holland and Belgium.

England is now, without doubt, and probably will long continue to be, the first naval power in the world. Her institutions, her tastes, her affections, her very prejudices, are directed to the means of preserving a supremacy placed beyond all doubt by the war of the revolution. The possibility, nay, the very thought of resisting her naval power, has vanished since the period when the ill success of her enemies, and her own assured triumphs, have demonstrated the vainness of the hope. The destruction of 156 ships of the line, 382 frigates, 662 corvettes and other vessels, forming altogether a total of 2505 ships of war—fatally for her enemies, fortunately for herself—at test an undoubted superiority.

Since the proud period of her triumphs, the English navy has maintained its numerical superiority; whilst the navies of Holland and Spain, which, in 1792 and 1793, measured their strength with her, have made no efforts to repair these defeats, or to increase their maritime power. It is no doubt true that the governments of France, Russia, and the United States of America have bestowed on their respective navies much care and attention, which, in the long run, will certainly not be without their results; but, nevertheless, without a firm alliance, and a concurrence of circumstances difficult to combine, it would be doubtful if these states could struggle, with any hope of success, against the power of the English navy.

There are not wanting those who assert, that in the vast number of vessels of war which we have enumerated, there are many very old and nearly unfit for service; and an inspection of the dock-yards of Great Britain would lead to the belief that it would require not only time, but also a considerable outlay, to give to the English navy that real strength of which it now undoubtedly presents the semblance. It is very difficult for a foreigner to appraise the degree of confidence which is due to these disparaging assertions, for it is no easy matter to obtain access either to the docks or arsenals; and, in truth, every means are adopted to deprive the public of all correct data on which to form an opinion. Supposing, however, these assertions to be well founded, there can be no doubt that the navy would start into efficiency on the very first appearance of danger; the promptings of national pride, the suggestions of self-interest, would alike induce the British nation to submit to every sacrifice necessary to the maintenance and increase of her naval force. In this, common sense and national self-love would agree, and every sentiment and feeling of the public mind would contribute to sustain a power no less indispensable to the prosperity and safety of the country, than to the glory of England.

THE ARMY.

If we are to estimate the army of Great Britain by the glorious and very profitable part which she has played in late wars, it will fall short of a standard of such magnitude. The number of men at this moment in actual service does not exceed 117,000, distributed as follows:—

England and Scotland	30,000
Ireland	24,000
The colonies	37,000
East Indies	26,000

Grand total 117,000

England has in reality, therefore, a disposable force of only 54,000 men. The expense of the service amounts to 13,400,000*l.* sterling.

In this estimate, the military pensions and half-pay amount to nearly 5,000,000*l.* sterling; and the artillery to 450,000*l.* sterling.

If the opinion of certain economists were admitted, a very considerable diminution in this enormous expense could be effected by the correction of many abuses which have crept into the administration of the army. The reduction of the numerical force of the service; the suppression of certain sinecures connected with it; the consolidation of some offices with others; a complete revision of superannuation pensions; the revision also of the system of half-pay—these are the means proposed for adapting the war-budget to the exigencies of the service. Some of these reasonings are, no doubt, specious, and calculated to demonstrate that the military system of England is susceptible of much improvement under the head of economy.

Whether one considers their mode of manœuvring, their excellent discipline, or their general appearance, it must certainly be admitted that it would be difficult to find in any country a finer body of troops than the English. The corps of cavalry, the three regiments of infantry, and the division of artillery, which form together the royal guard, are in truth admirable. Nor would the army of the line suffer in the comparison with any other army in the world.

English military discipline does not reject the aid of the severest corporal punishment: a hundred, two hundred, nay, even three hundred lashes, are in England the constant punishment for faults which, in the French army, would be atoned for by one or two months' imprisonment.

With very few exceptions, the advancement of a private is limited to the grade of a non-commissioned officer. Commissions, from the rank of ensign to that of lieutenant-colonel, are purchasable. In the guards an ensign's commission costs 1200*l.*; a lieutenant's 1600*l.*; a lieutenant-colonel's 7000*l.* Commissions are cheaper in the regiments of the line. A little fortune is necessary in England to run the race of glory. Wo to the soldier in England who is without money, for, in the road of promotion, he must come to a dead halt. The length of his purse, and not of his services, is the limit of his career. However brilliant his achievements, his sword will do nothing for him unless sustained by his purse. This custom of purchasing every step of promotion is as old as the army itself. The system has hitherto worked marvellously; and what is stranger still, has given rise to few complaints. In this age of change, however, it is not difficult to foresee that some alteration must take place. The most remarkable effect of the system is the rendering the army almost exclusively accessible to rich officers, or, what is nearly the same, to those whose families are so. These officers bring to their profession gentlemanly manners and cultivated minds; no substitutes for bravery, certainly, but adding fresh lustre to it where it already exists.

The military school of Woolwich furnishes the necessary complement of officers to the artillery and engineers. In these corps promotion is on a different footing; it is not the effect of purchase.

In time of war, independently of the regular army, regiments of militia are raised for the defence of the country. In time of peace a force exists under the name of yeomanry: it is a corps of cavalry, and in the nature of its service; as well as in its composition, it bears much analogy to the national guard of France. The yeomanry force is commanded by the nobility and gentry in the different counties: they are mustered and exercised during about twelve days in every year. The appearance of this yeomanry troop is admirable. In a time of profound peace, no positive utility results from these musters, unless the giving of dinners and fêtes; and horse-races, are found to have their advantages.

Such is the actual condition of the English army; hardly sufficient to furnish troops for indispensable garrisons, it no longer possesses the matériel for those gigantic enterprises in which England has been at different epochs engaged, and more particularly at the period of the war of the first revolution. In a combination of circumstances similar to those of the first revolutionary war, it would be necessary to have recourse to similar means: to levée levies in England, subsidies to foreign troops, loans, and the augmentation of a debt sufficiently exorbitant already.

Those circumstances must indeed be of a grave and serious nature which could induce any minister to adopt such a course as this—a course which would with difficulty obtain the assent of public opinion. It is probable that the English government will for the future seek to sustain its influence over continental politics by negotiation, by pretensions of superiority carefully kept up, and derived from the custom of other nations (rather the result of habit than of reflection) to acknowledge that superiority. Perhaps, also, her diplomacy may avail itself of the threat of the ruin which the hostile intervention of a formidable navy would bring down on European commerce in general.

In the actual position of affairs, the military power of England is diminished by her situation in reference to Ireland, rendered disaffected and almost inimical by the exercise of a dominion which has taken the character and complexion of a conquest, and, by an exceptional system of administration, little calculated to unite together in bonds of affection two people still more divided in national character and religion than they are by the arm of the sea which separates them from each other. Without doubt, however, an accommodation will take place between the two countries: such an arrangement, desirable with reference to the real interests of both, is of the first necessity to England, as respects the recruiting of her army, and the distribution of her disposable force. Till this object shall have been accomplished, the English ministry will no doubt exhibit a commendable reserve, seeking to avoid any intervention in the affairs of the continent, and, least of all, that intervention which would be likely to terminate in open hostilities.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Public opinion may be considered one of the pillars of England. It cannot be better described than by likening it to a cement, which works its way every where, and connects together the heterogeneous materials, out of which has arisen, none can say how or when, the stupendous and stately edifice of the British constitution. In some of its uniformity receives a character of consistency from public opinion, which masks its defects and prevents it from falling. The whole fabric appears to have sprung from the workings of one mind, though all its component parts result from remote circumstances—from the spirit of party—the caprice of the governing power—the reflecting, and occasionally, all-powerful will of the governed.

The English people think themselves free, because, though subject to a shapeless mass of tyrannical and absurd laws, they see the king pass by them and are not obliged to make him a reverence. They think themselves well governed, because parliament has the power to throw out the ministry, when the interests of the stronger party require it. They do not complain of the enormity of the taxes, because they are voted by the house of commons, whose influential members contrive to take much more from the national treasury than they contribute to it. They resign themselves without a murmur, nay, without thought, to all the vexations and inconveniences of an indirect taxation (of which the greater part of the revenue is composed), because habit has long familiarised them with the discomfort of this harassing mode of proceeding. They think themselves rich, because they buy and sell dearly. They consider the public wealth proof against every shock, because it rests upon a system of credit, the inconceivable abuse of which has not caused it to give way. They think the nation powerful, because there was a time when, multiplying loans without troubling themselves about the means of reimbursement, the English government bought the blood of continental nations, created armies, opposed people to people, and by these means exercised supreme control over European politics. They fancy, with wonted pride, that British supremacy must hold perpetual sway, because their ambassadors maintain in certain courts the lofty language which they affected thirty years ago; and because garrisons, factories, military and commercial settlements, are established at places the immense distance of which from each other is in some sort concealed by the ubiquitous power of the English fleets. In a word, the most inconceivable illusion converts into a species of national pride that which should be a subject of painful reflection and real disquietude.

Who can tell what would happen, if, for example, the people, seriously intent upon examining their position, should say to each other, "Where is our so much vaunted constitution? In Magna Charta? In that compact wrested by the violence of some ignorant feudal lords of the middle age from the hands of John Lackland? Public opinion, and a more advanced civilisation, now justly appreciates that charter. Such a constitution could only suit us if we fell back to the barbarism of the thirteenth century. Does our constitution exist in the Act of Settlement signed by William III. in 1688? The spirit of that act is hardly respected. The act of settlement is no longer fitted for us. Does it exist, then, in the multiplicity of laws, acts, and regulations,—that shapeless code which no man has had the courage to wade through? Who could there find the spirit of our constitution? who could have the patience or the power to adapt or apply them to a state of society so unlike that of the period when those laws were framed, which, being the offspring of an immediate necessity, attest the movement and progressive advances of society? There is, then, no constitution. I must have one; but to make it, I must proceed to work my own way. I shall lay hold of the elements of society, and scatter them about at random. In adjusting themselves, these elements shall remain as chance shall have placed them. From their very confusion a new order shall arise. This first germ of order, all-imperfect though it be, will bring about other combinations, of which I know as little as I can foresee them, but which will assuredly be different from what at present exists. In a word, I shall accomplish a revolution; I cannot lose by the change, for I have nothing that I can call my own, either in fixed property or in imaginary rights. Shall I have less liberty, according to my meaning of the word? That were difficult indeed. Without doubt the right of administering justice shall no longer belong exclusively to those who, possessing every thing, carry to the most revolting excess the care of self-preservation; I shall no longer be sent to Australia, be exposed to the fury of the savages of its deserts, condemned to endless and unpaid labour, in an unwholesome country, for having sinned some hares, which nearly ruined my crop, in a field for which I paid too much rent. These stocks—prisons without even the advantage of walls—in which my limbs are sure to be confined on the first fault that I commit, shall for ever disappear from those public roads, where, in utter defiance of common prudence, they expose me to shame and insults. Directly or indirectly, immediately, or by delegates of my own choosing, I shall participate in the functions of legislation. I shall reform abuses, or, if some should still arise, I know how to turn them to my profit. The taxes shall not be collected without my deducting, by some means or other, the portion which I shall have to contribute to them. I shall not suffer the amount of taxation to enter into the price of any article that I consume. The land is there to defray the taxes, unless by the workings of the revolution it shall have passed into other hands than those which have too long possessed it. Meanwhile, no more taxes on beer, leather, candles, or tobacco,—on the pavement we tread, on the air we breathe. As to those taxes levied upon luxuries, I shall support them until I become rich myself. As to the finances, I shall know quite as much as the statesmen of the present day. I shall follow their example; my finances shall be the money of others; my strength shall be my credit and my mint. Politics, which a stony diplomacy has hitherto confined to the cabinet of kings, shall be remoulded in the propagation of my principles,—in an appeal to the popular passions of every country. Come what may, my business is to destroy every existing institution, and subvert every part of our social organisation. I shall take counsel from the state of things which may spring out of the change. Forward!"

The imaginary case which I have just laid down may not be far removed from a fatal reality. Up to the present time, discontent has been, in a measure, isolated, and confined to individuals: it has been as devoid of danger as of inconvenience. But now, a revolutionary spirit has infused that discontent into all classes, and, at no distant period, we shall witness its formidable progress. For a long time, the word reform had been familiarised to the people's ears. Innovators prepared them to desire it as a want which brooked no delay, and which was equally felt by those who clamoured for it, and those whose interests it would affect. This latter class has not seen that the sacrifices they would be called upon to make, far from putting off the evil day, has only rendered more inevitable the death-struggle which must now be fought between indigence and property. Violence will now wrest that which a tardy prudence would recommend to withhold. The battle will not be long contested, if the weaker party are the first to aid in the overthrow of institutions which have hitherto protected them.

Public opinion, it will be said, is too enlightened to pass beyond the limits prescribed by wisdom. This sentiment, an instinct without proper direction among other nations, is a sixth faculty among the English; with them all error is impossible. See the wonders which have sprung from it; examine the ascendancy it exercises over men and customs, from the king to the sailor, from the regulation of the chancellor's budget, to the expenditure of the poor's rates in the smallest parish.

I am not, I must own, completely convinced of the wonderful results that are to flow from the workings of public opinion. I see certain matters of detail proceeding with regularity—without violence, without effort, without any interference on the part of the government, which, in other countries, introduces itself every where with the view of directing or fettering every thing. I agree that England is the country where each man knows his own business best. Thus the king folds his arms across and looks on, always assuming that he has a taste for observation; for, in general, an English king only attends to the affairs of government by way of gratifying his curiosity. The ministers govern; the parliament overturns them at its pleasure, but by the most legal process in the world; the people pay, but now and then arrogate to themselves the right to knock down the tax-collectors and the constables who protect them. But, as they are tenacious of forms, and as one or two pounds of lead at the end of the constable's staff in no degree alters its form, the people do not take offence at the blows levelled at their heads. The awards of the lord mayor are submitted to with as much respect by the hackney-coachmen, amerced in a smart fine, as are the judgments of the lord chancellor by the first noblemen in the kingdom. Every artisan reads the newspaper at breakfast, but works not the less on that account. All this is wonderful, no doubt; but are these wonders the effect of public opinion? Are they not to be ascribed to a kind of subordination to authority, converted not only into custom, but into law? and is there a law more respected or more binding than this very habit? On the other hand, does not private interest (artfully introduced into every thing in England) exercise also a great influence over this so much admired progress of public opinion; for, destroy the basis of it, compel private interest, as will eventually be the case, to modify its combinations, which it is, perhaps, at no pains to calculate, but receives as it finds them, and we shall see what remains of that public opinion which inspires so much confidence.

Another cause will, in season, be superadded to that which I have just mentioned, and cannot fail to unnerve that public opinion, so long the surest conservative guarantee, as it has been the greatest glory of Great Britain. Isolated by her insular position, England was still more so by the pride and austerity of her national character. A certain something (I hardly know what to call it) resembling unsociability of character, had saved her from that friction which had worn out the more prominent features of other nations. England had felt a pride in preserving her ideas, her forms, her prejudices, wholly regardless of what militated against them. Thus protected, public opinion maintained its force and its influence. But this barrier is now broken down. The English, who heretofore only travelled in individual instances, now travel in masses. They lay aside the inconvenient burden of that haughtiness which preserved around them a truly British atmosphere, and made them breathe a British air wherever they bent their steps. Their first endeavour, when they land on a foreign soil, is to efface all impression of their distinctive nationality. This, which at first is only with them a sort of convenient arrangement, becomes at length a settled habit, which they adhere to themselves, and on their return communicate to others. The travelled English do not fail to institute a comparison between what they have seen abroad, and what they find established at home, and this comparison does not always redound to the advantage of their country. True, they have not lost their love of country; but it is not that fervid and exclusive love which obtained formerly. The need of those luxuries which they have seen elsewhere manifests itself, and the contagion of foreign customs is now making a daily inroad in England: how would it be if with this fusion of manners a fusion of political interests mingled? How would it be if the English government relaxed that rigidity—that unmanageable, unbending egotism, which has hitherto distinguished its principles from those of the governments of other countries? In such a combination of circumstances, public opinion would consign to the dictionary of by-gone usages certain exploded national customs and manners, laid aside like obsolete words, only applied to express ideas which have ceased to exist.

After having thus examined what is really useful and effective in public opinion in England, it will be a matter of some interest now to consider the influence which this opinion exercises on individual minds, the modifications it imprints, the force it communicates to them. The observations I have been making lead us to a comparison between a country where public opinion is so powerful, so active, so profoundly felt among all classes, and a country in which public opinion is only to be found in the intemperate discourses of the orators of the dominant party. It had long been the fashion on the continent to attach that elevation and general superiority to the English mind and character which superseded the necessity of closer enquiry. Ideas such as these were adopted on trust, and hence it has arisen that men the most disposed to question the basis on which this opinion rested, have not found in their minds the power of doubting on a question on which there existed a conventional accord. So long as France and England were only observers of each other in the distance, so long as the relations only of nation to nation subsisted between them, numerous general facts presented themselves to accredit the idea of the superiority of one people over the other. But these nations have since had constant intercourse together; they have approximated more closely. Individuals of both countries have come into contact; they have had the opportunity of studying and appreciating each other, and opinion has changed. Such, at least, are the observations which a prolonged sojourn in England, and an intimate intercourse with the most distinguished classes of society have enabled me to make, and which are at variance with what had hitherto been taken for granted.

AN ELECTION.

It is indeed an imposing spectacle to behold a people exercising their share in the sovereignty, choosing their delegates, and pointing out in their assemblies, and by their acclamations, and their suffrages, the men whom they think worthy to be selected for the defence of their rights and the maintenance of their liberties. Yes, it is indeed an imposing spectacle; but if you only seek to preserve an illusion which seduces you, if you fear to abate any portion of the enthusiasm which you feel for representative governments in general, and for the English government in particular, beware of attending at any of the English elections. Remain at home during their progress, otherwise those opinions to which you would have yielded, without seeking to base them on any solid foundation, will entirely disappear.

One fine morning we learn that it has suited the ministers to make the king, by his will and pleasure, dissolve the parliament. Behold the people fancying themselves something; ambitious hopes excited or alarmed, and ambitious men flying in all directions, London a desert, and the provinces visited by their richest inhabitants. Behold aristocratic haughtiness humbling itself before plebeian pride. Neither men nor opinions are now in their proper places. The social scale is reversed, and all its established rules and conventional gradations participate in this movement. Hauteur, disdain, refusals, all are hurled back from him who had been the object of them upon the original dispenser. He who was heretofore lowest is now highest. He who was wont to command is now obliged to supplicate. Hence, a train of justifications, of offers, of services, and of pledges from the candidate. It is pleasant to see a noble lord ungloving his hand to place it in the coarse and filthy fist of his butcher or his tenant; promising to the one the continuance of his custom, to the other the renewal of his lease, enquiring into the health and welfare of their families, and mingling these enquiries with the canvass of a vote and a protestation of attachment to the people, pretty much in the following fashion:—"The honourable canvasser admits that he caused to be transported to Botany Bay a poacher who had snared some of his pheasants. He laments the fate of the poor devil—arraigns the severity of the laws, and damns all game. He will kill all his hares, and solicit the pardon of the poacher, who has had after all but a pleasant and entertaining trip to New South Wales, and will be the better enabled to value a system of reform which will effectually save him from the risk of a second trip. He laments the lot of the farmer who has to yield him the tithe of his crops. He will be the first, as he is the most anxious, to put an end to the system of tithes, which, though it has added, and continues to add, to his fortune, is nevertheless a real heart-sore to him. In seeking to protect machinery, which abridges human labour, he will not be neglectful of modes of employment for the indigent classes. He will vote for the abolition of all taxes, without at all impairing the regularity of the public service. There shall be perfect liberty to do, or say, or write what people list, and a consequent increase of order and tranquillity. It shall be the golden age, if he is returned to parliament, and England shall become another El Dorado!

The advent, however, of this era of prosperity and universal contentment must depend on the success of the pretensions of him who can alone procure so many felicities, who will sacrifice for the public good his simple and modest tastes, his retired habits, his aversion to a life of display and agitation, his domestic happiness, and his private fortune.

Some simpletons are taken with these fine speeches; they promise their votes. Others more circumspect require theirs to be bought, and stipulate for the immediate fulfilment of the promises personally made to them. As to those promises which are only general, they leave them to the good faith of the candidate. There are some who refuse him their votes because they do not hold his opinions, and expect more from his rival, or have already secured better conditions from the latter.

Every candidate is obliged to canvass; in other words, to make a personal journey through town and country, stopping at the house of each elector, even of those whom he knows to be most opposed to him, and whose votes he despairs of obtaining on any condition. He must shake hands with every one, listen to all observations, hear the directions and the sharp reproaches sometimes addressed to him, promise all that he is asked, thus humbling himself before popular arrogance, and compromising the dignity of the rank to which he aspires. The efforts of the candidate, no matter how great his ardour and activity, cannot extend to all those whom it is important to gain over. He selects among a certain class of men addicted to this peculiar pursuit, an election agent, who, on being paid a certain sum, or after entering into a regular stipulation, as between attorney and client, engages to procure him votes. He also provides himself with a barrister, who for a few hundred pounds contests, whether right or wrong, the validity of his opponent's votes, and defends on the same principle the votes given in favour of his client. Letters, journeys, dinners, nothing is neglected to influence a voter. Accounts are opened with all persons licensed to keep horses; with all innkeepers, so that the electors may be defrayed their travelling expenses; and they on their parts certainly avail themselves largely of this privilege. The roads are covered with carriages and four containing voters, who on other occasions travel on the outside of the common stage; refreshments await the contented electors at each relay, and this happy life lasts till they return home.

In the midst of these preliminaries, nothing is neglected to create a cloud of opinion favourable to the candidate. The newspapers in his interest register his promises, vaunt his talents, quote fragments of his speeches; should he not have made speeches, they are manufactured for him on these occasions; they pour forth their eulogies on generations of his ancestors which have long passed away. You see in the streets of London men carrying before and behind them, in order to attract notice, printed bills in large letters announcing the name of the candidate, and the course of conduct he pledges himself to pursue. When the candidate is unknown to fame, the public is informed of what he will say and do. Should his political character be well known, the object he will have in view is indicated by a phrase or a word; an exclamation of "N— for ever!" answering to our "Vive N—!" is attached to his name. The handbills and the ribands which adorn these placards are of the colour adopted by the candidate; his partisans decorate themselves with similar ribands, and the horses and carriages are decked out in like manner.

On the appointed day both parties appear on the hustings. These are erected in a public square, for the accommodation of the candidates, who arrive on horseback or in carriages, each party preceded by musicians, and followed by their friends and that portion of the mob which has declared for them. Flags bearing appropriate mottoes rally this motley group, which advances amidst the mingled applause and hisses of the spectators.

Each person having taken his place, the sheriff or returning officer appointed to preside at the election, and who is neither distinguished by a particular costume, nor even a seat (for he is usually standing like the assistants,) opens the proceedings, and swears the candidates on the gospels that they have not resorted to unlawful means, or to any species of bribing.* This oath taken under the eyes of the populace, who know all that has been going on beforehand, should not seem calculated to inspire them with much confidence in the respect which the sworn party will entertain for his solemn engagements. This ceremony being gone through, a friend of each of the candidates proposes him in a short but impassioned speech. Another friend seconds the proposal. The candidate himself now appears, and expatiates with self-satisfaction on the praises which have been given him. His discourse to be effective, should be prolix, full of declamatory matter, and pronounced with every violence of gesture and emphasis.

This formality is renewed for each candidate. Should there be no opposition—should the election be uncontested, the returning officer informs the electors that he will proceed immediately to the nomination,† and he invites the electors to hold up their hands in token of assent. If the number of raised hands predominates, the new member is proclaimed and the assembly dissolved.

This latter occurrence is rare, and only takes place in towns where the well known current of opinion, and the menacing attitude of a turbulent population, lead to apprehend acts of violence, for which no chance of success could compensate. Such are the elections of Westminster, Southwark, and of the great manufacturing towns generally. Well disposed people, even among the friends of the candidates, do not take part in these turbulent assemblies, which are composed of the lowest class of electors, and of a populace always ready to swell their numbers, as affording a hope of disturbances and a pretext for them.

When there is a contested election, the sheriff proceeds to take a poll. Each elector mounts on the hustings and inscribes, or causes to be inscribed, his name in the poll book of the candidate he wishes to be returned. A contested election may last fourteen days.‡ So long a period is devoted by the candidates to the muster of their friends, and of individuals whose votes are promised to them. Couriers are sent from one extremity of England to another; agents run about in all quarters, and electors travel, all at the expense of the candidate, who is not deterred by the enormity of the cost from the pursuit of his enterprise. Each party unites his means of defence and attack, manœuvres with dexterity, and exhibits considerable talent in wielding the resources at command. All means are lawful for the attainment of the end in view. Scandal, calumny, reproaches and menaces, are unsparingly used. The hustings are the tribunals from whence proceed the most vehement speeches, the grossest insults. Often matters do not end here, and missiles are resorted to. Oranges, apples, potatoes, are flung at the heads of antagonist parties. When these are exhausted, they next come to blows. The strongest party remaining in possession of the field of battle, excludes the vanquished, puts an end to the election, and completes the sport by attacking the houses of the chiefs of the opposite party. During this expedition, the successful candidates are placed in chairs adorned with party coloured ribands, and carried in triumph through the town by a dozen of the stoutest and least drunken of their supporters. The procession halts occasionally, the victorious candidate makes a speech, they again move on, and meet at an election dinner, which closes with songs in favour of the new member, toasts, harangues, and general drunkenness.

The ceremony of chairing is that which flatters most the vanity of an Englishman. Those who have been the heroes on such occasions, speak of the matter with great self-satisfaction, and let no opportunity escape of relating the most minute details. It might be concluded that a complete state of social disorganisation would be the result of all this. It is quite otherwise, and the reason may be gathered in the predominance of the aristocratic principle in the midst of this democratic effervescence. These elections are not made by the people, but sold by them to the better classes of society, who buy them so dearly that they can only fall to the lot of those whose rank gives them a deeper interest in maintaining order and upholding the institutions of the country. Strip the English elections of their venality, and you will have popular returns and pure democracy. The thirst of wealthy people for this kind of parliamentary distinction, which, a compensation for their ruin, affords them only the barren honour of having a well stuffed seat in the house, on which they may stretch themselves to sleep every night, is indeed extraordinary. It cannot be that they hope to obtain lucrative office, for this in general is reserved to merit; and it is difficult to believe that the privilege of making two or three speeches during the session, which are lost amidst the noise of conversations, can afford any satisfaction to a sensible mind.

That which is elsewhere called consideration, possesses little weight in such a country as England.

Thanks to the influence exercised over the elections by men remarkable by their fortune and their social position, a powerful and truly patriotic aristocracy, which has taken deep root in the soil, maintains its influence, and affords support to the government of the country. The expenses incurred at elections bring in their train other advantages: they prevent accumulation, and fix a limit to wealth, which under other circumstances, might become boundless. Thanks to the combination of these two principles, however proved they may be by liberal theories, the national representation of England is based on the superiority of rank and fortune.

It would be difficult to give the people of France an adequate idea of the enormous expenses of certain of the English elections; there are some among them which cost 50,000, 80,000, or even 100,000*l.* sterling, (1,200,000*fr.* to 2,400,000*fr.*) When these expenses are not defrayed by the family or friends of the candidate, heavy debts, and sometimes complete ruin, are the deplorable consequences: the embarrassed candidate then resigns himself to the fate of living penuriously in some obscure corner of the continent, and of travelling all his life on the tops of diligences. This is the retribution for the expensive pleasure of having posted down to the hustings some few hundreds of electors whose votes proved of no use to him. The body politic, however, is here the gainer; it preserves its form and strength—it prospers, and that is the chief consideration.

Wo to England the day when her electors become too honest to sell themselves, and her senators too wise to buy her voters—a revolution will then be near at hand; and the elements which England contains within her bosom, and which a disorganising faction rears for the terrible work, are not less formidable than those which for forty years have agitated France.

DINNER AT * COLLEGE.

It was an election day, but it was a gentlemanly election, at which no votes, or at least very few, were sold; at which neither insults nor blows were exchanged between the parties; at which no windows were broken; when the proceeding was limited to insignificant cabals, or a calculation of votes, the number of which was known beforehand. The fellows* entertained the electors who had been of the college. Though I was a stranger, thanks to the polite efforts of two of my friends, one a Whig the other a Tory, I found myself seated between them at dinner, on which occasion I had the opportunity of exercising that complaisance which I have imposed on myself as a law in all that relates to the political interests of Great Britain.

* The fellows are a species of secular canons, who receive, as the reward of studies more or less successful, allowances of 400*l.* 600*l.* and even 1000*l.* a year, from the surplus of the revenues of the college to which they belong, without any other conditions than to remain bachelors, after seven years to take orders, and to exercise hospitality during their noviciate.—Note of the Author.

There are law and travelling fellows of both Universities, who are laymen.—Note of the Translator.

We were received in an immense room, of very pure Gothic architecture, decorated with the portraits of illustrious men who had been educated within these walls. The windows, adorned with beautiful stained glass, are for the most part due to the liberality of the pupils of the college. The tables retain the forms of those common in the refectories of Catholic monasteries. They are of sufficient length to give ample space to four hundred guests. We were about three hundred. The dinner was quite à l'Anglaise, that is to say, soups strongly peppered, enormous joints of meat, magnificent dishes of fish, and all varieties of puddings. The whole was washed down with Spanish, Portuguese, and French wines, seasoned by political conversation.

"The dinner is good, but it is not cheerful," said my left hand neighbour, who belonged to the losing party; "every one laments the results of the election."

"It appears to me," said I, "that the successful and numerous majority have reason enough to rejoice."

"Your friend makes wry faces," said my right hand neighbour, with a smile. "To the health of our king and of our members—long live the old constitution and good fellowship!" so saying, he emptied his glass, and, as each man followed his example, the company were already very animated when they prepared to pass into the room specially devoted to drinking. In this apartment decanters and glasses, laid out on mahogany tables, awaited the guests; but, as these immense supplies did not suffice for stomachs of such marvellous capacity, and as the occasion was one of those rare occurrences which revived in all their integrity the force of old English customs, the sideboards were still farther covered with bottles, while the servants, cork-screws in hand, rivalled the activity of the bibbers who put their services in requisition. The company soon began to speak and drink together. Toasts and discussions followed. At length heads began to wax warm, brains became disturbed, and limbs refused to do their office, to such a point as to render the aid of waiters necessary for some of the guests, who were removed in this condition to their inns, and afterward to their beds, by this convenient aid. On such occasions as these, innkeepers in England never fail to bestow on their guests every mark of attention and interest.

A PUBLIC MEETING.

The most important occurrence in the minds of the English people, next to an election, is a public meeting. Here they deliberate on the laws, blame the acts of the ministers, authoritatively pronounce an opinion upon every thing, and return home, convinced that they have done the finest things in the world. At a public meeting, John Bull thinks his will supreme; because his thoughts respond to the words of the orator, he fancies the inspiration of the latter comes from himself, his brother shopkeepers, and the rabble. Therefore it is that the mob affect an air of importance, while their orators, dressed in black, with white gloves, proceed in pairs with a grave step through the crowds of the lowest classes, (barely covered by their filthy rags,) who follow them with vociferations to the place of meeting. The object of this meeting is announced some days before by placards printed in large letters, which cover the walls, or are carried on the tops of poles through the streets.

The meeting generally takes place in the open air. Mounted on a scaffolding erected in the most conspicuous place, or on a wagon procured for the occasion, stand forth the principal performers who intend to speak. From such a locality, in a style quite worthy of the auditory, they submit their propositions, supporting them by the most extravagant speeches, the falsest assertions, and all manner of abusive language. "Do you know what reform is?" said one of those furious talkers; "if you do not, I will tell you. It is bread for the poor at a penny a pound, beer at two pence a pot, meat at four pence, plenty of work, double wages, warm clothing, shoes and stockings, and comfortable habitations. We shall have no more customs and excise, no more taxes, no more policemen. (Thunders of applause.) No, we shall have no more of these idle vagabonds, dressed up in blue, who knock you down with their loaded staves on the first show of resistance; every one henceforth will be rich, happy, free. All these advantages had been ours long ago if the oligarchy, the aristocracy, the house of peers, the boroughmongers, the clergy, and, above all, the bishops, had not opposed themselves to the accomplishment of the wishes of our friends—of those friends who know and defend our interests." The remainder of this speech, which lasted two hours, (English orators are very prolix,) was of this complexion. Other tribunes of the people succeeded, repeated the same phrases, coupling their promises with threats and abusive language, until the period arrived for the reading of a petition, written beforehand, containing an expression of the wants and wishes of the meeting. The proceeding terminated with its unanimous adoption.

The speakers at English popular meetings are not applauded for their matter or their argument, (either of which, by the by, few of their auditory would understand,) but for their intemperate declamation. They swing about from side to side, stamp their feet and clench their fists; their eyes appear ready to start from the sockets, their mouths foam,—they have, in a word, the air of people possessed. The enthusiasm of the crowd is then at its height; cries of "Hear, hear!" proceed from all sides; the flags are lowered, and the petition is signed on tables, on hogsheds, on knees, on bent backs, which serve as writing-desks. In order to accelerate this operation, sheets of paper are distributed, and when they are covered with signatures, they are joined together and united to the petition. Of the ten, twenty, or thirty thousand individuals who contributed to swell the meeting, two or three hundred, at most, had an interest in the objects of the petition, or the faculties necessary to the comprehension of it, or the right to deliberate at all, for in general the respectable classes do not appear at these meetings. The rest of the assembly could not have heard the orators, whose voices, however powerful they may be on ordinary occasions, are drowned by the noise, which repels the sounds back on the speaker, and prevents those nearest to him from collecting their purport.

This picture is not overcharged; public meetings are composed of the lowest and the most inflammable classes least susceptible of being guided by reason, or of appreciating a measure in its relative adjuncts of good and evil. They are, in general, subservient to the will of a turbulent, unquiet, and dangerous party, and are wielded to maintain the popularity of demagogues. Nevertheless, this manner of consulting the opinions of the people finds apologists among well-intentioned, enlightened, and, in other respects, sensible men. These men would blush to figure in the crowd of auditors, and would be still more ashamed to appear on the hustings by the side of fire-brands who seek to inflame the popular passions; but they proclaim the wisdom of deliberations proceeding from a sink in which the mire and mud of the nation ferment together. This is one of the numerous errors—one of the many follies of otherwise sensible people.

A PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE.

I longed to be present at a parliamentary debate, and to have an opportunity of establishing a comparison between the manner in which our neighbours (who are represented as our masters in matters of representative government) manage their affairs, and the form which we give to our parliamentary debates. A small ticket, without a signature,* but on which a member of the house declared that he was authorised by the speaker to introduce me, procured my admission to the benches raised in amphitheatre on either side of the entrance under the gallery.

The house is of an oblong form. The speaker's chair stands in front of the principal door. Its abrupt projection allows a space sufficient for several benches behind it. Before the chair is a table covered with books, registers, boxes for papers, and an enormous gilt mace. Three clerks in bar gowns and wigs are seated at the table with their backs to the speaker.

The latter enveloped in a species of gown, (his countenance muffled in a gray wig, extending under his chin and descending below his breast,) converses almost without interruption with members who approach, and appear to address him with much deference. Occasionally, when the noise of conversation is too audibly heard, he cries out with a loud voice, "Order, order," after which he appears to relapse into his habitual inattention.

The members are seated on cushions of black leather, which line every side of a room badly lighted by chandeliers filled with wax candles. The brown oak, with which the house is panelled, contributes to render the effect more sombre. The vacant benches serve as beds to such members as spread themselves out to sleep. A projecting gallery, with a cornice supported by iron pillars, is raised on either side over the floor, and in crowded houses supplies, in some sort, the insufficient space of the body of the house. It is here* that the public (without the speaker's order) are admitted for half a crown a head, together with the newspaper reporters.

On comparing the extent of the house with the number of its members, the question naturally arises how they can find room, to the number of six hundred and forty-six, within so small a space.

The members are dressed in the most careless fashion, in frock coats, in boots, with their hats on, or with an umbrella under the arm. They listen to few of the speeches. They but repeat the cry of "Hear, hear," with intonations which give to the words, alternately, a meaning of approbation or disapprobation, as they perceive their friends, who have heard the speaker, cheering ironically or in earnest. They talk, move about, cross the room, without attention to him who speaks, or to those who listen. It is the custom not to leave the house without turning towards the speaker, and bowing to him with becoming respect.

Strangers do not fail to enquire the names of the most prominent members. It is a consequence of the indefinable inclination which one feels to give credit to those who offer resistance to power, as though such resistance always had its principle in honourable sentiments, that one generally begins by asking for the opposition members. Mr. O'C— is pointed out, an individual whom one would not easily discover under his brown wig, his portly figure, and calm air; any more than Mr. H—, who sits beside him, with a respectable carriage and that grave physiognomy which would become a gentleman.

After being made acquainted with the countenances of the most renowned members of each party, curiosity is directed towards the ministers, who are neither distinguished by any peculiarity of costume, nor by any other seats than those which usage has assigned to them on the right of the speaker, and near the table. Their supporters are grouped behind them.

After having seen the interior of the house of commons, one easily accounts for there being, if not so many distinguished orators, at least so many speakers who express their ideas with tolerable facility. The cause is partly owing to the kindness and indulgence of the house, and partly to its inattention. These double causes render the speakers more careless in the choice of their expressions, and indifferent to the effect they produce. The worst that can happen to them is, not to be listened to. In consequence of this, they speak in the commencement of their career with great boldness, and presently custom supplies them with the oratorical forms and with self-confidence; finally they acquire talents and a reputation. Should it turn out otherwise, they remain in their mediocrity; but they can always sustain a discussion, and, in contending with their opponents, they are no longer under the restraint of a timidity which would paralyse their intellectual energy.

English orators speak extempore, many of them from notes; but these should seldom be consulted, if they wish to avoid unceremonious interruptions. They are not very graceful in their declamation; the greater part of them speak leaning on their umbrellas,† with their hats in their hands, or playing with a whip or a cane. Some, however, are distinguished by a noble and animated gesture. Each person speaks without quitting his place. It is only when a member proposes to take an active part in the discussion that he places himself on the lower benches, near the speaker, to whom the members are always supposed to address themselves.

In England, as well as in France, the laws would lose much of their imposing character, if one were to consider all the trivial and minute circumstances that mingle in their composition. In France, the members of the chamber have the air of men possessed: the place where they meet is in the form of a theatre, and from the cries that one hears on all sides, one would think they were about to cut each other's throats. In England, the smoky chamber called the house of commons is in perfect harmony with the slovenly dress and still more slovenly manners of members sent there by the strangest, the most irrational, and, according to report, the most venal elections. In the one country, people profess dangerous principles and subversive doctrines, giving expression to them in eloquent phrases, and without the least consideration of the consequences; in the other, business is transacted with good sense and simplicity. No impediments of self-love are suffered to mingle with considerations of public duty. On which side of the strait is the public weal best understood? I hesitate not to pronounce, and facts justify my opinion, in favour of the English system.

CLUBS.

Every national mania, every endemic taste is represented by a club. Thus there is the Travellers' Club, where you can only be admitted on proving that you are a foreigner, or that you have travelled five hundred miles on the continent; the Beef-steak Club, where you only partake of the dish giving its name to the club; the Navy Club, and the Military, where sailors and soldiers are alone admitted; the Athenæum Club, consecrated to scientific people; the Catch Club,* which takes its name from certain national airs sung by several voices, without accompaniment, during dinner. At Edinburgh there is the Six Feet Club, to be a member of which it is an essential condition that you be six feet high, (about five feet six inches of France;) then there is the Jockey Club, and the Greyhound Club, for the lovers of horses and hounds, and a number of establishments of a similar kind.

*The following account furnishes some interesting details relative to the habits and rules of the Catch Club.

Admitted to one of the meetings of this club, I remarked, in the middle of the room, a tall man of slender figure, whose tone and air indicated a habit of superiority. He was discussing, in a very animated manner, the relative merits of two composers, with a fat man with a hollow voice and common-place manners: I learned that the first was the Duke of —, and that the other sang the counter-tenor parts at Covent Garden Theatre. The dinner being announced, the duke, to whom I was presented, made me sit near him, and deigned to inform me that to fulfil, without inconvenience to the members of the club, the condition which prescribes that there should be singing after dinner, a certain number of professional people was invited, to whom the title of honorary members, and a dinner free of expense, were given each time they were invited. These artistes, said the duke, enjoy all the privileges of members, and one of these privileges being the right of discussion, they use this privilege with the same freedom towards a nobleman as they would towards one of their brother actors. The dinner, which commenced at half past four, lasted about two hours, including the dessert, which consisted of various cheeses and dry and green fruits. Boxes containing small music-desks and sheets of music were then placed on the table. I was about to lay hold of one of these sheets, when the duke stopped me, saying, that the placing of this music on the table was a mere matter of form, but that it was forbidden to touch it under penalty of a fine. The singing commenced by a prayer, which was chanted standing, and with a gravity of demeanour which was an indispensable part of the performance. One is obliged to join in the chaunt, or to appear to do so.

After four decanters had made the round of the table from left to right, and from guest to guest, they are returned to the president, who asks of the first guest the name of a lady as a toast. This name, which is never distinctly pronounced, is generally that of an actress or a dancer. Drinking is resumed, and the singers commence a catch or a glee. When a member wishes to take part in a catch or glee, the singers place themselves near him. The same ceremony is repeated to each guest. The number not being less than thirty, one can form an idea of the number of glasses of wine and of songs which are despatched on these occasions.

For some instants this music is insupportable. To the fatigue produced by its monotony is soon joined the inconvenience of an increase of discordance and of singing out of tune. As a guest, however, you must submit to be saturated with this music from six till nine o'clock. To leave the room before nine o'clock would be an unpardonable rudeness. Some intrepid amateurs prolong these sittings till midnight; they then order grills strongly spiced and peppered, together with oysters, which they wash down with Madeira and Sherry. Between two and three o'clock in the morning they regain their homes, some of them ill supported on their reeling limbs, others in hackney-coaches, the drivers of which lie in wait for this sort of customers, to whom they are ever forward in offering their indispensable services.

Each club has its particular usages, conformably to the end of its institution; but there are rules which are common to all: such are, the mode of admission, a minute observance of the rules and regulations, reciprocal politeness of the members, a tariff of prices, &c.

The clubs in general are large and well situated houses; the furniture is adapted to the uses to which it is destined. Newspapers are spread on the tables in great numbers, and libraries (which are attached) offer a never-failing resource. Baths and dressing-rooms are also at the service of the members, and it is common enough to see the habitués of the clubs arriving in the morning, and passing there the rest of the day, thus making the club their house, and its members their family.

Clubs are, for the greater part of the members, but a species of Restaurants, where they dine, read the newspapers, or spend their useless time in idle conversation, play, or sleep. You enter the rooms wearing your hat, approach the table to read a newspaper, (often content to read the title only,) or you give yourself the appearance of running over the matter, in presenting your hand to this person with a distracted air, and nodding to that. Then you throw yourself into a large arm-chair, with a thoughtless vacant air; after a time you write a few letters, and when you wish to fall quietly asleep, you pass into the library, a room generally devoted to this species of enjoyment.

The dining-rooms of the English clubs only differ from those of the Restaurants of Paris in the amplitude of their proportions, and the recherche of their furniture. The cookery is simple, in bad taste, and extremely dear. Fried or boiled fish, enormous joints served every half hour, and conveyed from table to table that each person may cut his portion off, ragouts, puddings, potatoes, cauliflowers, spinach without sauce, and which is added to the load you have on your plate—these form the ingredients of your dinner. For dessert you have two or three kinds of cheese, and, to wash down all, you may be supplied with porter, ale, beer, French, Spanish, and Portuguese wines.

Well appointed servants in livery are always at your orders. It is expressly forbidden to give them money.

The considerable expense of these establishments is covered by a fixed sum which each member pays for admission, by an annual payment of smaller amount made by each member, and by the profit had on the articles consumed.

Club habits have necessarily a very considerable influence on the national manners. They are a sort of initiation to political life, less by means of discussions, which are rarely entered on within their walls, than by conversations, in which the most important affairs, relating to the general interests of the country, are treated with depth and justness of view. In clubs, too, you learn the character and talents of the most remarkable public men.

Nor is their effect less sensible on the manners of English women. It accustoms them to a solitary life, to the almost constant absence of their husbands, and thus forces them to seek occupation in the cares which they bestow on their families.

NEWSPAPERS.

Who is there from the peer to the hackney-coachman, who does not read the newspapers? Who is there who is not influenced by them? The man of birth fears them; to the shopkeeper and tradesman they are a necessity, for he finds in their columns an opinion which he would not know how to form for himself: their number is therefore considerable. From London, as from the heart, proceed these grand arteries of the body politic. On reaching the provinces, they divide themselves, and spread through the smaller arteries the opinions they circulate. These opinions are brought back from the extremities to the centre, by a mechanism resembling that which maintains the pulsation of the human heart. But in the organisation of society, as in the organisation of living beings, the parts destined to elaborate the principles of life do not always perform their functions with an equal success. A vicious or acrid flood often causes the limbs into which it penetrates to gangrene: oftener still the false doctrines of newspapers induce disorder in the social body, and bring on its dissolution.

For a long time, the English newspapers limited their functions to the studying of popular opinion. To follow in its wake seemed to have been their object. But in proposing to themselves this end, each person gave to the shade of opinion he had adopted, a colouring, darker or lighter, in proportion to the vehemence or moderation of the principles which he wished to see prevail. The English press, following the example of that of France, has bounded from the extremity to the head of popular opinion. Newspapers now pretend to trace the line which this opinion should follow, and aspire to direct it. They find fault with, denounce, menace one party, while they stimulate another. Rarely is the energy of the English press employed in the service of order. An incontestable "estate" in the nation, it puts itself in constant opposition to power, saps the bases on which it reposes, and prepares its ruin—a ruin which it will be ready to accomplish altogether, whenever it shall suit the factions, of whom this press is the formidable auxiliary, to dispense with social order. That which the press has already done in France, the press, with a little more time, will do in England. The plan is already matured for a decisive aggression. In the means employed for this subject, the English press has not the merit of invention. To attack all that the people were habitually taught to respect,—religion, the monarchy, the government,—has been, of late, its constant object, and, in order to direct its shafts with surer aim against the persons of priests, of kings, of governors, this press has not hesitated to attack the fundamental institutions of society, and to attempt to overthrow the hierarchy of ranks, the disposition of property, even respect for the constitution itself. Its next aim has been to excite the popular passions, to whet the appetite of the mass against social superiorities, in presenting to their longing desire a detail of the advantages of which the higher classes are in possession. Nor has it stopped here. It has told the lower classes the course of proceeding they should adopt, revealed to them that which they should demand, advertised them of that which they may easily obtain. It has disclosed to the people their formidable power, broken down the barriers which protected the national organisation, and the restraints which kept the multitude in check. Such is the perseverance with which (modified according to locality and the classes upon whom it has to act,) this instrument of evil has proceeded to create the elements of chaos and confusion, without once reflecting what is to be the ultimate result. In France, where they appeal to political passions, the journals declare themselves openly for such or such a faction. In England, where parties are acted upon either by modesty or fear, the newspapers feign to attach themselves only to national interests. Fiery, piquant, and condensed with talent in one country, they are in the other representative, heavy, and insolent. Every where they present inconvenience and a future danger, but nevertheless a necessity of the existing epoch.

The English newspapers present, in their numerous and interminable columns, every thing which can speed to the interests or stimulate the curiosity of their readers. Joined to the advertisements, which generally fill half the paper (and sometimes make the addition of a supplement necessary,) are detailed reports of the proceedings of both houses of parliament. Then follow extracts from foreign journals—then a correspondence on all that is passing in all quarters of the globe—then a summary, or leading article, on those points on which the editor wishes to draw attention or deceive the public. A minute account of the causes before the courts of justice—of the murders, executions, and strange events, real or invented; some bad puns, the refuse of the salon complete the motley composition of an English newspaper.

He who seeks to find in the English newspapers good taste, a spirit of observant criticism, an exact and well-digested knowledge of the politics of Europe, will be disappointed, for the greater part of the English journals are devoid of these qualities. Those articles which appear in the French papers of all political opinions, and exhibit a union of profound thought and eloquent expression, are seldom imitated in the English. Praise or blame are duly dispensed from these oracles. Insult or praise is administered without reserve or delicacy. But that which most surprises in the press of England, is the absolute ignorance of the position, the interests, the habits, the public characters of other countries, and, above all, of France. The judgments pronounced on these points in English newspapers are founded on articles in some French journal of the same complexion; while for a history of persons recourse is had to the Mémoires de la Contemporaine, or some production equally worthy of confidence.* These opinions are always a subject astonishment to foreigners, even to those most familiar with the ignorance of the writer and the credulity of the reader. Nevertheless, it is from factious newspapers or despicable pamphlets that France is judged by Great Britain.

* The translator feels bound to dissent from this sweeping censure. The articles on Foreign Affairs in the Times, though they disclose no profound views or systematized combinations, are nevertheless written in a pure and classical style, while they often display much research and always a lucid arrangement.—Translator.

The severe judgment just pronounced (to which there are honourable exceptions) is applicable only to the daily press. Under the name of Reviews, Magazines, Encyclopedias, outlets are opened to sound criticism, to good taste, and to the higher literature, through which the most distinguished writers give vent to the flow of their genius and the current of their reflections. No country excels England in this kind of production, in which she has as manifest a superiority over France, as France has over England in the composition of her daily journals. The explanation of this will be found in the different character of the two people; with our neighbours, the necessity of labour and reflection; with us, that vivacity, that impulse of the moment, which is natural to us; these sufficiently explain the causes of pre-eminence in the literature of each nation, and in that species of composition which brings their respective writers into closer resemblance.

In point of truth and impartiality, the daily journals of both countries are on a par. Public opinion does justice to the claims of both, yet public opinion is no less the slave of journalism in London than at Paris. There are so many people who wish to speak on every subject, and yet so few who, owing to sloth or incapacity, can reason on any one! Hence it is that they are obliged to surrender their judgments to reasonings ready prepared for them, and in the end they persuade themselves that their opinions had not been different, had they been the result of their own reflection. Thus it is that folly favours malevolence, and that states maintain within their bosoms elements which have already destroyed some among them, and which menace others with an approaching ruin!

EDUCATION.

The varied and well-directed instruction given to the English youth is an idea of very general prevalence; but it will not altogether stand the test of an impartial examination, the result of which will at least prove to us that we should not give so absolute a meaning to the word instruction.

The English are in general cold and sententious: it is hence assumed that they are profound and reflective. They are, perhaps, neither one nor the other. Their lives and habits are too incongruous, their time is too broken in upon, to allow of their giving themselves up to laborious and continued studies. Their early youth is passed in schools and universities: in the former, three or four—in the latter, five months of vacation, interfere to break the course of studies, to distract the attention, and to favour that taste for dissipation already fostered by the light and ill directed discipline which prevails in these institutions. There are few young gentlemen of good families who have not horses at command from their infancy, and who do not keep them in the neighbourhood of the establishments in which their education is in course of completion. A part of the time which should be devoted to regular study is thus lost in a species of recreation, which gives to the mind as well as the body a tone little in unison with the professed object of a seminary.

There are not in England, as in France, those supplemental helps to the insufficiency of a primary education, which are presented in public gratuitous courses, open to all ages and conditions, and which take their range through all the paths of science and literature. Neither medicine nor law, in England, have special schools devoted to their cultivation; and the pursuit of the higher mathematics is reserved for those who have the power of expending a large sum to avail themselves of the isolated means afforded to attain proficiency.

It is sought to compensate for the inconveniences of this mode of education, by prolonging its duration. By remaining a couple of years longer in the schools, the students lose time without gaining on the side of knowledge, and they thus contract habits and notions wholly inapplicable to their future worldly pursuits. The English, nevertheless, discuss well a vast number of questions, and with a sort of superiority those which relate to their own country. This may be accounted for in their exclusive habit of occupying themselves with such questions, and in their treating them, even to satiety, at their private meetings. Every day, after dinner, a prolonged conversation of several hours affords occasion for expressing your own and hearing other people's opinions on all matters which engage the public attention. Young men thus rectify and perfect their ideas, and supply what they want by the substitution of materials which have been communicated to them by others. Thus a species of jargon is created, which passes for eloquence in public meetings; and even in both houses of parliament, in which latter assemblies people have the good sense to speak without looking to effect, and limit themselves to the expression of what they ought to say, just as though they were discussing a point round a table or in a drawing-room.

An essential defect in English education is their unwillingness to move out of the narrow circle within which their ideas have been confined, to go in search of new ones, and above all to obtain more extensive and accurate ideas. There are only two ways in England of seeing and judging of things. One of these is taken up and defended by the daily repeated common-place expressions;—the English go no farther. They do not attempt to rectify their judgments by that of others. On political matters, they disdain to draw from sources where they would find suitable information. While on the continent, they must certainly shut their eyes, and render themselves inaccessible to evidence; so many erroneous notions, so many false ideas on the situation of countries, on the interests of the people, on the character of public men, do they bring back; so much do they deceive themselves on the commonest and most incontestable facts! They travel with opinions already formed, and a firm resolution to admit only into their minds notions in harmony with those preconceived opinions. Faithful to this plan, they cherish their very errors, in support of which they cite all that the spirit of party has said or done in confirmation of them during their travels. It may be predicated that the English have not a critical spirit, and that their general education unfits them to acquire it. This charge may appear severe, yet it must be well-founded, for it is in the mouths of all foreigners who have had the best opportunities of seeing and appreciating Great Britain.

The political meetings, frequent as they are, furnish the occasion and foster the habit of public speaking, not only in the necessary discussions which they continually originate, but also in the custom of toast-drinking so prevalent at their periodical dinners. It may be said, in a word, that all domestic customs are an initiation to political customs; and it is to the former the English are indebted for their political education.

Travelling also contributes to give them a variety of information, though perhaps it cannot be said to be very profound. The English see so much that they have much to relate, and it often follows, that the heads of those who have no natural ideas become furnished with recollections of what they have seen. Their education is completed rather in travelling carriages, and round the festive board, than in the academic groves. One might easily conceive this, if the time which the English devote to completing their education were deducted from the three or four meals which cut up the entire day; from the hunting and shooting parties at which you are surprised to see such a crowd of young people, nay, of children, who ought to be at college instead of in the field. But the evil does not end here, for these youths have their horse-racings, their clubs, to which they hold it indispensable to belong, and they moreover spend hours in interminable promenades up and down the streets. With the best will possible—with the most cheerful and happy dispositions—they cannot bring to serious studies that permanent and abiding attention, that steadiness and concentration of thought, which such studies require.

The liberal arts are not better understood in England than the exact sciences. Painting and music often appear imperfect attempts, indicating an aptitude which has not the power of developing itself. The study of these arts does not in the least qualify the scholar to pronounce a sound judgment on productions which so few are capable of appreciating. Money is thrown to an artist from ostentation rather than taste, as though one had a desire to be rid of it, or wished to acquire the reputation and title of protector of the arts. Accordingly, it is not by specialties or isolated facts that we should judge the merits of the system of education followed in England, because, when compared with particular departments and branches in other countries, it would present an incontestable inferiority. But it is by its general results—by the influence which this system exercises upon the manners—by the habits of order and subordination which it establishes and supports—by the actual condition of England itself, that such a system should be appreciated. If it does not produce savans who overturn the institutions of their country, to get themselves talked of, and to find employment for their dangerous talents, it forms useful citizens, familiarised with the interests of their country, and seeking to preserve them in the perpetuation of existing institutions.

All considerations taken into account, it must be admitted that a student of Oxford is to be preferred to a student of the Polytechnic School.

FINE ARTS.

Prepossessed as we may be towards England, we are bound to admit that in respect to the fine arts she is inferior to the least favoured nations. Perfection in them is hopeless without that natural tact, that impulse of taste, that yielding to rules of general assent, which are incompatible with the education and independent opinions of Englishmen. If true to nature, and faithfully portraying it, theirs is a literal copy, which discards its nobler features. They never attempt an interpretation of it distinguished by its more dignified character, and free from those incidents which degrade without giving it a greater impress of truth. The national taste favours and encourages this slothfulness of imagination, which confines artists to the description of mere facts, divested of every suggestion of fancy. Their efforts, when they endeavour to shake off the trammels of habit, tend exclusively to exaggerate the defects of the objects they desire to represent. Thus it is that their imagination, instead of soaring above the common level, falls powerless at every attempt; accordingly their drawing produces a caricature, their theatre a tragedy or comedy alike at variance with all rules, their music a mere sound, their architecture a Buckingham house or the Brighton pavilion.

PAINTING.

How can a different result be expected, when the talents of artists could only be chastened and improved by that public taste which is not to be found in England? Connoisseurs in objects of art are few among the English. Fashion or caprice guides them in the purchase of a picture. The pretended connoisseurs, the purchaser himself, set a value upon it in proportion to its cost; and the circumstances which usually determine its price, are a sombre colour disguising every other object, the name of the supposed artist, the gallery understood to have contained it, if an old painting,—if a modern one, the thickness of the colours, their heavy coating upon the canvass, the incorrectness of the lines (a defect which is graced with the name of freedom,) a capricious composition, laying claim to originality, and especially to national character. A dearly purchased picture, however glaring its faults, is classed amongst the most valuable in a collection. The cicerone who points it out is careful to name the author; he is answered by an admiring exclamation; he tells the sum of money it has cost; the picture is forthwith examined in the smallest details; the beholder takes a distant view, then a nearer one; he closes an eye, places one hand before the other in the form of a spy glass, and after spending a quarter of an hour in silent ecstacy, he retires with the utmost gravity, exclaiming, "Sublime! prodigious!" avoiding, however, that analysis which would belie the conventional praise thus bestowed upon certain productions.

The approbation of English connoisseurs is only to be obtained by launching into an exaggerated style even in those subjects to which it is least adapted. Chasteness of form and figure is deemed affectation, correctness of design is qualified as stiffness, delicate colouring as an obstacle to the general effect. An adherence to truth in the adaptation of the colours would unquestionably find as little favour with judges so difficult to please, since the greater part of their paintings are wholly devoid of it.

The correctness of these observations is remarkably illustrated by the public expositions. Out of a thousand paintings which decorate the walls of many spacious and well lighted apartments, there are to be found six or seven hundred portraits of all kinds, whose attitudes and drapery indicate an extraordinary pretension to originality on the part of the painters, as well as of the individuals whose portraits they have drawn. The resemblance, rather understood to exist than admitted as accurate, is chiefly owing to an evident exaggeration, to the very contortion of the features of the persons who sat for their portraits.

Historical paintings, in the composition of which are introduced, as bearing a closer affinity to truth, the most minute details and the most insignificant episodes; scenes of domestic life—a few landscapes relieved by representations of hunts or races—allegorical subjects, sea or land fights,—such are the paintings which complete a collection unblushingly exposed to the conventional enthusiasm, rather than to the sober judgment of the public. If the English have made up their minds to consider the talents of their painters as affording specimens of all that is correct, perfect and sublime in the art, they should exclude foreigners from admission to their museums. They would then spare their artists the mortification of exciting the pity of the connoisseurs of every other country, and escape the reproach of suffering themselves to be blinded by a prejudice which paralyses their judgment, so correct on many other subjects.

There are a few signal exceptions to this censure. A connoisseur has a wide field wherein to gratify his admiration; he cannot fail to contemplate with delight certain paintings displaying a distinguished talent in composition, drawing, and colouring, and standing as the protests of a few artists who have the courage to resist the torrent of bad taste, and to establish themselves in some sort as landmarks, to point out the road leading to all that constitutes beauty and correctness in their art.

The English have obtained a well merited fame in water colour painting. Whether it be owing to the circumstance that this order of painting does not admit of a high degree of perfection, and that, being less attended to in other countries, there exists no means of instituting a comparison, or that the defects inherent to it have some analogy with those usually imputed to the English style, such as a harshness of colouring, a vagueness in the details, an incorrectness of design, a want of accuracy in the contours,—these are points which it is difficult to decide; certain it is that, in England, this species of composition approaches much nearer to that of nations the most distinguished by their patronage of the fine arts than she can lay claim to in respect to oil painting.

ENGRAVINGS.

There is so much in England to find fault with, in all that relates to the fine arts, that it is a pleasure to have the opportunity of giving unqualified praise to one of their most important branches. Copper-plate engraving, and more particularly that style known under the appellation of "the English manner," may be said to rival the most perfect productions of other nations, as it may claim a marked superiority over the general run of their productions. A labour of patience and manual dexterity, this profession agrees with the national habits. It receives many and numerous encouragements in the facilities afforded by speculations of a secondary order, but of assured success, which reconcile the interests of the artists with their reputation. The tool which has worked on the material of a great composition, reposes from the fatigues of its labour in tracing on a plate of small dimensions a landscape destined to adorn a keepsake, or illustrations of the edition of an author already in vogue. These admirable productions, distinguished by the combination of grace, finish, and taste, have an assured sale. Ordered beforehand, and paid for at a high price, they afford the artist the means of waiting, without anxiety for the present, the price reserved at some distant date for a long and painful labour; and if they do not establish his reputation, they at least contribute to his comfort, and allow him to bestow greater care on the finish of those chef-d'œuvres, which recommend his name to his own age and to posterity.

Engraving on precious stones has also attained a perfection not sufficiently noticed, because it only exercises itself on objects of trifling value and of common use; but if, in place of limiting its exercise to the carving of coats of arms on seals, this branch of the art elevated its views to the historical style, it would attain a perfection equal to the most approved models which antiquity has handed down to us.

SCULPTURE.

Sculpture, encouraged by a more positive patronage, and the demands for the numerous public edifices, and confined within a narrower range than painting, is cultivated in England with tolerable success. Criticism, which has had to find fault with the vicious composition of many of its works, may speak with more indulgence on the expression of the heads, on the truth of the attitudes, on the boldness with which the national costume has been employed, and the nobleness which has been given to it in spite of the little development of the draperies. Westminster, St. Paul's, Trinity college at Cambridge, and the chapel royal at Windsor, present grand, vast, and sublime compositions. Antique sculpture has left no more beautiful conception than the statue of Newton at Cambridge, by Roubillac. Nor would it disavow the tombs of the Duke of Argyle and of Mrs. Nightingale at Westminster, by the same artist. Those of Nelson and Chatham, and many monuments of the same kind at St. Paul's, and the admirable mausoleum of the Princess Charlotte at Windsor, are works of rare merit, of which countries having the best founded pretensions to superiority might well be proud. Bronze is, or appears to be, less favourable than marble to the display of the talent of English statuary. The public squares are furnished, rather than ornamented, with statues of ordinary merit, some of which have even a ridiculous effect. The appearance of these statues is soon rendered disagreeable by a cloud of black dust, (the deposit of coal smoke,) which defaces the details. From the obliteration of the parts, as well as from the colour, you would mistake the material for cast iron instead of bronze. It may be added, that the general effect of statues, almost always out of proportion with the places where they are exposed to view, little disposes the connoisseur to pronounce an opinion in favour of the artist.

ARCHITECTURE.

In classifying the relative degree of imperfection of the fine arts in England, architecture should be placed still lower than painting. It is almost reduced to the routine of heaping brick upon brick, without farther order or symmetry than that necessary to create openings for doors and windows. If a house should be too small, another is built at the side of it, out of harmony with the first. English architects do not hesitate to place a beam on an arch, a small window by the side of a wide door, or a chimney at the angle of a building. Do they wish for ornaments? they can only find columns; they do not trouble themselves either with their proportions or their props. Their height is determined by the elevation of the edifice. They are placed on a cornice or on a balcony, with as little motive as there would be for placing them underneath: they are indifferently employed in ornamenting a shop, a palace, or a cottage.

Nor can even the praise of imitation be accorded to English architecture. Witness the triumphal arch of the Green Park, and that of the palace destined to become the royal residence—a bold defiance of bad taste. One is tempted to ask, where the English can have conceived the idea of St. Paul's, when one sees so many ridiculous edifices heaped round this chef-d'œuvre.

The internal arrangement of the houses is in keeping with the poverty of their external decoration. The system is exactly the same for the house of a lord as for that of a tradesman; the difference exists only in the proportions. The taste of the architect goes for nothing in the ornamental portion. When he has built four walls so fragile that the roll of a carriage produces a general creptation, placed horizontally, as well as perpendicularly, separations which form ceilings and partition walls, and added to these a narrow staircase of difficult ascent, which communicates with the three stories of this wretched house, his occupation is at an end.

In order to rival the architect's good taste, an upholsterer generally covers these walls with a paper of a red ground. He furnishes two or three of the rooms in the same colour, places four-post beds in the sleeping-rooms, carpets in all the apartments, and behold an English house ready to receive its inmates! As to looking-glasses, they are rarely met with, and are generally of small dimensions. If the English wished for clocks, they would find it difficult to place them in apartments without brackets, whose elevated chimney-pieces (four or five feet high) are without shelves.

Instead of being composed of folding shutters, the windows are formed of grooved panels, sliding into one another, and cut out about four feet from the ground. Hence it is necessary to stoop the head to look out; and one is also obliged to bend oneself if one wishes to walk in the narrow balcony before the house.

In looking over the numerous heaps of habitations which have risen around the capital during the last half century, on the sea-coast, and in every place in which there has been a pretext to build, and in examining the architecture employed, it must be acknowledged that, if the English know how to build towns, they do not know how to build houses. This arises from an abundance of capital and a penury of taste.

The propensity for all that is bizarre has induced them to adopt with a sort of passion the Gothic architecture. They employ this style in the building of chateaux and of the most insignificant houses, but they know not how to divest it of its numerous imperfections.

They preserve, in the staircases, the original cramped and narrow dimensions and high steps; in the corridors, the antique darkness and want of breadth; in the façades, the irregularity; and in the whole distribution and arrangement, those inconveniences which may have been overlooked by the unrefined habits of the twelfth century. As objects of perspective, these Gothic structures have a pleasing effect; but as houses are more intended for habitation than to gratify the sight, common sense should point out the propriety of adapting a mansion to the wants and exigencies of existing civilisation.

English architects do not succeed any better in the construction of palaces than in the building of plainer dwellings. London and Brighton, as well as other parts of the three kingdoms, offer proofs enough in support of the severe judgment which has been here pronounced.

There is, however, a style in which it would be unjust to refuse to English architects the praise of very distinguished talent: I mean religious edifices. Far inferior, no doubt, to St. Paul's, but still in an honourable rank, may be placed a crowd of modern churches; some in the Grecian style; others, more especially, in the Gothic. These constructions would do honour to a nation more advanced in the arts than the English. Elegance and justness of proportions—elaborate execution—a design in harmony with the sacred character of the edifice—beauty of situation, are all united in these modern edifices. In the squares of London, as in the picturesque sites of Essex, or amongst the stately trees of Yorkshire, the traveller halts with pleasure before those noble edifices, which he is surprised to meet in a country having so little to boast of in the way of architecture. He is tempted to ask himself if these structures and the surrounding houses have been the work of the same architects, and if recourse has not been had to foreigners to raise temples to the Divinity.

Although English buildings are bizarre, deprived of taste, and at variance with the most simple rules and combinations of art, they produce, nevertheless, a great effect to the eye which views them as a whole.

This effect is principally owing to the happy idea of building a certain number of houses seemingly connected together, and having the appearance of one vast building, whose symmetrical architecture, affords the illusion of a palace; to the position of the building, and an occasional irregularity, which permits the most imposing parts to be thrown into projection. This monumental aspect produces astonishment, and might surprise one into admiration, if common sense did not come to the aid of the understanding, and enable it to assign to things their just and proper value.

MUSIC.

The art of music, like that of painting, is appreciated more by the expense which it involves, than by the real enjoyments it affords. Cultivated with little success by the English, it is scarcely followed as a profession, unless by foreigners, the more dearly paid because they seek to find in the money which they gain, not only a recompense for their talent, but a compensation for the little interest which it inspires.

If English voices afford little gratification, English ears are not over-nice: the one is made for the other; and if, which never happens, the sounds of a sharp race should distinctly strike the tympanum of an attentive auditory, it would not be affected in a disagreeable manner. By a habit of which people are not aware, and which can only originate in the little pleasures of music too often unworthy of attention, people do not listen; and hence it is that an English concert is but a noise of instruments which mingles itself with the noise of conversations, rendered more deafening by the necessity which the talkers lie under of making their voices prevail over those of the singers.

When this charivari has lasted the prescribed time, an end is put to it; the artists are dismissed after having been well paid.

If professional music is thus rewarded, one may imagine that amateurs are little encouraged to make this sort of talent available. They limit themselves to the feeble execution of pieces on the harp or piano, generally accompanied by a flute or the song of romances. Foreigners alone lend a willing attention. As for the English, they continue their conversations quite as much before amateurs as before artists.

English musical compositions are happily rare, and are undistinguished by any nationality of character. Music and musicians, the country-dances, and the orchestras which play them, the very hand-organs in the streets, and the miserable wretches who turn them, all are drawn from the continent to London. It is, in reality, the wisest plan.

THEATRES.

An examination of the state of the theatres will conclude the subject of the fine arts. The taste or sentiment which imprints a particular direction to talents, although it exercises an influence on the histrionic art, does not, however, operate so injuriously upon it as on the other branches of the fine arts. England possesses a considerable number of comedians, and is specially distinguished by tragedians of note. Declamation is not, as in France, reduced to a system; it is based on the actor's observation of nature, and would leave little to desire, if it did not frequently descend to too minute details. The tour-nure of male as well as female actors is not sufficiently natural. Their gait is awkward and embarrassed; their address is deficient in suppleness and grace. The actors group themselves with difficulty, and cross the stage with awkwardness. Nothing in their demeanour indicates the study, the idea even of the habits and manners of good society. As a counterbalance to these defects, it must be admitted that they often hit on the just expression of physiognomy and tone. Mediocre in the higher and lighter comedy, they excel in tragedy, which lends itself to a marked declamation, and in low comedy, which permits its votaries to descend to overcharged caricature.

Exceedingly rich in tragic authors of the first order, England is deficient in comic authors of an elevated style, and borrows from France the greater part of the subjects of the small pieces which are played on her theatres. These lose much of their merit in the mutilation they undergo for the purpose of adapting them to the English taste. Nor are they less deteriorated by translation, and by the manner in which they are played. They want the local application which they had at Paris, but which they cannot preserve in London.

It is in operas, where the poetry as well as the music has been borrowed from French authors, that the difference between the two countries is more sensibly felt. A Vandal, incapable of appreciating a musical idea, draws his pen over a bar of Rossini, of Boyeldieu, of Anber; cuts out whole pieces, and what is still worse, parts of a piece; and when he has reduced it to a convenient size, distributes it to the other Vandals, the singers and orchestra, who execute it in the most barbarous manner before a public who, less intent upon the quality than the quantity, are well satisfied, provided they find occupation from seven in the evening till twelve or one o'clock in the morning.

There is an English Opera in London, but so bad, that even an English public (the least difficult to please) have pronounced condemnation upon it. Confined to a small theatre, at a season when all the world is out of town, the English opera serves only as theatrical food to a class not over dainty. When the great houses open, which offer more attractive entertainment, the English opera disappears.

A French theatre draws a constant influx of visitors during four or five months of each year. Its stock-pieces are strengthened by a supply from the vaudevilles of Paris; which city also lends the aid of her most remarkable actors, thus rendering supportable the mediocrity of the ordinary troop.

The Opera, or King's Theatre, presents an almost exclusive company of foreign artists. The prima donnas and primo tenores of Italy, and the corps de ballet of France, furnish their most distinguished members. These are a species of commodity which the English custom-house laws do not pronounce contraband. Fashion, rather than musical taste, draws crowds to this theatre. The high price of the seats does not permit those who pique themselves on belonging to the fashionable classes to be absent. The opera is the best attended theatre in London, not because it is the best, but because it is the dearest.

The interior and extent of the two great English theatres are more remarkable than their architecture or arrangement. The boxes are found fault with for being too deep; the corridors and sorties, for being too confined and narrow; and the staircases, because of their steepness and want of development. The decorations, which vary with almost every scene, have a fine effect, although they do not generally produce the illusion of those of our opera. The costumes are rich, but not correct, and are moreover too loaded with tinsel. The abuse of fire-works introduced to illuminate, what in technical language are called "the pictures," has this double inconvenience. In the first place it accustoms the eye to a light which is not in nature; and, secondly, it spreads through the theatre a stink and smoke which remain during the whole representation.

The smaller theatres have, in a relative proportion, the same species of merit and defects which are observed in the larger houses. Their representations are confined to melodrama, vaudeville, and pieces of trifling comedy. Many of them possess very good actors, and draw that species of audience whose laughter and tears are only to be excited by exaggeration.

What are we to conclude from this severe but strict examination of the fine arts in England, but that they are exotic plants, cultivated by national luxury, by the fancy of the moment, by the very expense at which they are produced, and which, up to the present day, it has been found impossible to acclimatise? Children of the imagination, they cannot flourish in a country where that principle of creation, that condition of existence necessary to the production of what is beautiful, grand, and true, is not in existence. England, it will therefore be inferred, is condemned to remain tributary to Italy and France for the fine arts. What she has to regret on this head is too amply compensated for, in other respects, to cause her to lament a deficiency of which one need not fear to remind her.

PHYSICIANS.

The incredulots in the abilities of the professors of the healing art, could find in a comparison of the science as practised in England and in other countries, powerful arguments in favour of their scepticism. In France, for instance, physicians are men of profound attainments in every thing that relates directly or indirectly to their art. Long and painful studies, pursued in schools directed by the most enlightened professors, and possessed of the necessary means to extend the domain of science, initiate them into the mysteries of the art. There is no country in which one should live longer than in France, if the talent of the physician could prolong existence.

In England opportunities of study are rare, precarious, and costly. There are no other schools than hospitals, no other mode of teaching than the unreasoning observation of practice.* Anatomy supplies the English schools by means as imperfect for science as they are revolting to humanity. The anatomical study of peculiar and organic diseases can be but rarely pursued, in consequence of the prejudices which are opposed to the investigations of science. Hence it results that all is imperfect, as well in the teaching as in the practice of medicine. The duration of human life is nevertheless as long as in France. What conclusion are we to draw from this, but that the science of the physician only contributes in a very feeble degree to the preservation of human life, if his ignorance does not abridge it in a more sensible proportion? In either hypothesis, it is apparent that medicine exercises no very determined influence on the increase or diminution of the human race. The only positive effect is that produced by the habits, manners, and diet, and the greater or less care taken to combat the inconveniences of climate, of local situation, or of personal position.

If the state of medicine should exhibit a sinister influence as relates to the prolongation of human life, most assuredly it would do so in England. The different causes just indicated are all attended with their effects. The absence of long and continuous study limits medical knowledge to vague and very superficial speculations. Violent remedies derived at random from the pharmacy, and empiricism, are the means resorted to. The result of all is, that a guinea is placed without delicacy in the hands of the doctor, and received without shame, at each visit. The patient is cured in more or less time, according as his constitution is good or bad. It is his affair, not that of the physician.

There exists, under the name of surgeons, a class of men exercising the healing art, or at least that of having patients under cure. In England, remedies are ordered and sold as candles, sugar, or cloth. Surgeons differ from physicians in this, that they cannot receive fees. They remunerate themselves by a profit on their drugs. Five or six phials, dearly charged for, and filled with remedies of all colours, boxes of pills, ointments, &c. pass from the shop of the apothecary into the chamber, sometimes into the stomach, but oftener out of the window, of the patient. This is a matter of small moment, provided the apothecary receives the remuneration for his visit and medical advice.

* It is for this very reason that English physicians are the first in the world. Were they to pursue the French system, they might attain "the bad pre-eminence" of French physicians, who are among the worst of the tribe.—Translator.

Energetic remedies form the substratum of the prescriptions of English practitioners. Alcohol enters into the greater part of the preparations, and always in the least rational manner. I have seen it administered in larger doses, to a patient hastening to the tomb through a confirmed consumption. It is a part of the treatment prescribed when the patient is convalescent. The abuse of this drug is carried to inconceivable lengths. I know a lady who drinks a pint of brandy a day by the advice of her physician; and wonderful to tell, this regimen has already lasted for six years. No where is the healing art exercised with a more sovereign contempt of the most common rules, with a more absolute disregard of reasoning and common sense, than in England.

It is said that surgery has attained a high degree of perfection, and in support of this assertion, the names of two very rich surgeons are cited. It would be impossible to deny these individuals the possession of rare talents, if we estimate the latter by the immense fortunes they have acquired.

ENGLISH CLERGY.

No comparison can be instituted between dissimilar objects. It would be folly to institute a comparison between the clergy of France and that of England.

"What is a priest in France?" said a very religious deputy, when delivering himself at the tribune, and whose word may be believed in this matter.—"A priest in France is a simple man, without family, without credit, of little influence, poorly clad in black, who supplies by an inward piety, a great disinterestedness, and a fervent charity, those exterior advantages which are wanting to him. He is not to be met in the salons, because there his qualities are not necessary, and he would find himself misplaced; too often sprung from the lower classes of society, he opposes, at times, an indiscreet pride to the lowness of his origin. The mediocrity of his fortune leaves him no other resource for doing good, than to importune those who have wealth to succour those who have nothing."

If one wished to adopt the form employed by this deputy, to give an account of the English clergy, the reply to the question—What is a clergyman in England?—would be as follows. An English clergyman is a man of distinguished birth, surrounded by a numerous family, provided with a rich benefice, living in luxury, participating in every pleasure, in all the enjoyments of the world, playing, hunting, dancing, attending the theatres, neither grave nor serious, unless nature has made him so; he is one who hoards his emoluments in order to settle his children; who spends his fortune in waging, in horses, in dogs, sometimes (when he is thoughtless and devoid of foresight) with a mistress; in any event, giving little to the poor, and leaving their case, and the fulfilment of duties which he disdains, to some unfortunate curate, who for a miserable stipend is obliged to exhibit the virtues and to fulfil the duties which the incumbent despises and neglects.

This double portrait of the English and French clergy is perfectly true. The neglect and indigence of which (in consequence of the spread of revolutionary principles and laws) the French clergy have been the victims, have operated to turn from that career those members of honourable families who heretofore recruited the clerical ranks. At present, the zeal of the bishops beats up for recruits among young men of the humblest birth, who, comparing their primitive state of abject and miserable poverty with the prospect of a life less laborious, to which they have been prepared by a semblance of education,

* It is evident from what follows, that the author speaks of apothecaries, sometimes called surgeon apothecaries. But here is the danger of a foreigner writing on English customs. and which raises them to a social position less degraded, are led to prefer the cassock of the priest to the smock-frock of the wagoner. After having consecrated some years to the acquisition of indispensable attainments, they leave the seminaries without novitiate, without a study of the world or the spirit of their calling, to oppose, with a sort of brutal awkwardness, the absolutism of their religious principles to the reasoning independence of their parishioners. Destitute of experience, deprived of that tact which the habits of living in the bosom of a respectable family might have given them, if the lowliness of their condition did not put this advantage out of their reach, they commence a struggle with those they are called on to direct, and a reciprocal malevolence ensues, rendering the interchange of good feeling or good offices alike impossible. Henceforth, it is only by sermons, which are turned into ridicule, or by alms subtracted from clerical to administer to still more wretched and more ungrateful poverty, that the presence of the village curate becomes known, and his life is destined to flow on amidst storms, fatigues, and overwhelming privations. Yet is he pursued by envy, as though he were happy and honoured!

Such is not the life of the English ecclesiastic. His career is marked out beforehand: its close is as apparent to him as its commencement. He knows whether his hopes should centre in the possession of a benefice of a thousand or twelve hundred pounds sterling, or whether his ambition may aspire to a mitre. He knows also that, in the least favourable hypothesis, his education and studies, which are never closely scrutinised, will suffice to secure for him an honourable position. His family or friends hold a rich curacy in reserve for him, on which he will reside if he have the desire and the hope of further elevation. If he be anxious to sacrifice future prospects to present pleasures, he will cause the duties of his cure to be performed by a paid curate. A grave and sober course of life, vast theological learning, above all, pulpit eloquence, are indispensable conditions to the attainment of a bishopric; but though these qualities are the result of some sacrifices, still the advantages preponderate; each step in the ladder of preferment is accompanied with an increase of wealth, of honour, and consideration, and the courage and perseverance of the aspirant are sustained by the perspective of the honours, the influence, and the large fortune reserved to him who reaches the fortunate eminence.

The Bench of Bishops numbers individuals as distinguished by their talents as by their morals; too much engaged, however, by their interference in politics as spiritual peers,—too much carried away by their taste for preaching, they do not devote themselves sufficiently to the superintendence of the subordinate clergy, who live in a sort of independence of spiritual authority, and who are only made to feel the existence of discipline when some outrageous scandal has rendered an act of severity indispensable.

The staid manners of the bishops do not preserve them from habits of luxury and expense; besides an episcopal palace appertaining to the see, and a mansion in one of the most beautiful sites of their dioceses, they have houses in London, where sessions of parliament afford them a pretext for residence.

A black dress, but not distinguished in its cut from that of the rest of society, is worn by clergymen of bon ton,—by those younger sons of noble families who only belong to the church in consequence of the fortune it provides for them. These are the priests who are oftener seen at Epsom, Doncaster, and Newmarket, at the sporting-parties of Norfolk and Yorkshire, than in the pulpit. The clerical costume interferes in England with none of the enjoyments of the world; those who wear it do not hesitate to appear at balls and routs, or in opera stalls; and they have no scruples at being seen in a box at the Adelphi or the Olympic.

The parish priests, or clergymen on whom the care of souls devolves, find compensation for the fatigues of their profession in an appropriate endowment, and in the pleasures of a less boisterous society. There are few even of those who do not mingle, with their numerous families, and with apparent pleasure, in the mazes of a quadrille or of a country dance.

I have vainly endeavoured to reconcile the severity, with which protestant clergymen enforce the observance of the Sunday, with the passion of many for the dance. This passion exposes them to the familiarity, often to the railleries of those to whom they should afford serious example,—to the reproaches of that class to whom they interdict enjoyments which they themselves follow with a sort of delight. It would be better, however, to allow the peasantry to dance on the Sunday, than to expose them to the dangerous temptation of expending their time in idleness or drinking.

The country clergy of England are distinguished by severe and irreplicable manners; but their functions, limited to the celebration of the service, do not extend to the distribution of alms. There are very few clergymen who know the number, the names, or the wants of the poor of their parish; these matters they consider as being out of the pale of their obligations. They are not even leaving their commodious dwellings to sit by the bed of the sick, or to carry to the chamber of death the consolations of religion. These charitable offices might render them subject to the attacks of some contagious disorder; and in the event of their illness or death, they would not be the only victims, since the lot of all that is dear to them is inseparable from their own.

These are considerations which influence not the catholic priest. He is poor and isolated. Without perceiving that he changes habitation, he passes from the humble dwelling of his ministry to the wretched cabin of the indigent. From poverty to misery the transition is hardly perceptible. The catholic priest tastes of the woes he comes to succour. If he is carried off in the midst of his duties, he has little to regret at leaving a world where his lot has been none of the happiest. No one weeps over his tomb, no one suffers from his untimely exit. The idea of the past troubles him not; his thoughts are fixed on the future, and that future is eternity. He faces therefore without fear, almost without reflection, dangers which would be more formidable, if he participated in the enjoyments of life—if he had a wife, children, and all that constitutes worldly happiness.

The fecundity of clerical marriages has become proverbial. When habits of order are conjoined with a high preferment, the fortune of the children of these marriages is almost assured. But it is not always thus. The inconveniences of the contrast between a certain rank in the social scale, joined to a finished education, and the privations of a precarious existence, are sometimes felt. Clergymen's widows commonly obtain asylums in institutions established for this purpose; their sons turn their education to account; while the daughters seek in the employment of their talents resources which they do not always find. Sometimes they have not the courage to resist proposals too equivocal to be honourable.

I have no doubt that if the question of the celibacy or marriage of the clergy were to be determined on the comparison of what is observed in England, and in France, an impartial judge would pronounce in favour of the latter system. He would not hesitate to acknowledge, that with an equal regularity of manners, there results, from a life of celibacy, greater abnegation of the good things of this world, more disinterestedness, and more real charity; whilst greater attachment to this life, more anxious attention to family concerns, less affection for the duties of his calling, less disposition to exercise charity and benevolence, and less means of satisfying these calls, fall to the lot of the married clergy. With every allowance, therefore, for exaggerated opinions, an isolated priest is better for society than a clergyman attached to all its interests, participating in all its influences, and subjected to all the conditions which it imposes.

If a comparison were instituted between the French and English clergy; if the austere forms of the one—their self-sacrifices—their abnegation of family affection—their inexhaustible charity—if the privations which they impose on themselves to satisfy such claims—if their unfurnished houses, their humble costume, their rigid practice of the severities of religion, were to be contrasted with the easy and comfortable lives of the English clergy—with their anxiety for the present and future happiness of their families and friends—their expenditure in matters not in harmony with their sacred functions—the recherche of their furniture, of their dress, and of their equipages—Reason, which would pronounce an impartial decree, and range on the one side a true virtue regardless of sacrifices, and which errs only by a want of tact in the use of means; and on the other a sort of mundane virtue, which has found an easy way to reconcile a grave calling with manners neither grave nor serious enough for the clerical state, would declare a preference of the humble clergy of the Catholic church, over the rich and sumptuous pastors of the Protestant establishment.

RELIGIOUS CUSTOMS.

In England, in that country which the French philosophers of the last century represented to us as a people of esprits forts, of unbelievers, caring little for religion; the most profound respect is nevertheless professed for its acts, as well as its most inconvenient practices. Religion is never made a subject of declamation, of pleasantry, or of doubt. Her well-paid ministers exercise a great influence in the country parts of England. Good or bad, the two sermons which they preach every Sunday draw a numerous and attentive congregation. Meals are commenced and terminated by blessings and grace. The bishops sit in the house of lords by a sort of national deference, for no law gives them title to a seat.* A religious spirit then exists in England.

What is the celebration of the Sabbath in catholic countries—in those countries which are accused of a blind intolerance? A means of repose, of pleasure even for the lower classes of society; a leisure-time for the better classes; for the one and the other, an opportunity of procuring that relaxation which cannot often be obtained on days dedicated to business or labour. Provided that one or two members of each family appear at the parish church for a quarter of an hour, whether stimulated to do so by real devotion, or out of respect for outward appearances, a duty is performed towards society, which, though not considered indispensable, is applauded as a profession of religious faith. People think they have thus fulfilled their duty towards God, whose ministers require no more.

The Sabbath produces in England an absolute suspension of business, labour, and pleasure. Unless at those hours when the monotonous and prolonged jangling of bells call the faithful to prayer, all is sad, motionless, silent. It rarely happens that the rolling of a carriage comes to interrupt the meditations of those who pray, or to distract the ennui of those whose custom confines at home. The approach of carriages to church is forbidden during the progress of divine service. All places of public amusement are closed—the most innocent domestic recreations are banished in the day. If the sounds of a piano are heard, it is as an accompaniment to psalms. In many houses, the inmates dine on cold meats, prepared the day before, so that the servants may be relieved from all labour. The reading of a sermon is the only recreation allowed. Will it then be said that a religious spirit does not exist in England?

Hear an Englishman speak of the customs of the catholic religion, and he will denounce the slavery of the people, and even of kings, to the papal yoke. According to him, the prisons are always open to receive the victims of a worship which allows neither opposition nor the exercise of reason. If he permits the existence of the Inquisition, or of the auto-da-fés, it is as much as he will do. These are religious and national prejudices, which he will transmit intact to his descendants, as he has received them from his ancestors. He treats these as he does the institutions, of his own country, respecting without examining them. Although his frequent visits to the continent should have taught him to appreciate the credit due to such opinions, yet they remain unmodified; and the name of papist is still repugnant in his mind, to intolerant and superstition. In his own country, nevertheless, those sanguinary laws of Elizabeth, which condemn to death the priest found celebrating mass, which confiscate the goods of those who give them asylum, and subject to banishment those who pray with them—these laws, although fallen into disuse, are found still to subsist.† England pulsates resound with furious diatribes against the catholics. The least infraction of the laws for the observance of holy days is severely punished.‡ It was not without great effort that some of the penal laws were repealed; and as if to maintain against catholics a stigma inflicted upon them by a religion which reproaches other creeds with their intolerance, there are certain employments to which even now catholics are ineligible. England is therefore religious indeed.

* This is a mistake. By Magna Charta the clergy were to be summoned as well as the nobility and commons. The spiritual peers are lords of parliament in virtue of certain ancient baronies held under the king.—Translator.

† This is a mistake, these laws are now happily repealed.—Translator.

‡ There are no holy days in England but Christmas day and Good-Friday.—Id.

On certain serious occasions, when the country is menaced or struck with some great calamity, the parliament originates, and the king ordains, a fast. No one omits to abstain on this day, or ventures to turn the measure into ridicule. What would the liberals and unbelievers of France have said if, in consequence of an epidemic, Charles X. had ordered his subjects to abstain from dinner? There would have resounded cries of jesuitism, the denomination of priests, superstition, &c. The journals could not have found space enough in the limits of their columns, nor caricaturists ridicule enough to shower down on the head of the king and his government. William IV. orders a fast to allay the cholera, and every one actually fasts, goes to church, and gives abundant alms. Is it from obedience to the laws, from respect for power? Yes, but it is also from a spirit of religion.

Cold, reasoning, positive, those Englishmen who might not be religious from conviction, are so from a sense of the utility of religion, and from a respect for appearances. Religion enters into all public acts; the want of it is so much felt, that if a town is built, or a part of a town, a church is immediately raised. In truth, the town is commenced by the building of a church.

It may be said that the building of the church is a business of speculation, and that the builder will draw an ample interest from his capital. That may be; but, because the speculation is productive, it may be inferred that the church is frequented by a large congregation. A religious spirit, then, prevails in England.

There are few, even among those most indifferent to religion, who would dispense with the hearing of a sermon, though it dwell upon the most unpalatable truths, which can be rendered neither less repugnant nor more attractive by the talents of the preacher, or with being present at the service that immediately follows, if some friend proposed it to them. The reason of this is to be found in the dread of making a parade of irreligion. Every one appears collected during the sermon—pious during the service. People listen, keep their eyes on their book, join in the hymn, kneel with the congregation, put their head in their hands, and appear quite absorbed in pious thoughts; no one complains, on leaving church, of the length of the service. For the profane, nevertheless, there is no compensation to be found in the common place eloquence of the preacher, nor in the harmony of a choir of children of twelve years of age, mingled with the sharp voices of men of fifty, the whole accompanied by the favourite instrument of England—an organ. The English behave themselves decorously in church; they demean themselves as they ought in the house of God. They may be either ennuyé or impatient while there; that is very possible; but at least they do not show that they are so. Would it be thus, if the religious principle were not deeply rooted in the national mind?

Every thing, therefore, belies that character of irreligion which it has been sought to affix to the English nation. In a country in which so many churches are built and supported—where the excessive endowment of the clergy has only excited murmurs since the question has been made a political one—where religion is never turned into ridicule—where the dogmas of religion are never discussed but with respect—where religion is made to enter as much into the acts of government as into the habits of private life—where people fast on the occasion of a public calamity,—in such a country there is really a religious spirit as well as a religion; mean hypocrisy, a calculating vice, profitable, at most, to individuals only, cannot be laid to the charge of a whole nation.

EMIGRATION.

If facts were needed to convince one of the misery of the mass of the population in England, they would be afforded by referring to the statistical accounts of the numbers which emigrate every year from the British shores. Many thousands of the population are thus carried off. This emigration is the more prejudicial, inasmuch as it takes place on principles opposed to those which should govern colonisation. An over-peopled country generally sends such of her inhabitants as want of work, or a turbulent disposition, renders dangerous members of society, to some of her possessions beyond the seas: thus, colonies of great utility to the mother country are created, not only by the employment which they give to unoccupied hands, but also by the springing up of a commercial intercourse, which opens an outlet to the agricultural and manufacturing produce of the mother country. Such colonisation is but a removal, which occasions a better distribution of a people. At present nothing of this kind takes place.

Most of the emigrants direct their steps towards the United States, and it is to her own, not to England's profit, that America peoples herself. It is not the most indigent class that is tormented with the desire to fly the natal soil—not the mechanics, whom the increase and improvement of machinery draws away; nor the day labourer whom the destruction of the cottage system leaves wholly without support, who go to another land in search of the means of subsistence which are denied them at home. No; the emigrants are families threatened with a misery which has not yet overtaken them; they are laborious and long-sighted citizens, who fly from a future charged with evils which their forethought has palpably shadowed out, and from whose influence not even their industry or love of labour could preserve them. The class which thus carries to a foreign soil, to a hostile, or at least a rival country, those "thews and sinews" which, at home, would soon fail to support them, is a class to which it should be the endeavour of an enlightened government to raise the poorer classes, but which ceases to produce and to consume for England, and whose emigration renders the lot of the remaining population still more miserable.

These families export not alone that physical force which their hands supply, but small capitals in money, which a wise foresight had stored 'up for their establishment in distant lands: they carry with them to the land of their adoption an industry superfluous in their own country, but which, employed with advantage on another soil, develops itself rapidly, and which in its consequence will free the country of their adoption of the tribute paid to the country of their birth.

A systematic emigration is doing for England that which the revocation of the edict of Nantes did for France. A drain of thirty thousand individuals who annually leave the shores of England, occasions a void in the social organisation, which the increase of another class of people cannot fill up. Useful citizens depart; they are replaced by dangerous subjects. The fields no longer swarm with husbandmen, there is no labour for them: these are banished by a system of concentration, which creates, out of half a dozen farms, one unwieldy one. The towns thus become superabundantly filled with a set of miserable wretches, who, born in indigence and brought up in poverty, contract at their birth, and develop as they grow older, habits of turbulence and disorder, the only legacy they receive from the degraded beings who gave them birth. Should this class spread itself over the country, it would only bring with it the burden of its vices, but nothing of that spirit of order, the distinguishing characteristic of those who emigrate.

The end which some philanthropic individuals proposed to themselves has not yet been attained by the English system of emigration; for, instead of weeding their native soil of a worthless and degraded population, they have afforded still greater facilities to the departure of those best calculated, by their manners and conduct, to give an example to the remaining population; and, nevertheless, it would have been easier to find employment for this latter class than for the others. All the land in England which is capable of culture is not cultivated; the introduction of a better system of cultivation would give employment to a number of hands; instead, therefore, of seeking for emigrants among the agricultural labourers and small farmers, the English government should have afforded facilities of removal to the already too numerous and unemployed mechanics, who can neither obtain employment for themselves, and have still less chance of obtaining it for the generations which are growing up about them. These are the men who should be induced, at any price, to people the wilds of America and the banks of the Swan river. Separated from the parent state by a wide extent of ocean—removed by an imperious necessity to another hemisphere, they would no longer find excitement for their turbulent spirit; and the factions which trouble the repose of their native land, and menace its tranquillity, would lose, in such men, powerful auxiliaries. These reflections, which might be indefinitely extended, seem worthy of fixing the attention of statesmen and philosophers—of those who are engaged in the government and interested in the happiness of the people.

THE POOR.

Poverty wears a different form in England than in other countries, but it is accompanied by adjuncts which render it more overwhelming for those who suffer, and more afflicting for those who observe those sufferings, than in any other part of Europe. Subject to a methodical order, the succour destined for the English poor is tardy in passing from the hands which distribute to those open to receive it. A spirit of charity is more needed in England in the distribution of the rates, than a spirit of philanthropy. In many of the parishes, the poor are the objects of a singular speculation. For the receipt of a much larger sum than would suffice for an intelligent and well directed charity, a sort of contractor or overseer undertakes, if not to provide for the wants, at least to stop the complaints of the indigent. It is of little moment whether they are properly relieved, provided they are kept from complaining; and the poor are obliged to submit to this discipline, lest they should find a redoubled severity and harshness on the part of the speculator, into whose hands the relief of their condition has fallen by contract, with little hope of adequate redress from the neighbouring magistrate, to whom they might prefer their complaints. In those parts of England where the poor rates are administered without the aid of a contractor, they are very much diminished in amount, as well as in efficacy, by the deductions in the form of salaries to parish officers, as well as by the inherent vice of their distribution. Idleness is relieved in as great a degree as industry, and simple distress in the same manner as complete destitution. An enquiry is made as to how many individuals compose the family, and the money is thrown to them, without ascertaining whether there is one of the number who can contribute to his own subsistence and to that of his parents. It is not considered a matter of reproach, that a tradesman should cause the name of his infirm father to be placed on the list of those relieved by the parish, when he himself has the means of supporting him. Hence it follows, that double the number relieved in any other country are supported by the English parishes. In France, the proportion of those to whom continued or temporary support is necessary, is as one to fifteen in the country, and as one to ten in the towns. In England, the proportion in the country is as one to nine, and as one to six in the towns. In France, the yearly cost of a pauper's subsistence amounts to twenty-four francs.* In England it amounts to one hundred francs, or four pounds sterling. In France, an assessment of one franc fifty centimes on each individual not participating in the relief, would suffice for the maintenance of the poor. In England, this assessment would amount to twelve francs or ten shillings a head. Nevertheless, the condition of the poor is not so wretched in the country in which the smaller sum is given, as in that in which the larger sum is levied. Poverty is less intolerable in France than in England, because it is clothed in a peculiar livery, distributed by those who have a care of the poor; this dress, moreover, is always kept in repair by the authorities, and presents nothing revolting to the eye. In England, on the contrary, poverty traverses the streets in silken rags. The rents of an old Indian shawl disclose a nakedness which the garment was destined to conceal; and the ermine formerly appended to an elegant pelisse, is now trailed through the mud by an unfortunate creature without shoes or stockings, supporting on her shrivelled arm a child which sucks her skinny breast, whilst with the other hand she holds out to the passenger a bundle of matches, which she feigns to offer in exchange for alms. This is one of the means adopted to evade the letter of the laws enacted against mendicity, the pauper thus placing herself under the protection of those which encourage trade. This contrast of a clothing, once worn by opulence, and now borne on the backs of those in the last degree of lowliness and misery, causes afflicting thoughts and melancholy reflections to spring up in the mind.

Poverty is rendered more overwhelming in England, in consequence of the privations superinduced by the excessive price of certain objects which in other countries are within the means of the most limited fortune. The poor man finds it impossible to supply himself with meat, beer, and coals, too happy if the wages obtained for his labour, and the relief received from the parish to supply the insufficiency of those wages, furnish him wherewith to buy bread for himself and potatoes for his family. As to commodious habitations, as for that which may be called the "comfortable" in a state of misery, it is no where to be found in England; neither in the cabin of the country labourer, nor in the cellars or garrets of the towns, where families who, perhaps, have never seen each other before, herd together for a night, mingling their nakedness and tears, or, what is still more probable, their imprecations and menaces against their more fortunate fellow creatures.

Excessive misery sometimes compels a family to seek in another parish those means of industry and existence which are denied it by its own. But they meet with immediate repulse—the sojourn of a single day is not allowed, nor are the wretches permitted to take the necessary repose. Back they must go to those privations from which they had in vain attempted to escape, and return to those sufferings which Providence, in creating and uniting society, seems to have pronounced against them. Thus rich and happy England—England of the 19th century—has, like, Albion of the feudal times, her slavery, and her serfs attached to the glebe, with barely an uncertain prospect of tardy enfranchisement.

The sum levied for the relief of the poor exceeds the enormous amount of eight millions of pounds sterling. As this weight falls only on landed property,* it becomes an overwhelming burthen on the soil. Yet no efforts have been made to diminish the amount of the rates, by a more economical and more rational distribution of them.

Notwithstanding the immense expenditure for the poor, mendicity is not wholly extinguished. It is less remarkable than in other countries; but it nevertheless exists every where and among all ages. Upon the frequented roads in the country, as well as in London, one meets with robust paupers, seeking to excite pity by the display of their misery or their infirmities; asking charity either in dull and monotonous tones, or in a sharp and loud treble; they also busy themselves in sweeping the crossings; and exhibit an importunity, which, as it is perhaps to them the easiest, so it is the most successful talent.

Country paupers are generally employed in the making or repairing of roads. The condition of this class of poor would be greatly improved if some portion of the waste lands of each parish were delivered over to their industrious cultivation.

It cannot be contested that the very considerable sum which is devoted in England to the support of the poor, and to the extinction of mendicity, does not produce the desired effect; whilst in France, at a less expense, and with a less methodical system, more good is effected, and in a better manner than in England.

THE ENGLISH CANAILLE.

The lower classes in England are distinguished by a grossness of manners which places them lower in the social scale than any other nation. They are at once ferocious and depraved; their instincts dispose them to a state of permanent aggression against the rest of society. When there are no more direct means of offence, the English canaille insult the street passengers, knock against and dispute the wall with them. Their dress is disgustingly filthy, their language vile, their gait heavy and awkward. Their domestic manners are in keeping with those they display in the streets. Among this class, the husband exercises his superiority by blows, and the wife hers in the education of her children. The conduct of both is often followed by the most disastrous results. The daily newspapers teem with details of domestic murders arising from unbridled violence, and unmitigated in their atrocity by a tardy repentance.

No efforts are made, by the inculcation of the principles or the exterior practices of religion, to correct the vicious inclinations of the people. The only education which they receive is the elements of reading and writing. The effect produced by such a training is to make sharpers and robbers of those who, without it, would be stupefied by misery and debauch.

The lower classes rarely enjoy pleasure; their games prove that they know not how to amuse themselves. Their dances are monotonous, and last until the dancers fall down exhausted with fatigue. They drink to inebriety; they eat even to gluttony, without taste, without order, in a word, to excess. What is called love among them completes the measure of their brutality.

Taken collectively, the populace of England is remarkable for its cowardice. Its turbulent disposition, which it is always prompt to manifest, is easily suppressed by the staff, often by the presence, of a few policemen. The character of individuals must be studied, in order to find among them some indications of courage. The fights in which the lower classes indulge prove that they are capable of violent anger, have a strong tendency to revenge, great contempt for the consequences of the struggle in which they engage, and much generosity during the progress of the combat. Behold two porters preparing to box: they strip in silence, hand their clothes to the spectators, tuck up the sleeves of their shirts, place themselves at two paces from each other, and exhibit a menacing attitude, but a cool and collected demeanour. Blows are quickly given and parried; they are exchanged with a rapidity which in no degree diminishes their force, and rarely, when they tell, do they fail to knock down the most vigorous. When one of the parties is down, his adversary can no longer strike him. The fight is suspended, the conqueror assumes his place and his attitude, whilst, raised from the ground, with his head reposing on the knee of a spectator, the apparently vanquished is encouraged by his friends, and by the stimulus of a glass of porter. The watches of the timekeeper and of the anxious spectators indicate the moment assigned by the laws of the ring for the recommencement of hostilities. This time expired, the battle recommences, and is pursued until the weakness caused by the effusion of blood, as well as by the violence of the blows, and by a total prostration of force, determines the defeat, and puts an end to the combat.

The phlegmatic indifference so remarkable during the preparations for battle, is not affected by the struggle just terminated. Each of the parties leisurely washes his face, and officious by-standers proceed to stanch the wounds of their favourites. The combatants at length put on their clothes and return home, after having wastefully expended in this ignoble boxing match ten times more courage than well-bred duellists have need of to cross their swords, or to exchange shots which never harm them.

Less removed beyond the pale of their immediate superiors, the agricultural population occupies a less abject position in the social scale than the inhabitants of towns. The country population is less idle and more looked after; its existence is less precarious; it receives more religious instruction; it sees fewer examples and incentives to vice; it is distinguished by more domestic virtues, and a greater respect for rank. Accordingly, crime is less prevalent in the country districts than in the towns. The populace, or canaille, of England have made no approach to the body of people immediately placed above them. The lowest class of tradesmen is no longer amalgamated with this canaille. The very humblest amongst them is distinguished from this mob by marked habits of order and propriety. These qualities improve in exact proportion with the improvement in their condition: nevertheless, this progress has in no degree disturbed the various shades which distinguish ranks and conditions, and assign to each person his place in the social hierarchy.

HOSPITALS.

The institution, support, and management of hospitals are differently regulated in England from such establishments in other countries. Government takes no part in their administration. Hospitals in general owe their existence to the generosity of individuals, or the liberality of private associations. They have commonly a special destination, either as respects the class of poor admitted within their walls, or the class of complaints to the cure of which they are devoted. Philanthropy in England is ever on the watch that compassion be not extended beyond proper limits. Hence each hospital has its rules and registers. It is, therefore, with extreme difficulty that an unfortunate stranger, overtaken by illness, at a distance from his native land, or the victim of a sudden accident, happening to him out of his parish—it is with difficulty, I say, that such an unfortunate being finds in these asylums, reserved to the mitigation of certain specified evils, the kind of help which his peculiar case demands. Carried from hospital to hospital, the patient, if he obtains admission at any, owes his good fortune to the kind offices of some one affected by his misfortune. Protestant benevolence does not, like catholic charity, keep an open table; she does not, like the latter, throw open the doors of her charitable establishments to all maladies alike, without enquiring what they are, or whence they originated. No—she proceeds with order, with caution, without being carried away by indiscreet pity. So much the worse for sufferers who are not ill according to these combinations; for if they present themselves at one establishment of this nature to get cured, they are told that such diseases are not treated here, and that they must go to another.

Each English hospital has its peculiar regulations, varying often according to the opinions and caprices of the founders, the varieties of which may be imagined from the fact that a right is acquired in the deliberations, by the share which has been contributed to the funds necessary for the support of the establishment. Some of them are supported by ample endowments, many others by voluntary contributions, generally abundant, but often misapplied. It would be curious to institute a comparison between the hospitals of England and France, and to see the results obtained in both countries,—in the one by the system of philanthropy, in the other by the routine of charity.

I am far from blaming the whole system of English hospitals, or refusing praise to what I have observed deserving of it. The attentions bestowed on the sick are unremitting; there is great attention paid to cleanliness; the regimen is good; but there prevail, nevertheless, a coldness, a methodical system, a repugnance, a want of consolation, which are truly afflicting to the beholder. It is easy to perceive that religion has not entered their gates.

What does the so much vaunted Bedlam present—what the greater part of the establishments for diseases of the mind? Prisons more or less spacious, in which the unfortunate inmates to whom freedom is denied, are governed with a greater or less degree of severity. A uniform treatment is applied to all mental diseases, no matter how different in origin and progress. With few exceptions, recourse is not had to that moral treatment appropriate to the origin and various symptoms of each malady: families and society are deprived of a being who tormented them; he is transferred to a sort of provisional tomb, until the real one opens to receive him. It rarely happens that the patient escapes this anticipatory death, for the treatment he undergoes is little calculated to restore his reason.

It is different in France. Mad-houses, in that country, (and these are the best kept of all our hospitals) are confided to pious women, who consecrate all that nature has bestowed on them of strength and sensibility—all that the hope of another life suggests to them of perseverance, and all that religion has imposed on them is the name of duty, to the service of the unfortunate leaved. Night and day they remain by the side of the patients, humouring the capricious irregularity of their tempers, studying the character of their disease, seeking to discover the point in which they are accessible to reason, meditating on the means to restore them to their senses, and keeping out of view all that can tend to the irritation of those faculties which are out of order, and the seat of their complaint. Often do these admirable women attain their object, and this is certainly the sweetest recompense which this world can afford them.

As I one day walked through one of those asylums devoted to the treatment of mental diseases, I was in the act of passing a room, when I heard proceeding from within the screams of a maniac; and presently after the sounds of a gentle voice speaking the language of consolation. I questioned the nun who accompanied me as to the cause of this strange contrast. You shall see, said she, and opening a wicket out of the door, she pointed out to me a woman in a paroxysm of fury, and close to her a young person of an angelic form. These were the only actors in this sad scene.

"That poor woman (said the superior to me) was brought to us yesterday in the state in which you now see her. According to our custom, we have placed near her one of our community, whose business it is to catch any glimmering of that reason which has not wholly deserted the patient. An intercourse of some days will lay all open to her. Until she shall have attained this knowledge, our sister must remain shut up with the patient." "But she runs some danger," said I; "the patient is in a paroxysm of fury." "But we are always on the spot," said my conductor; "and moreover, is no risk to be run for a suffering fellow-creature?"

Some little time afterwards I visited anew this house of grief and pity. On this occasion I was accompanied by the young nun, whom I had seen shut up with the poor demented creature of whom I have spoken. A woman who was walking in the garden, and who appeared to amuse herself in the cultivation of flowers, ran towards us. She was well dressed; yet a certain disordered air was apparent in her demeanour, in her manner, and still more in her discourse. She embraced the nun, and commenced an incoherent conversation; the good sister took her hand, looked steadfastly at her, and prevailed upon her to be silent. The conversation was soon resumed, and proved to me that all hope of recovery was not lost. "You now see," said the worthy nun, dismissing the patient, "the unfortunate being with whom you saw me on the occasion of your first visit. She obeys, and understands me, because she has become attached to me. The glimmering of reason which you have remarked is only restored to her in my presence, and even now I should be careful not to fatigue her weak intellects. In a little time she will be to the whole convent what she is to me, and I do not despair that at a later moment she may converse with every body, and be restored to her family.

This system is pursued towards all the unhappy patients confided to the care of these pious women. All do not recover their reason, but all are brought to a state of calm which moderates their sufferings, and enables them to await their recovery with comparative relief from pain.

Vainly would such a system be sought in the English hospitals. The consolations of religion are not there held out with the same discreet zeal as in the French hospitals. In England, the ministers of religion alone distribute this comfort. With us no sister of charity approaches the bed of the patient without dwelling upon all that can interest him in this world and in the next. Often, I know, their compassionate kindness assumes an importunate air. They knock at the door of a resisting conscience, until it opens for the introduction of that species of consolation which has supported them in their own labours. But for one sick person tormented by the excess of an indiscreet zeal how many are comforted? How many find that hope which had so long forsaken them, at the very moment when, if they had delivered themselves up to their own thoughts, they would have cast off all hope and consolation, seeing that none existed for them?

The administration of English foundling hospitals is still more defective than that of others. Viewed under a certain aspect, it may be even pronounced immoral. Though supported by the parishes, and by voluntary subscriptions, it is impossible to obtain admission for a child until the impossibility of discovering the parent is plainly demonstrated. The mother is generally the first discovered, by means of the enquiries set on foot. She is pressed and menaced by turns, till she discloses the accomplice in her crime. She often names some rich man she has never seen. This declaration made on oath is sufficient to obtain for her an indemnity, and a sum adequate to the maintenance of her infant, unless the reputed father can furnish proof (always difficult to establish) of the falsity of the accusation. The English tribunals daily pronounce judgments in matters of this nature, and verily their decisions appear grounded on a strange system of jurisprudence.

Notwithstanding the great inferiority of the English hospitals to the French in point of organisation, one cannot be unmindful of the immense advantages they procure for suffering humanity. But in looking to the sums devoted to the support of these institutions, as well as of the poor, one cannot but admit that much more desirable results might be obtained.

PRISONS.

The English, who are much inclined to ostentation, above all in matters relating to humanity, have not failed to display it in the arrangement of their prisons. Here again they exhibit the systematic spirit which is peculiar to them in practising essays of benevolence at the expense of the unfortunate beings who crowd their prisons. Occupation and weariness (ennui) appear to be the bases of their system, the combinations of which tend to this double object. They proceed in this manner.

The new prisons are in general large and well arranged, as respects the buildings, but inconmodious as respects the exercise-ground. They consist of a rotunda, around which are ranged rooms for the habitation of the prisoners. The interval between these buildings forms triangular courts. The ground-floor of the rotunda is appropriated to the keepers of the prison. On the first floor there is a chapel, in which the corridors of each division meet. Those imprisoned in these divisions are separated by partitions. They cannot communicate with, nor even see each other.

The ground-floor forms the workshop. The other stories are distributed into rooms with several beds and cells. The openings in the walls and doors render the prisoners subject to the constant inspection of the jailers. The court-yards (a part of which is sheltered by roofs) are rather workshops than places of exercise. They are paved, and are watered by fountains.

The prisoners inhabit dormitories, where they sleep to the number of twelve to fifteen, or smaller chambers, furnished with three or four beds, or cells, where they are isolated. In all, they lie on camp-beds, or on small iron bedsteads, covered with paillasse in white, frequently washed, and one or two blankets. During the day, the bed furniture is raised in a uniform manner. The boards and irons of the bed are kept clean by being rubbed every morning. The partitions of the walls, the slabs of the chambers and corridors, and the stair steps, are whitewashed. All is distinguished by great neatness, which is perceptible in the most minute details.

English prisons are remarkably free from the bad smells which add so much to the insalubrity of the French prisons. This is owing to the excellent supply and distribution of the water. The inmates of prisons are subject to almost continual labour. In some cases, this labour is productive; in others, it is not. Every where it has a peculiar character, an overwhelming monotony well calculated to drown thought. The men are employed in putting machines in motion, which are kept out of sight. They therefore reason neither on the cause nor the effect. They work with their feet, their faces turned towards the wall. Having laid their hands on a horizontal bar, they place their feet upon a plank which yields to their weight, and is replaced by another plank. No song relieves the monotony of this fatiguing exercise, the duration of which, determined by a certain number of revolutions of the wheel, is calculated to give a result of twelve thousand steps a day.*

Neither hilarity nor conversation is allowed. The mere act of turning round to look behind is forbidden. During the period of relaxation from labour, the prisoners are marched round the court-yard four abreast. The measured fall of their feet is the only sound which breaks the general silence.

At each extremity of the court-yard is a post furnished with iron rings, through which are passed the arms of those destined to receive corporal punishment. This is inflicted by one of the keepers with a cat-o'-nine-tails, composed of nine leather thongs, upon an order from the council of the prison, in punishment of the infraction of internal discipline. Punishment of this kind is likewise inflicted either weekly, or at their entrance or departure, on children convicted of theft.

Women are subject to the same rules and regulations, and to the same labour as men, due regard being had to the relative difference in their physical strength.

The prison diet is composed of vegetable soup, boiled meat, cheese and bread. It is good and sufficiently abundant. Spirituous and fermented liquors are rigorously forbidden.

The prison dress for men consists of a shirt, trowsers, waistcoat, a jacket, shoes, and stockings. That of the women, composed of two petticoats, a sort of under waistcoat or bed-gown, and linen bonnet, is ill assorted, and far from contributing to their good appearance. These dresses are of woollen stuff in winter and linen in summer.†

The moral results anticipated by English economists, appear not to have been attained by the modifications introduced into the penitentiary system. The number of crimes and punishments, far from diminishing, appear to increase each year in a fearful progression. They are incomparably more numerous than in France. The proportion of old offenders brought up again for judgment is also much greater. The effects of instruction lavished upon prisoners are neutralised by the dogmatic form of that instruction, and by the state of mental abasement to which the jail discipline reduces the inmates.

On comparing the situation of the convicts, with the so highly vaunted results of the discipline to which they are subjected, it may be doubted whether society, and the members whom she has cast from her bosom, have gained much by these so called ameliorations. I should be tempted to answer in the negative, and the result of my enquiries into the English prison system, would be to confine my praise to that part of it which is productive of the order and neatness every where prevalent. As for the rest, they are but the expensive dreams of minds thirsting for innovations, no matter from what quarter they come, or on what subject, provided only they be novelties. I do not hesitate to declare that the administration of prisons in France, promoted as it is by the superintendence of the directing councils, the care and attention of charitable associations, and the instruction of the chaplains, is milder for the criminal, more advantageous to society, and much more economical than the system pursued in English prisons.

* Each step may be estimated at one and a half foot; therefore the daily walk of each individual may be three miles and three quarters. This would be only a moderate exercise calculated to preserve health, if the mode of movement did not considerably add to the fatigue by the muscular force which the prisoner is obliged to add to his weight, and the exercise forced upon him of feigning to ascend a staircase. There results from these efforts a general lassitude, which extends from the limbs to the lungs, and occasions great pain to them.

† The expense of prisons is incomparably greater in England than in France. In the Penitentiary it amounts to 55*l.* or 1400 francs a head; in the other prisons, to 38*l.* or 950 francs a head. In France this expense is 450 francs for Paris, and 350 francs for the departments.

CHURCH YARDS.

The English government has certainly nothing to boast of in the system of its administrative police: placed by law under the control of local corporations, this force shares the caprices, the interests, nay, even the passions of the bodies on whom they depend. One of the most frequent complaints of foreigners is directed against the English custom of converting the small open space about the churches into cemeteries. In the London church-yards, the dead are heaped up without the least regard to the disproportion between the number of corpses and the small spot of earth reserved for them. Nor is this all: graves are opened long before the bodies are decomposed, for the purpose of letting down fresh coffins; and an infected miasma escapes from them. As though this disgusting custom were not sufficiently dangerous, the English bury their dead even within the precincts of their churches, thus converting them into charnel-houses.

It does not appear that the government has given any attention to this subject; for cemeteries grow up in and around churches, which in England appear to increase in number, in a direct proportion to the religious indifference of other countries.

The custom of burying the dead in the midst of a dense population, appears to arraign the judgment rather than sensibility of the living. No one's health suffers from it; for those epidemics which in France perpetually threaten to devour the whole population, and are only averted because an enlightened police is careful to remove the germ of contagion, have no terrors for an English population: nothing indicates a painful sensibility caused by the presence of death, on the English side of the Straits; neither the funerals constantly passing through the streets, nor the melancholy activity of the church-yards, where the remains of the dead cannot find the rest necessary to decomposition, produce any permanent impression on the English mind.

England is, perhaps, the only civilised country in which the tomb affords no protection to the remains of the dead. Wretches, known under the name of resurrectionists, snatch from their parent earth recently buried bodies, and make them the object of a horrible traffic, by selling them for purposes of dissection to theatres of anatomy, which have no other means of providing themselves: the tears of a desolate family are therefore, owing to the practices of the resurrectionists, often shed over an empty coffin.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

Immensity, universality, are the only expressions which can characterise the commercial greatness of Britain. There is not a port or creek in the world into which her vessels do not penetrate. All the national and manufactured productions are, to the English, a means of barter. No amount of expense deadens the activity of the speculator, nor does any extent of danger appal the navigator. Both the one and the other are carried away by a thirst of gain, dignified by a kind of national glory which attaches to it. Patriotism insinuates itself even into the passion for acquiring riches, and throws an honourable veil over proceedings which honour would frequently disavow. An unheard-of state of prosperity is the result of the combination of these two powerful guiding principles. To represent and add to this prosperity, a fictitious paper money has been created, in default of an adequate monetary currency. A national bank, whose immense operations extend over England—private banks destined for the supply of local wants—a national debt offering employment to capital which might not otherwise be employed; establishments in all seas—merchants in the character of sovereigns—for colonies, dominions more populous than the parent state—for outlets to commerce, other states placed by treaty in an absolute dependence on Great Britain,—in a word, an industry which not only anticipates so many wants, but also over-supplies them—these are the general bases on which the operations of English commerce are found to repose.

Having the power to dictate the law to the rest of the commercial world, England has wantonly abused her omnipotence, and thereby stimulated the self-love as well as the interests of all other nations. Means have every where been sought to escape a dominion and ascendancy which have become past endurance. Rivals have started up, favoured by national jealousies and the policy of governments. The effect of this competition, imperceptible at first, was after a time most serious in its immediate results, and still more menacing in its ulterior consequences. English commerce has now ceased to be indispensable, nations having learned to do without it. Its place is already sought to be supplied by native industry and enterprise, and in a few years success will crown these efforts. The resources of countries are now becoming tributary to their wants. In many points, and for a variety of objects, this end has been already attained. It has become for foreign nations a question of self-love, and a principle of political economy as well as a necessity. Every thing tends towards a complete revolution in the commercial system of the world. Each step made in this onward career will throw England back. She already manifests many symptoms of decay. Her American colonies are forced, by the excess of their sufferings, to turn towards the United States, with which they have more affinity of interests and affections, as well as an easier and prompter intercourse. The East Indies no longer present a field for the profitable outlay of capital. The consciousness of their own strength may one day induce these colonies to separate from a mother country which only protects them within the limit, and according to the conformity of her own interests with theirs. In the event of a war, which sooner or later must take place, this sentiment would develop itself with greater force, more particularly if Russia, whose boundaries are not far removed from the frontiers of the English dominions in Asia, should threaten to force her way, and offer her support to a neighbouring and ill-disposed people.* What would England then do with those commercial settlements, factories, and fortresses, which she has planted around the globe in the track of her thousand vessels? Would she then find outlets for her commerce? Outlets enough she would find for her money in the expensive keep and repair of these establishments, but not for the produce created by her industry, without any enquiry as to whether consumers could be found for it.

English commerce is, in its present state, one of the most astonishing miracles of a civilisation arrived at the highest point which it can attain. Her establishments by sea and land, the importance and activity of her transactions, the number of arms she employs, the circulation she gives to capital, the discoveries she originates in every branch of human knowledge, her achievements, in fine, in every thing she has undertaken, have no parallel in past or present times. And even though she should be reduced to less gigantic proportions, the recollection of what she was will dwell in the memory of nations, and her efforts and successes will be ranged among the most powerful levers which have ever been wielded to create a revolution in the ideas and in the actual position of society.

English industry is on a par with her commerce. In no other country has industry been so developed: in none has it attained an equal degree of prosperity. No where is it more economical in the employment of its means—more adroit in its contrivances—happier in its results. There is not a want, not a caprice for which it has not ever-ready resources. It bends to every thing, and adapts itself to every thing, but has unfortunately proved too eager to substitute machinery for hand-labour. Thus while the nation is enriched, whole classes are impoverished, and individuals are deprived by thousands of the means of subsistence. In the midst of all this manufacturing pre-eminence created by machinery, whole families die of hunger, and fall to the charge, not of the manufacturer, who turns to his own profit the greater part of the sum economised by the extinction of their labour, but of the community at large, which does not, like the manufacturer, reap any advantage from the sufferings entailed by the adoption of machinery.

* This is a common opinion entertained by foreigners, yet it is a most fallacious one. The sway of the English dominions in India is mild and gentle, and the people are contented with their governors and government. In comparing their lot with the subjects of native princes, they are enlightened enough to perceive that the advantage is all on their side. As to invasion of India by Russia, the idea is chimerical. It would be easier for Russia to march to London than to advance one-eighth of the way towards the nearest of our presidencies. But should they attempt this, (which they never will in our day,) they will be met and repulsed by as brave and disciplined a force as any in the world—no mean the native Anglo-Indian army.—Translator.

English industry is proud of its success, and claims great credit to itself for the low prices at which it disposes of its produce. It must be admitted that, in appearance, prices are not so high as they formerly were, but they would cease to appear reasonable if augmented as they ought to be, by the addition of the sum which the consumer is obliged to pay for the support of those whose labour has become valueless, owing to the introduction of machinery. The reduction in the price of manufactured articles is, therefore, only felt by foreigners, who pay less, inasmuch as they are not called upon to support those living beings who have ceased to be put in motion, and have, accordingly, been thrown out of bread.

Laying this consideration aside, one cannot too much laud the prodigies of English industry. Its most extraordinary creations, admirable though these may be, are not its productions, but the means employed in bringing them forth; the simplicity, and at the same time the power of the processes which create our wonder. When one contemplates the ingenious, one might say the intelligent mechanism of the machineries, to which is transferred all the dexterity that Providence has conferred on the fingers of man, and all the strength of his muscles, without any of that inaptitude or indisposition to labour, by which human beings are fettered, or any of that false judgment inseparable from man's imperfect faculties, one is lost in admiration at that tendency, to one and the same end, of interests apparently dissimilar, at that combination of capital and talents unknown in the ancient world, and irrealisable in modern times.

The spirit of association or partnership introduces itself more in England than in any other country. It is as apparent in the domestic arrangement of families, as in the details of the public service. It governs every thing; the public interest as well as the private. It makes conquests, covers with colonies an immense extent of the Asiatic coasts. It protects its acquired territories by large armies. It treats the native sovereigns as tributary. It has its fleets, its troops, its laws, its caprices; in a word, all the attributes of supreme power. It has its establishments, its ports, its basins, its arsenals, in Europe. It combats and overcomes the rivalry which individual interest would oppose to it. It enters into politics. It refuses or grants to the government the pecuniary means to execute its projects. It is the right arm of commerce and industry. It exercises over the one and the other, and by the means of both, an equal influence. But the good which it produces is confined to the surface of society, and enters but slowly and imperfectly into its details. Arrogant in its proud career, it is regardless of the misery which it creates, and disdainfully overlooks it where its speculations are not interested in its removal. If it prepares a splendid harvest for future kingdoms and generations, it is almost always at the expense of individuals and of the existing race.

Every thing in England, from the by-path leading to a small village to the docks which admit the vessels of all nations, from the lighting of the streets to the building of towns, is the result of this spirit of association.

It will readily be imagined that in the distribution of its favours, commercial industry, of whatever nature may be its pursuits, is not forgotten. All enterprises are undertaken by shares. The eagerness for profits induces people to become shareholders. The chances of loss are overlooked; the probabilities of gain dazzle and blind the public, too often leading them thus astray, but still setting the enterprise in motion. The first shareholders suffer; others follow, who, profiting by an experience which has cost them nothing, and regardless of the imprudent advances of their predecessors, produce and sell at a cheaper rate.

There is a rock which causes many commercial shipwrecks; it is the excess of production. The English cannot follow the example set by the Dutch, in regard to their spice colonies. They cannot limit the number and produce of their machinery, as the latter did those of their spice-trees. Production increases in a greater ratio than consumption. This plethora causes frequent and terrible catastrophes. But these are useless warnings, lessons lost upon those who blindly follow the road they have chalked out.

English commerce and manufactures are, therefore, threatened, though from different causes, with important modifications. Both have long had the whole globe as a theatre for their united operations. The world was for them a vast colony, over which they exercised an absolute monopoly. But other people have learned to produce and to manufacture, and have insisted upon paying, not in specie, but by an interchange of commodities. At the present day, they only receive from abroad that with which their own country cannot supply them. These imports are, moreover, reduced to objects of indispensable necessity. Hence, English labour will, for the future, be forced to limit itself to the supply of the parent country and of its colonies, a consumption which, notwithstanding its extent, cannot absorb an unlimited production. This disproportion between the present and former demands is already a source of heavy calamity for Great Britain.

English commerce and industry are admirable in their proportions and in their results; but if a stranger wishes to see them in their greatest development, he has no time to lose in instituting his enquiries; for they may not long remain what they formerly were.

SYSTEM OF MANUFACTURES.

Much clamour has been raised within the last twenty years against the feudal system—a system which has been abolished for three centuries. Frightful pictures have been drawn of its power, and of the abuse of that power towards kings, people, and individuals. One would imagine that in France the chateaux of the middle ages had risen up again, with their towers, their great fortifications, their executions, and above all, their dungeons. People fancied they perceived behind their portcullises, knights barbed with iron, ready to take the road, robbing travellers, knocking down the peasant, and carrying off their wives and daughters. Every one trembled, every one became exasperated at the mere apprehension of such an order of things, the return of which, nevertheless, appeared to be surrounded here and there by a few obstacles sufficiently calculated to banish such idle fears.

But though the world exhibited so much disgust at the approach of these unreal dangers, none appeared alarmed at the existence of a feudal system of a different character, which enslaves thousands of individuals, condemns them to incessant toil, lays hold of women and children, exposes them to all sorts of demoralisation, requires of them services not only disproportioned to their strength, but to the wretched salary granted to them; deprives them of all education, and exercising supreme control over their lives and limbs, devotes them to endless privations, contrary to all laws, to all government, to all well-defined rights of property.

This feudality is the manufacturing power. In the looms are the workshops, where thousands of unfortunate beings find a precocious death, long preceded by diseases and infirmities, which are owing to the mephitic air they breathe, and to the excessive labour and ill-treatment they undergo. The barons are the manufacturers, who, to gratify their cupidity, make themselves dependent upon them to the most oppressive and most deplorable slavery.

What was the corvée to the peasantry of the middle ages, compared with the toil exacted from the labourers of the present day? This labour, it is said, enables the people to live. No doubt it does; but in like manner, the corvée of our old barons enabled their vassals to live also. The latter too, avowing their tyranny, did not affect to feel, for the victims of their despotism, that boastful humanity which falsely pretends to sacrifice itself for the happiness of the oppressed.

These reflections have been suggested to me by an authentic enquiry into the internal arrangements of the English factories, in regard to those children whose poverty obliges them to seek therein a precarious mode of existence.

Their hard lot has awakened the sensibility of many philanthropists, who, after having addressed their complaints, in vain, to the heads of these establishments, have at length laid them before the house of commons. An enquiry was ordered, and the following is the result of it.

From the age of eight years, children are capable of certain labour in factories, more especially in those establishments where cotton-spinning is carried on. They are subjected to a constant labour of from eight to twelve hours, which is resumed after an interruption of two or three, and so continued daily during the week.

In consequence of insufficient rest, sleep becomes so imperious a want, that it overtakes the poor children in the midst of their labour. In order to keep them awake, they are beaten with cords, with whips, often with sticks, upon the back, and even the head. Many of them were brought before the commissioners charged with the enquiry, with eyes bursting from their sockets, and broken limbs, the effects of the horrible treatment which had been inflicted on them. Others were found mutilated by the play of the machines near which they were employed. It was uniformly deposed that the necessity of remaining in one habitual position (occasioned by an unvarying labour) led to accidents which had been followed by physical deformities as their natural consequence. It was also uniformly in evidence, that the fatal consequences entailed upon children from such accidents produced no pecuniary indemnity on the part of the masters, who refused to the parents the momentary relief necessary to obtain a cure. The greater part were maimed in consequence of not having the means to procure medical assistance.

The commissioners further stated, that the system of manufactures had the most pernicious influence on those engaged in such occupations; that death puts an end to the sufferings of a great number of the children before they attain a riper age; that such as are spared in this first stage of existence, bear in their livid and emaciated features the symptoms of premature decay; that their hank forms and sickly constitution alike attest the unhealthful labour imposed upon them.

Should the excess of fatigue render a suspension of labour necessary, the parish refuses to the parents the small relief requisite for the subsistence of the children, and it is only by retrenching from each member of the family some portion of their already insufficient nourishment that the father can procure for the sick child the means of recovering a portion of his strength.

The two sexes, which are not kept separated in these factories, are led astray by a corruption of morals which is much more precocious than is manifested in other walks of life, and no means are adopted to obviate or retard these effects. It does not appear that any regulations have been instituted to stop the progress of this immorality, or that the thought of applying a remedy has found a place in heads in which none but considerations of sordid interest can find admittance.

The moral and religious education of the factory children is confined to a slight instruction given on the Sun-days, during the hours stolen from that recreation and repose necessary to miserable creatures grown stupid through excess of labour, and reduced almost to the mournful feeling that they have no better existence than the machines of which they are the forced propellers.

These, however, are not the only oppressions exercised thus shamelessly, and without pity, towards this famished multitude. Political passions intervene. They whisper to those who have money, that they ought to have power also. In order to obtain it, the master manufacturers arm the unfortunate beings whose lot is in their hands. Under the threat of letting them die of hunger, they embody them into regiments, marshal them against the government, and turn them into engines of disorder and subversion. They are made to march in the name of liberty, as if political liberty could be important to him who is deprived of his personal freedom. But this is a matter of little consequence. The orders of superiors are executed by men who have as little means of understanding their spirit as they have of opposing resistance. And when they imagine they have obtained this fancied liberty, they resume those habits of wretchedness and slavery in which they vegetate; provided always that the blows received in the struggle do not incapacitate them to continue those painful toils which a barbarous avarice in order to square the wants with the wages of the labourer renders still more overwhelming and insupportable.

These very task-masters, so hard, so pitiless towards their own species, towards men born in the same land, of the same race, united by the same language, and by a common religion, these very men find tears and eloquent phrases for the West India negroes! The money they refuse to a misery on the excess of which they speculate, they lavish on a cause which affords them an opportunity of making a parade of their philanthropic sentiments, without damaging their personal interests. Their ears, deaf to the cries of the unfortunate beings kept awake by the stick of the overseer, are open to the sound produced on their imagination by the fancied cracking of the Jamaica whip.

Let us enquire whether these negroes, whose condition inspires such pity, are as wretchedly off on the colonial plantations, as the whites shut up in the filthy workshops of Manchester and Birmingham? Are the blacks made to labour twenty-eight hours out of thirty-six? Are their children snatched from them to be subjected to fatigue beyond their strength? Have they not some hours each day, and two days in the week, to give to a species of labour which is profitable to them, to a repose which refreshes them, to an idleness which indemnifies them for their excessive toil? Let the proprietors of English factories procure similar advantages for their workmen, and people may then be inclined to believe in the sincerity of their hypocritical pity for the condition of beings, whose lot is without doubt not to be envied, but whose position is not so wretched as that of the classes they oppress.

Those classes are free, it will be said. By no means; their lot differs from that of the negroes in this only, that they are not sold. The negroes are purchased outright; the whites receive a small fractional share of the capital which they create. The one are dependent on masters interested in their life and health; the others might die, unless humanity stepped in to their relief; for self-interest stifles all appeal in their favour. All are equally slaves, equally rivoted to the soil which bears them. The blacks work in the open air; the whites in a corrupted atmosphere. The one are bought in villanage, the others are let out to hire. This is the only difference which can be found between them.

The voluminous evidence of the inquiry, the facts produced, by thousands, in proof of the tyranny and oppression complained of, could not induce the reformed parliament of England to adopt those wise measures which an enlightened humanity had proposed for putting an end to so desolating a condition, without sacrificing the interests of the manufacturers. The latter carried the day; and it was decided by a majority of eleven voices, that they might still continue to crush, with toil and punishment, human beings whose very weakness should form their protection. Behold humanity such as radicalism has made her.

AGRICULTURE.

One general idea predominates in the English agricultural system. It is the suppression of small farms. This idea has its origin no less in the spirit of aristocracy with which all classes are imbued, than in considerations of economy. Large husbandry, such as it is understood and practised in England, employs almost as many hands as the smaller husbandry, but those hands are at the command of the farmers, who exercise over the individuals whom they employ, an authority which extends itself much beyond the limits which the nature of the relation between labourer and master would appear to trace out. The latter seem to assemble as many labourers as possible at a given point. Hence that perfect cultivation which might be thought incompatible with very large farming operations, but hence also the extreme misery and inconceivable servitude of the peasantry.

Man is said to be free in England! Without doubt he is so in the eye of the law, but there are circumstances and occasions, above all in the remote parts of the country, in which he is any thing but free. The poor man lives, literally speaking, attached to the glebe. The farmers combine, not to raise the rate of labour, and if the labourer wishes to escape a league so adverse to his interests, he is repulsed by all the parishes, where he attempts to seek for an asylum and labour, under the pretext that, not being able to give security that he shall not be obliged to have recourse to public charity, he cannot therefore be allowed to increase the charges which weigh upon the community. Poverty thus fixes to the soil which produces it her unfortunate victim, and he and the generations condemned to come after him, have, and shall have for the future, nothing better than an indefinite prospect of slavery and privations.

The small class of farmers has disappeared in consequence of a system to which the great proprietors have lent themselves, because it flattered their indolence. It would now be difficult to find any trace of this class in the midst of the general suffering, and in the broken remnants and wreck of its former fortunes. To recur to the system of small farms, must be a work of care, of time, and of a conviction of its utility. Meanwhile there exists the indispensable necessity to follow the system of large farms, and to submit to all its consequences.

The division of fields is a part of this system. The estate is cut up into large masses, the centre is devoted to pasturage, to which are generally applied the grounds surrounding the mansion, or residence of the squire. In other words, the grazing ground forms the park. The limits and bounds, as well as the principal divisions of the property, are marked by belts of trees, of about one hundred feet in breadth, divided length-ways by a path, which serves for the common purposes of felling and removing the timber, for exercise, and for sporting. The trees are generally of the fir and alpine species, and are planted young, and very near each other. They are guarded from the cattle by shallow ditches, on the opposite side of which are hawthorn hedges, protected by light paling. This mode of plantation, adopted, moreover, in spots not devoted to a more profitable husbandry, especially in the small ends and angles where the plough cannot penetrate, presents numerous advantages. It is economical, offers vast reserves at a small expense, affords shelter to corn and cattle against the inclemency of the seasons; serves as an asylum to game, favours the breed and renders shooting less toilsome. It cannot be sufficiently recommended, and might be very profitably introduced into France. Perhaps the substitution of seed plots would answer just as well for plantation, as the always more expensive process of obtaining young trees from nurseries.

Generally, in England (but there are nevertheless numerous exceptions,) the farms are well cultivated. It is usual to make a division of the fields every four years.

The English system does not readily lend itself to the system of permanent artificial meadows. You only see trefail and sainfoin on lands which would bear nothing else.

Farming systems infinitely vary; in truth, cultivation is carried on more by local custom than by systems; and one may say that English agriculture is the result of a reasoned and perfected routine. In employing this expression I wish to be complimentary, persuaded as I am that the English farming is a compilation of observations not digested in the mind of any one, a code resulting from an order of things existing no longer, or which has only become vicious, because the required modifications had worked too slowly. I therefore think that custom should serve as the starting point, and that by consulting her with wisdom and discernment, she will be found to offer useful rules of conduct, far preferable to those ambitious theories which in agriculture especially, eventuate in the ruin of those who insanely allow themselves to be carried into the adoption of them.

A settled routine is then, in England, the basis of the greater part of agricultural operations. People are the less disposed to abandon the ancient practice, knowing the extensive empire which it exercises over the working classes, and the inconvenience of resorting to coercion in procuring a departure from it. But in England, I repeat it, an enlightened experience is the handmaid of that routine; for the latter lends herself to ameliorations, and impresses them with the seal of her approbation. Thus the plough, in partaking of the improvements which it receives in different countries, preserves, nevertheless, its primitive form, and the adjuncts required either by the nature of the soil, or the habits of the labourer. The same observation applies to all agricultural implements.

In many provinces, and more particularly in lands adjacent to an abundant supply of game, corn is sown in trenches made with the hand, and covered over with the rake. It is insisted that the economy of the seed obtained by this process, joined to the augmented produce, compensates for the increased expense of a system which is undoubtedly advantageous in proportion to the amount of labour it procures for hands which would otherwise remain unemployed.

English agriculture is very worthy of notice in its endeavours to improve the breed of cattle. Horses, cows, and sheep, are the special object of the farmer's attention, and the basis of his speculations and profits. Each county has its peculiar breed, which is never crossed with others.

Horses are bred in meadows, in the middle of which they find shelter in open stables. Cows and oxen pass the summer in the fields, and the winter in inclosed court yards, in which they are fed with hay and turnips. Sheep are turned, the whole year round, into fields sown with turnips and trefail. They are prevented from straying away, by wickets and moveable paling or hurdles.

The custom of irrigation does not prevail, indeed it is not properly understood in English agriculture. There are few countries in which this useful practice is followed, though the abundance of water should make it obtain every where. In general, the English are either indifferent to, or they misdirect the labour that should be bestowed on natural meadows. In this branch of agriculture, one sees nothing, in England, which can bear a comparison with the practice that obtains in France.

Oxen are rarely used, and always ill-employed in agricultural labour. Six are yoked to a plough, which could be easily drawn by two. These animals are almost bred to do no service. At four years old, they are fattened, and delivered over to the knife of the butcher.

The rarity of land carriage may be ranked among the number, and indeed as one of the main causes, of English agricultural prosperity. Neither the men, nor the animals employed in cultivating the earth, participate in this branch of industry. It is not so in France. Whatever prejudice may be the result to husbandry, the hope of a profit suffices to induce the farmer to postpone the cultivation which the land requires. Hence arise delays, inconveniences, and what is worse, the loss of agricultural habits. In England, on the contrary, the husbandman is never turned from the business in hand, and the sedentary life which he leads, fosters the taste for the species of labour which agriculture requires.

The appearance of the rural habitations is the same as in France; but though the number and extent of the dependent buildings be much less in England, when compared with those of the former country, still there is a greater intelligence displayed in the orderly disposal and arrangement of each object, and a more obvious cleanliness than on the other side of the Straits. Farm houses are often built of planks, painted white, or pitched and tarred over; sometimes in brick or stone, with roofs thatched, tiled, or slated. Compact earth, prepared as it is in France, is little used in England.

Owing to the agricultural habits of England, many buildings are not required. With the exception of horses, all animals are kept in the open air, in summer as well as in winter. The harvest, of whatever nature, are stacked. The corn is not carried into the barn till the operation of threshing is to be commenced. If this mode of preserving it saves the expense of the necessary outlay for the building and repair of barns, it nevertheless superinduces a much greater annual expense than the interest of the money required for such a building fund, when the cost of hand labour, which the stacking and unstacking of the corn, the loss and deterioration of the grain, and the facility afforded to incendiaries, are taken into account.

Farming offices are generally built round a square court, in which the cattle are inclosed for the very short time during which they are prevented from grazing.

No fixed system, dependent on the locality of particular parts of a farm, and influencing the mode of agricultural operation, prevails in England. In many counties, the house is in the centre of the farm; in others, and the greater number, it forms part of a village, and thus not only renders slow and expensive the transport of the manure and the crop, but has the additional disadvantage of clogging the speculation of the cultivators.

Foreigners, who only speak of English agriculture on the faith of others, or of what they have read or might have seen on the great London roads, are in ecstasy in relating its wonders. They are deceived and deceive in turn. Without doubt, agriculture, in some respects, is in a very perfect state; but there is still much left undone. I do not hesitate to say, that, as a whole, English agriculture is inferior to that of Brabant, of Flanders, of the provinces of Artois and Normandy; and, in particular instances, it does not bear away the palm from the relative specialties of France and Belgium. It presents, here and there, beautiful masses of cultivation, owing to the consolidation of fortunes, the peculiar taste of certain proprietors, and the union of large capitals, all which advantages are incidental to England in a greater degree than to France; but a well cultivated field is, after all, pretty much the same in both countries. Nor does the produce of a given piece of agricultural land, all conditions of value being similar, differ very much in either country. Certain systems of husbandry, in the one country, balance the advantages or the disadvantages of an analogous system adopted in the other.

I shall cite, in support of this assertion, the custom of dividing the fields, as pastures and paddocks, by double ditches, the tops of which are surmounted by a hedge. The English pretend to find a notable economy in this custom. It saves the expense of shepherds. I have examined this point with intelligent farmers; and the extent and value of the ground devoted to these enclosures, and the cost of erecting them being taken into account, I have arrived at the conviction myself, and have also convinced others, that these protections of hedges and ditches cost three or four times more than the employment of shepherds. Hence results not only a diminution of produce, but an absence of labour no less prejudicial to society than to individuals.

The agricultural population has degenerated, from an easy condition, to a state of suffering, contemporaneously with the abolition of small farms, and their union with large ones. The first step towards a more rational order of things, is the gradual, well-considered return towards the system best adapted to the genius of the people—I mean the system of small farms. The landed proprietor will be a gainer by it, for there will be a greater competition for the letting of small farms than for that of large ones, and his income will be augmented in the ratio of the little value which the farmer generally attaches to the labour of the members of his family. The small tenant will herein also find his account; for, in giving a higher rate of rent for a certain extent of land than the larger farmer, (who would join that portion to ten others of the same value,) he would obtain by his own and his children's labour, and by the effects of a minute and careful cultivation, an abundant equivalent for the increase of his rent. Social order is no less interested in this question; for, if once solved, there would be an end of that subaltern aristocracy—always dangerous, always disposed to be jealous of those above it, and to turn its irreflective masses against power, in no matter what hands authority is placed.

Another resource presents itself; but how many prejudices, how many ill-understood and obstinate interests raise themselves up against its adoption! Who in England would venture to call for the enclosure of waste commons? Who would have the courage to assume such a responsibility? And, yet what advantages would follow in its train! What an increase of labour and of produce! What a means to fix upon the soil, to reconcile with society, a population uncertain of its future condition, unquiet, and always ready to place itself in hostility against the property of the country.

This course would afford a remedy to the progressive misery of the agricultural labourers, and to the evils which menace society; a remedy which is in the hands of the great proprietors. Its adoption would neither require expensive sacrifices nor difficult combinations, directed as it would be by personal interest, the best guide to consult in such an emergency.

PARKS.

An immense space, surrounded by walls or a wooden paling, in the centre of which stands a house placed in the lowest part of the grounds, so as not to be seen from without, is, in England, denominated a park. The enclosure is disguised by a zone of larch, of pine, and other resinous trees. Within it is a pathway. The arrangement of these plantations is such, that the view, whether from within or from without, is interrupted by them, and an uniform, sad, and monotonous aspect is thus given to all parks.

The most is made of inequalities of ground, as well as of the existence of springs, to create sheets of water, not by digging out the bed they should occupy, but by raising a dike at the interior extremity of the valley: an excellent means, which diminishes the expense, and gives a natural and graceful form to those vast reservoirs the sides of which are adorned with fine trees. Out offices, which are too profuse in French gardens, are rarely seen in English parks; still more rarely is one invited to take exercise in them, for in general there are no walks. Extent of ground, trees, and water, alone meet the eye. But to what purpose is this extent of ground turned? It is a vast pasturage, interrupted by masses of underwood, where horses, cows, sheep, and deer peacefully graze without restraint. Groups of ten, twenty, a hundred trees, adorned with all the luxury of vegetation, and the growth of which has never been checked by the edge of the hatchet, are thrown here and there, according to the caprice which presided, a century ago, at their distribution. For combination in the effect, seek no more than what I have stated. A gravelled walk conducts you from the gate to the house. This is nearly the only one in the grounds. If you wish to walk, you tread on the green turf, upon which, in the best-kept parks, walks are traced out by the scythe.

It should nevertheless be acknowledged, that from this want of order, from this laissez faire, there results something grand and imposing, but also little that is graceful, and something that is supremely inconvenient. The designers of gardens might find useful subjects to study in the system of English parks. Between the laboured pretensions of a French landscape painter, and the complete absence of plan on the part of the English gardener; between that multiplicity of roads, buildings, and scenes, which the first abuses, and the affectation, on the part of the second, of making no use of these means, there is a middle course to steer. I should therefore borrow from the one the combination of effect produced by trees relatively to their form, the shading of their foliage, their arrangement; I should not, like the French, cut up into so many walks those immense spaces with which the English system of landscape gardening does not meddle; I would profit by the aspects presented to me by interior and exterior objects; would borrow from the English system that extent wherein consists its principal beauty, the distribution of the waters, the clumps of trees and evergreen shrubs grouped around buildings, and which so well serve to conceal from view all that is wished should be concealed. I would have those belts of trees which mark the limits of the park; the out offices full of taste and originality, which form the dwellings of porters and keepers; the copse and underwood, fruitful resources for the sportsman; and those alternations of light and shade, of open perspective and limited view; which give variety to the walks, and excitement to the imagination. I would adopt from the English system the means it employs to keep the lawn in order, and those moveable iron gates, which have the double advantage of preventing the cattle from straying, and of not interrupting the view.

I should not also fail to borrow from the English taste those small plats of ground wherein flowers are cultivated, and kept separate from the rest of the park by a line of majestic trees, or a current of limpid water. On a well shorn lawn, strewn over with handsome evergreens, patches are cut out in the shape of baskets of flowers, varying in form and arrangement.

Architectural views, the trunk of an old tree, detached fragments of rocks, vases held suspended by double chains from two elm trees, all these are put under contribution to receive flowers, and diversify the effect which they produce. Sometimes, at the whistle of a keeper, hundreds of guinea hens, of gold or silver pheasants, of peacocks, of pigeons of the rarest species, come to display the brilliant tints of their colours with those of the flowers, which embellish these favourite retreats, and impart to them a life and motion, the charms of which it would be difficult to define.

From the combination of these different processes, there should result something more natural than we see in our French gardens, something more cheerful than the parks of England present, and a more rational whole than one could obtain from the exclusive use of either system.

FORESTS.

That which is now called a forest, in England, is but an extensive tract of land formerly covered with trees, but at present filled with thickets very distant from each other, and old trunks of oaks, whose robust nature resist a treatment calculated to destroy them.

Men and animals appear to combine for the purpose of accelerating the destruction of woods, and they are almost every where attained this object. The numerous flocks of cows and sheep, spread over the forests, and the young shrubs, and the hatchet of the woodsman put no greater respect to the few trees which chance has kept from the teeth of the cattle.

The system of property in waste commons, and with its modifications, the ill-regulated exercise of the communal and private rights and usages, are the causes of this disorder. In the state of waste in which the forests are at present, it would be better utterly to destroy them; agriculture would, by this means, recover lands actually destitute of value, without inflicting any loss on the public interest; for wood, in England, is not used for fire; and in the state in which the forests now are, it would be difficult to find a tree fit for the purposes of building. The population, whose greatest misery is a want of labour, would thus obtain the means of existence, and these advantages would be counterbalanced by none of those inconveniences which are almost always mixed up with improvements.

MANNER OF TRAVELLING.

England recommends herself more to the investigations of the economist than to the pencil of the artist. Rich in the fertility of her soil, and in all that can be procured by an enlightened system of husbandry, by extensive property, immense commerce, and manufactures without limit, she every where appears clad with an exuberance of wealth, manifested in the multiplicity and sumptuousness of her mansions, in the richness and variety of her harvests, and in the active circulation of the excellent means which she employs to attain these objects; but all this does not constitute a picturesque country. There are few great rivers: beautiful spots of country are still rarer, except in Wales, Scotland, and some northern counties. Unless one is placed on an elevation, whence one can look down on the whole country, and flit, as it were, above the hedges which cut it up into small parts, the view is arrested at no great distance by trees, thickets, and enclosures of all sorts. The traveller should not expect to meet those vast vistas—those smiling landscapes—that romantic scenery which so often afford the advantage of variety to his journey through certain parts of France.*

Vainly will he seek for peasants, in his journey through England. The English peasants do not present themselves to his notice. The reaper, the gleaner, the ploughman afford the striking incongruity of a town dress and a rural occupation. With the exception of Wales and Scotland, the dress in the villages and the large towns is exactly the same. You proceed from province to province, without being reminded, as in France, Spain and Switzerland, by the varied forms of costume, that you are passing from one country into another, and have to expect other manners, and another language, or at least a change of customs.

The taste for travelling, an expensive taste in any country, is truly a ruinous one in England. If the means of satisfying it are numerous, and accompanied with all that can promote pleasure, one is steered against this seductive consolation by the perpetual warning of a speedily drained purse.

Posting, placed on a totally different footing from that service in the rest of Europe, is not the object of an exclusive privilege. By means of a license which cannot be refused, relays of post-horses are established according to the caprice or the will of those who possess them. The rivalry arising from this practice does not lower the price of posting, which, London excepted, is nearly the same on all roads, and differs but little from the price of relays in France. The number of horses is always fixed at two or four, without regard to the number of travellers, or to the form or weight of the carriages. When you desire a post chaise, the innkeeper is obliged to furnish it, without your paying an additional price. These chaises, in the shape of our coupés, are well hung, and very clean and commodious.

England has not, as we find in France, a breed of horses specially appropriated to posting. The greater part of the post horses in England are hunters, or carriage horses, which, having become unfit for either of these purposes, wear out the remnant of their strength in post chaises, before they are transferred to hackney coaches or wagons. Their speed answers, in a great degree, to what one would expect from their breed. You travel at the rate of eight or nine miles an hour (about three and a half leagues,) which includes the time of changing horses.

The height of the postilions (always chosen among the smallest men,) and their dress, consisting of a jacket, short breeches, and half boots, are calculated with a view to reduce to the smallest possible compass the burden of the horses. There is no difference between the town harness and that which is kept for posting. They are both in excellent condition.

The mail coaches destined for the transport of letters, are carriages, with four inside and six outside places. Behind the coach the guard is seated, with a blunderbuss and a pair of pistols before him. These coaches travel at the rate of ten miles or four leagues an hour; but their small size (for the English, in general tall and thick, appear to have little regard to their personal proportions in the size of their carriages)—and the short time they stop to refresh, render them very unpleasant modes of conveyance.

Stage coaches are very elegant carriages, built to carry fifteen or eighteen travellers, and a considerable weight in packets, but on admirable roads. This is an indispensable condition. Without it, the height of the carriages, the arrangement of the whole of the luggage on the imperial, and the lightness of the body and the axle-tree, would give rise to frequent accidents.

The inside of the coach contains only four places. The seat of the coachman, and another seat placed immediately behind it, admit of six persons, and two seats facing each other at the hind wheels, afford places for six or eight more. These seats are fixed over boots or boxes for stowing away the luggage. Such parcels as these cannot contain are placed on the imperial.

The desire to breathe the fresh air, rather than economical considerations, induce even the richest English to give a preference to outside places. They only go inside when compelled by bad weather. The place most in request—one knows not wherefore—is to the left of the coachman; it is considered as the place of honour, and is reserved for fashionables, and even for lords, who do not disdain to travel thus. The sole advantages which such a station appeared to me to present, were the being placed near a well-dressed coachman, and the escaping the chance of travelling by the side of a butcher, a shoemaker, or some other individual of that class. Each time the coachman descends from his box, his neighbour has the advantage of being made the forced depository of his reins and whip. These are placed in your hands, as they are taken out of them again without the least ceremony.

It has been remarked that the horses used for the stage coaches in England go more quickly than those devoted to the same service in France, and that, nevertheless, our carriages take no more time in performing a given distance. This anomaly is explained by the difference in the respective arrangements. In England, whether it be to satisfy the taste for frequent meals, or to favour the longing of coachmen and guards for beer and strong liquors, the relays are more frequent.

The appointments of an English coach are no less elegant than its form. A portly good-looking coachman, seated on a very high coach-box, well dressed, wearing white gloves, a nosogay in his button-hole, and his chin enveloped in an enormous cravat, drives four horses perfectly matched and harnessed, and as carefully groomed as when they excited admiration in the carriages of Grosvenor and Berkeley Squares. Such is the manner in which English horses are managed, such also is their docility, the effect either of temperament or training, that you do not remark the least restiveness in them. Four-horse coaches are to be seen rapidly traversing the most populous streets of London, without occasioning the least accident, without being at all inconvenienced in the midst of the numerous carriages, which hardly leave the necessary space to pass. The swearing of ostlers is never heard at the relays, any more than the neighing of horses; nor are you interrupted on the road by the voice of the coachman, or the sound of his whip, which differs only from a cabriolet whip in the length of the thong, and serves more as a sort of appendage, than a means of correction in the hand which carries it. In England, where every thing is so well arranged, where each person knows so well how to confine himself to the exigencies of his proper position, the horses do better what they have to do, than the horses of other countries, and that too without the need of a brutal correction. One may travel from one end of England to the other without hearing the sound of a whip, or the hallooing of conductors, which in France fall so disagreeably on the ears of travellers.

Among the wonders of English civilisation, the inns should be mentioned. In many of the larger towns they are magnificent, and they are good and well supplied in the smallest. In the greater part of them the servants are in livery, and in all, their attendance is prompt and respectful. On their arrival, travellers are received by the master of the house, whose decent dress indicates a respectful feeling towards strangers. Introduced into a well-heated, well-furnished room, they have never to wait for a meal, the simplicity of which, in the way of cookery, is atoned for by the elegance, often the richness of the plate and ware, and the superior quality of the meat. A sleeping-room, as comfortable as this kind of apartment (so neglected in England) can be, completes the agrément of your sojourn. Your discontent does not commence till the exorbitant bill proves that such attentions, far from being disinterested, are dearly charged for. Seldom do you separate from your host with a reciprocation of politeness. Yet, notwithstanding the coldness with which his attentions are received, the landlord does not cease to remain by the side of the traveller till his carriage is in motion.

That which a foreigner appreciates most in England is the facility of seeing every thing. Thanks to the admirable internal communication, he can strike off from the great roads, without the fear of being stopped by the impassable state of the by ones. Does he wish to see a castle or country-mansion? He indicates his wish, and the postilions, who are adepts at this kind of lionising, conduct him thither, and suffer nothing which could gratify, to escape his curiosity. Shillings and half-crowns, with which it is always necessary to be abundantly provided, cause all gates to open, and facilitate even the most inconsiderate investigations. Under this head, France offers no subject of comparison.

To the advantages which I have been enumerating, I should add another, which never fails to strike the foreigner, and induces him to establish a comparison between the official customs of the continental governments and those of England; a comparison which is not favourable to the first. The indispensable examination which his baggage undergoes on his landing, alone wears his patience: he may travel over the three kingdoms without meeting a government functionary, who, under pretext of the safety of the state or the interest of a city, requires the exhibition of a passport, or the opening of his trunks. The police and the revenue appear to vie with each other in carelessness; yet, though a surveillance in these matters is not neglected, one should be grateful at escaping forms which every where else are repugnant, if not vexatious.

Vanity, a species of universal coin, is current as much and more in England than in any other part of the world. The traveller must take care to put his titles on his passport, and his arms on his carriage. People who have neither titles nor armorial bearings, furnish themselves with both, and find their account in so doing: they pay no dearer at the inns, and are much better treated in drawing-rooms.

BREEDING, FOOD, AND EMPLOYMENT OF HORSES.

The breeding of horses in England purely a matter of private speculation. The choice of one is always made with minute and reasonable heedfulness; their genealogy, transferred to special registers, is stated with as much, and often with more exactness than that of their owners.

The attention bestowed on the training of horses contributes to modify their character, their temper, and even their shape, according to the nature of the labour to which they are destined.

The English do not await the period of a complete development of strength, before they employ the horse. Horses intended for racing are subjected, from the age of eighteen months, to violent and frequent exercise. The diet to which they are limited contains the greatest quantity of nutriment in the smallest possible space, and is chosen with a view to prevent the enlargement of the abdomen, and the relaxation of the muscular system. Brown bread, biscuit, oats, and beans, with a small quantity of straw and hay cut and mixed up together, form the basis of their food.

Hunters are kept in the same manner, but their food is composed of a greater quantity of aliment. Care is taken not to allow them to drink before they leave the stable.

The food of horses otherwise employed varies according to the greater or less speed required of them. But, no matter how worked, the smallest possible quantity of water is given them. In order not to overload the stomach of the animals at the moment they are about to work, no food is given to them for an hour at least before their departure from the stables. On the road, they are only baited with a handful of wet hay, afterwards a bucket of water is offered them; but instead of allowing them to drink, it is raised up so as merely to wet the head. When the heat is great, and the roads are covered with dust, the nostrils and legs are carefully sponged.

Horses are daily exercised. Every morning, after being groomed, they are ridden out at different paces for about an hour. When they stop at any place, instead of allowing them to remain stationary, they are slowly walked about in the neighbourhood.

The repeated groomings and currying to which these animals are subjected, the minute attention bestowed upon them, do not appear to increase their strength or health. With less trouble, with infinitely less expense, the horses of other countries go through as much work (laying aside the consideration of fleetness), are as well fed, and in general attain a greater degree of longevity. Those useless and fatiguing details practised in the English stables may be therefore dispensed with.

The English understand better than any other people in the world, the employment of the horse. They use him in the saddle for riding and hunting, rarely for travelling. They travel in comfortable coaches, the progress of which is facilitated by the finest roads in the world, when the distance would occasion fatigue to a horse. All ages and sexes are in the habit of riding. From the infant of six years old, who gallops on an Isle-of-Man pony, to the old gentleman who trusts himself to the steady and sure paces of his favourite horse—from the dandy of Hyde Park, who wishes the boldness of his horsemanship and the swiftness of his horse to be admired, to the city shopkeeper who hires a nag to enjoy the Sunday with his family in the country,—all the world rides, and appears to be the better for it. For if longevity is not greater in England than in the most healthful parts of Europe, it is certainly attained with less of accidental and premature infirmities.

* The readers of all nations, excepting the French, will not agree in this opinion. With two or three insignificant exceptions within her own soil, "la belle France" may be pronounced the ugliest country in Europe, always excepting Holland. It is not for us to enumerate the beauties of England; but the author seems not to have visited Derbyshire, Herefordshire, the Wye, the Isle of Wight, nor the Lakes of Cumberland.

The English have the rare talent of applying horses to all uses, without for a moment considering whether nature has intended them for such employments. They harness the smallest ponies, and make no account of riding the heaviest carriage horses. The hunter on whose back they gained the brush the evening before, carries them forty miles the next day in a tilbury. Such is the perfection of the English breed, that horses are never unsuited for the service required of them, no matter what their shape and habits.

As relates to speed, the labour imposed on them is generally a forced one. Though the constant training to which they are kept up enables them temporarily to bear these great exertions, still it does not prevent those precocious disorders, which, limiting their strength to a few years, cause them rapidly to pass from the stable of a peer, where they have been successively employed in saddle or harness, to that of a licensed hackneyman, or a proprietor of stage coaches, whence they again descend to terminate painfully their short career in the humble mews of a hackney-coachman.

If English horses do more, under certain circumstances, than the horses of other countries, it is not because they are more vigorous, but because they are made to follow a peculiar and better understood regimen, and that the English are less apprehensive of exhausting them.

Thus, as I have said, from the age of eighteen months, race-horses are subjected to violent exercise. A great number sink under this treatment; others preserve their strength for a very limited number of years.

Light draught horses and hunters are not brought into so early use, and, accordingly, last longer; but they seldom pass the age of ten or twelve years without being injured by precocious disorders.

The patience and docility of the English horse are owing to the gentler treatment and continual care he receives. Nothing is rarer than a restive or wicked animal; nothing, also, is more uncommon than the infliction of brutal treatment on any of them. The breed is also distinguished by an intelligence, which manifests itself, whatever be the employments to which you may turn them.

Their colours are extremely various. The handsomest horses are generally found among the dark sorrel, the grey, and bright bay.

Owing to her admirable roads, England can dispense with the necessity of having particular breeds of horses, for every kind of service. With the exception of racing, hunting, and the carriage of beer and coals in the cities, all sorts of horses are employed indiscriminately, without regard to their strength or sinew. If they perform the work required, the merit is less due to them than to the admirable state of the streets and roads. Besides, land carriage is so unimportant in England, that it is confined to articles of small weight.

France is better off in this respect. Each kind of labour is performed by the horse most fitted for that labour, and each breed unites the peculiar aptitudes most suited to the work in which it is engaged. From the enormous horses reared in Flanders for the transport of quarry-stones, and the lighter but taller horses furnished by the banks of the Rhone for the towage of that river, to the breed of Orleans and Picton destined for the service of the post and the diligences; from the magnificent carriage horses of Normandy to the slight and elegant breed of Limousin, each species of labour finds the animal most suited to perform it. And the shocking state of the French roads renders those labours much more numerous and indispensable in France than in England.

If the merit of the respective breeds were to be judged by the celerity of posting and of public coaches, the advantage would most incontestably lie on the side of England. This, however, would be an erroneous mode of comparison. It is not because her horses go more quickly than those of France that England has the superiority in this respect. It is because they are better harnessed and better driven; because they travel over more level and even roads, and draw lighter carriages. Give to France similar advantages, and the results will be similar, with even fewer horses. All doubt would cease on this head, if people considered that the malle-poste from Paris to Bordeaux takes no longer to perform the journey than the English mail to travel from London to Edinburgh, (the distance between these four points is the same,) and that the French horses have, nevertheless, to surmount greater difficulties, owing to the bad state of the roads, the shape and weight of the carriages, and the mode of harnessing.

In a word, if the race-horses and hunters of England have a superior fleetness, their strength exceeds not that of the best horses of this kind in France, while it must be admitted that the English horses are sooner worn out. English draught horses last longer than racers and hunters, but not so long as the French draught horses. The average age of animals still capable of doing their work well, is from ten to eleven years in England, and from fourteen to fifteen in France.

HORSE-RACING.

England, with a degree of pride, places horse-racing among the first of her national tastes. The richer classes devote the superfluity of their wealth, a part even of what luxury might require, to the indulgence of these sports. An enormous expenditure is apparently made for the pleasure of seeing horses run, which are unfit for any other kind of labour, and which their owners would not venture to mount to ride the shortest distance, and still less to follow the foxhounds. At bottom, (though perhaps those who thus spend their money do not reflect upon the important result,) the end and object is to produce in the English breed of horses, that improvement which brings them to the highest degree of perfection.

NEWMARKET.

Newmarket is one of the most renowned race-courses in England. If it be not filled with a crowd of fashionable, if the small extent of the town, and the difficulty of finding lodgings, if the monotony of the surrounding country, and the rarity of large mansions, drive away from it that portion of society which does not wish to purchase enjoyment at the expense of comfort—it is there at least that the amateurs of spotting send those horses of their stud whose fame they are anxious to establish. It is there too that the largest bets are made. It is there, moreover, that, in the interval not devoted to racing, the most immoderate gambling takes place.

In the middle of a vast plain, terminating in a gentle slope, is discovered a range of decent houses, built on both sides of a broad road. The signs hanging from the greater part of these houses, and the bills placed at the windows of others, plainly indicate that the town is the resort of a population brought thither by adventitious circumstances. This town is Newmarket, which, like all English towns, is without any public walks.

The race-course is very near the town, which, hidden by the sinuosities of the ground, breaks not the uniformity of a landscape uninterrupted by either houses or trees. In this species of desert, which ill repays the labour bestowed upon its cultivation, and at the extremity of an entrenchment dug by the Romans, a piece of ground unfolds itself, of three or four miles in extent, and kept in the best order. This is the course of Newmarket. Moveable posts, placed at a considerable distance from each other, point out the line which the horses are to take; other posts, more elevated, serve as rendezvous to the betters, who group around them during the interval between the races, in order to make bets, or to complete those not already concluded. To a spectator unaccustomed to such scenes, these assemblages have the aspect of an auction. Each person cries out the name of the horse on which he bets, the conditions of the bet, and the sum which he risks. Another better accepts the bet, a note of which is taken down in the betting-book held by each of the interested parties.

These bets are in general very complicated, and great experience is necessary readily to understand them in all their details. According to the idea people form of the relative strength of such or such a horse, they bet ten, twenty, sometimes thirty to one. When horses have run for the first time, the betters study the paces of the animals, and determine to bet according to the idea they have formed from so casual an observation. Gamblers call this "inspiration."

The bets being made, each person takes his stand as near as possible to a species of turret or sentry box, placed on wheels, which is occupied by the two judges of the races. Posts, with a rope running through them, trace out the line which the spectators should not transgress, while men on foot and on horseback carrying large hunting-whips constitute a sort of police, and exercise their duties, without regard for ranks, towards all whom an indiscreet curiosity draws beyond the prescribed limits. A line of carriages of all shapes, and a few wagons on which moveable huts are erected, destined for ladies who have no wish to mix in a crowd little disposed to courtesy, complete the picture.

After a delay of some minutes, you perceive, on the ridge of a hill, the quickest horses stimulated by the spurs of the jockeys. In a few seconds they reach the spot where the course terminates. It is here that the passions not only of those who have stakes, but of the spectators, who have, moreover, some interest in the result, owing to more or less heavy bets, express, by action and cries, either joy or grief, irony or reproach. At length, the winner is proclaimed, and horses and jockeys retire to a building, where the former are wrapped up in horse-cloths, and the latter are weighed, in order to see whether such as have not the necessary weight, have rid themselves, during the race, of the lead which it is customary to attach to the waists of those who are deficient in the regulated weight.

Each race lasts but a few seconds. You only perceive the horses when they have attained the ridge of a piece of ground whose declivity inclines towards the spectators; so that the moment of their passing before you with the rapidity of lightning, is the only opportunity afforded you of judging of the race. The sum of pleasure and interest which a race thus procures may be recapitulated in the following exclamations of the bystanders: "Here they are!" "How they fly!" "How rapidly they went!" "You owe me a thousand guineas." This last interruption never fails to crown the enthusiasm, and, with many, to allay it.

The sight of the crowd of visitors and lookers-on affords little interest. It is quite the fashion to leave Newmarket the fine horses and magnificent equipages which you arrive, and to change them, before you reach the ground, for hired horses and carriages.

Thus the lord who runs horses of a value amounting to some thousands of guineas, and who makes bet a still larger amount, appears on the course mounted on a pony, and riding beside the post-chariot occupied by his family. People, then, do not go to Newmarket, to behold an imposing spectacle, or a scene that strikes the imagination: the observer, however, will not have come in vain, if it be his wish to study the episodes of a race.

It is curious to notice the accidental intercourse which takes place between two extremes of English society—between the lords and their jockeys: we may see a duke, or a peer of the united kingdom, who hesitates not to exhibit himself with his arm passed under that of the jockey who is to ride his favourite horse, and animating him by his counsel and encouragement. Nor do others scruple to shake the hand of an ex-boxer enriched by its blows he has given or received, and who wishes, not that he is rich, to engage in the pursuit of betting for money against that of the highest personages. Now there are, also, who practise this system of perfect equality to such an extent, that they do not scruple to make daily companion of the chief of a London gaming-house.

It is no less singular to observe the means employed to reduce the jockeys above the standard, to a feather-weight. The following story, admitted as an article of fact among sporting amateurs, will give some idea of the importance attached to the weight which a horse should carry.

Lord — had two horses of equal strength, and two jockeys of similar weight: each time these horses ran, victory declared itself unvaryingly, and in a marked manner, alternately for either horse. One day, however, both horses arrived at the same second of time; all were at a loss to guess the cause of this, till one of the jockeys perceived, on regaining the stable, that he had lost the key he should have had in his pocket: it then became known that that jockey was alternately to carry the key, and that it was the weight of the key which caused the jockey who carried it to lose the race. One may judge by the credit given to this fable (which probably only marks the influence exercised on the speed of horses by the weight of the rider,) how much importance is attached to the weight of a jockey.

To substantial food compressed into the smallest possible space, are joined frequent purgatives; the jockey is also made to walk out covered with warm clothing, in order to promote perspiration; and a number of other precautions of the same nature are adopted.

After having formed his opinion of the speed of the horses, the stranger would wish to examine their make; but this is an object of difficult attainment: you can only see them in the stable, to which it is not easy to procure access—or at exercise, which they take regularly twice a day at a slow pace; and, on both occasions, they are so covered over with horse-cloths that you can only see the nostrils, eyes, and limbs.

Race-horses are in general seventeen hands high.

They are of slender limbs; but the development of their hams, and the form of their joints, indicate great strength, and account for their speed. Their bodies are thin and well shaped; the muscles and veins are delineated under a very fine skin and a short and uniform coat of hair. It would be wrong, however, to attribute this conformation to the constitution of the horse: it is the result of the system of food and exercise to which he is subjected. The food given him is not over abundant. The stomach, and consequently the frame of the bones, that of the body in particular, are little developed. The action impressed on the muscles by forced speed gives to the muscular parts a projection and development which is promoted by the absence of fat: the shape and conformation of race-horses are therefore the result of the manner in which they are bred and trained. In order to convince oneself of this, it will suffice to consider that, destined to serve as models to all other breeds, they produce hunters, carriage and even wagon horses, according to the manner in which they are crossed. It is by their means that the perfection of the English race is kept up—a perfection obtained by the best directed efforts, and at an expense which, in France, would exceed belief.

It would hardly be credited that there are proprietors of horses, in England, who expend from five to six thousand pounds a year in the keep of race-horses, (a hundred and twenty-five to a hundred and fifty thousand francs,) without reaping any other advantage from such an expenditure than the pleasure of seeing them run two or three times over a race-course, or the uncertain chance of winning a considerable bet, and a few silver cups on which the names of the horse, the jockey, the master, and the circumstances of the victory, are inscribed. These are heir-looms, which are transmitted from generation to generation, and which proudly adorn the side-board of a dining-room on great occasions.

Bets are not always made on the race-course, and within view of the horses which are the objects of them. A great number are made in the Clubs of London, and also in an establishment where such matters are transacted. People bet on a horse which has never run, but whose genealogy is known; they also bet on the foal which shall have such or such a horse for sire or dam. The race to be run, in this case, cannot take effect for three years afterwards; but the bet nevertheless prevails in full force. It sometimes happens, however, as the man in the fable says, that,

“Le roi, l'âne ou moi serons morts.”

At three different periods of the year, and during three consecutive weeks at each epoch, the race-course of Newmarket brings to that small town a numerous concourse of amateurs of this kind of pleasure, and they impress on the desert country, which surrounds the course, a life and movement which contrast with its sad and mournful aspect.

During the remainder of the year, the eye only meets strings of horses carefully covered, whose slow and measured paces provoke the impatience of the spectator, who would wish to see them putting forth all the speed of which their brisk and bounding forms affords a promise.

EPSOM.

The neighbourhood of London gives a different aspect to Epsom races. The roads thither are covered with every variety of carriage, and with horsemen mounted on steeds of all kinds. This heap of carriages crossing and passing each other, without regard for the elegance of the vehicle, or the quality and condition of the party; the butcher's cart cutting out the gig of an exquisite; the hackney coach opposing its heavy mass to the passage of the four-in-hand landau, driven by a lord in the dress of a coachman, with a nosegay in his side-button—the full toilette of a fine lady covered with dust or mud by the clownish freak of a low fellow—all these present a really curious spectacle. Arrived on the race-ground, it is no less amusing to perceive the numerous expedients to which people have recourse, to form a sort of ambulatory board for the lunch which is to enable the spectator to wait the commencement of the racing (half-past two) with less impatience.

The spot set apart for the race-course exhibits the aspect of a country fair ground. On either side of the line within which the horses run, are ranged the thousands of carriages which have transported thither the eager company. The intermediate space is occupied by gipseys, who go about telling fortunes, begging, taking all that is given to them, robbing all that falls under their hand. When a spectator, led by the hope of obtaining a better place, attempts to traverse the race-ground, he is driven back by the blows of policemen. This species of episode excites among those present an hilarity which expresses itself by general shouts of applause.

The spectators who cannot find a place near this line, are ranged on an overturned wagon or buggy, one hundred feet behind. The rest of the scene is occupied by tents, and by a magnificent pavilion reserved for personages of distinction.

The race-course has a semicircular form. It presents visible undulations. The point of departure varies, according to the custom, and the strength of the horses. The point of arrival is always the same. A much better view is had of the race at Epsom than of that at Newmarket, and a much worse one than in the riding-houses of France.

Epsom races afford an amusing sight to such as seek to gratify their curiosity in vast assemblies of people, in a noisy scene, and in the inconvenience of a crowd. They present a different sort of interest to those who speculate on the greater or less speed of a horse, who oftener still speculate on their own address, and on the folly of their neighbours, who calculate on the cleverness of their own jockeys and the complaisance of those of their antagonists.

At Newmarket, the races are intended for genuine amateurs; at Epsom, it is a spectacle for a great capital, and is every way worthy of it.

STEEPLE CHASE.

A mania of manias rules England. The English love to think of that which has never been thought of by any other people, and to do that which has never been done elsewhere. This is conceived to be originality, and, because they shall not be imitated, they therefore conclude they are inimitable. It would be a thankless office to combat such an idea. It exists; it does no evil, and produces some good. Why should people wish to modify it? If they trouble themselves about it at all, it should be to verify its existence and effects.

Among the national tastes,—the taste for steeple chases, or to speak more properly, races towards steeples, occupies a distinguished rank. This amusement is necessarily reserved for rich people, owing to the expense which it occasions. In consequence of the absence of all accessory interest, it suits English habits. It is numbered among their favourite amusements, from the bets which it originates. It is not wonderful, therefore, that it has assumed the character of a passion, and that a steeple chase should be an event of which people speak beforehand, of which they talk afterwards, and whose smallest details are laid hold of with avidity.

On the appointed day, the roads are covered with horsemen making their way to the place appointed for the race. As yet all is ignorance concerning the details of the match, which are only determined at the instant; and by a species of jury named by the competitors. The general conditions are, that you shall attain a point designated by nearly a straight line, and from which you may not deviate more than one hundred paces,—that no gate shall be opened, and that none of the horsemen can alight to overcome an obstacle.

The line of the steeple chase has generally an extent of four or five miles, and is planted with flags.

On a signal given, all parties start forth. The country which presents the greatest number of obstacles, such as hedges, ditches, gates, gutters, rivers, is chosen in preference, as the theatre of this amusement. Every thing is, or ought to be leaped over. Frequent accidents reduce the number of competitors. Two or three among the boldest, or the most foolish, or the best mounted, arrive at the goal. He who has first attained it wins, besides the bets he has made, the united sums that each competitor has paid in order to be permitted to run. A dinner, followed by copious libations, restores, consoles, and dries those who are exhausted with fatigue, have lost their money, or have fallen into the ditches or streams the breadth of which has proved the strength of their horses to be at fault.

The taste for steeple chases will not be understood, and still less shared by other nations. But it must be a lively and attractive pleasure in England, since so many people risk their money and limbs in this amusement.

FIELD SPORTS.

COURSING.

Happy the country in which the fleetness of a horse, the management of a kennel, and the death of a fox, are such important affairs, that they absorb in a great part the time and thoughts of men who have all possible means to make a better use of one and the other. England is that country. After horse-racing, to which considerable sums are devoted, comes coursing, the relative expense of which is not less, and which extends the mania of betting to the lower classes of society. At Newmarket, both amusements alternately engage the leisure of men of rank and fortune. Elsewhere, coursing is the favourite amusement of rich people—of country squires in easy circumstances. The following is the manner in which this latter amusement is indulged.

In order to conciliate the minds of the farmers, who are great amateurs of this kind of amusement, and to make them bear, with less impatience, the injury done the harvest by the game, the great proprietors consent to allow coursing to be carried on in their grounds. On the appointed day, the dogs are led thither. Such as should run together are coupled. These arrangements being made, and the bets settled, the sportsmen range themselves near each other, and walk behind a man on foot, who holds in leash two greyhounds, and who lets them loose upon the first hare which is seen to spring. The sportsmen follow without being stopped either by tillage ground, hedges, or ditches, of none of which do they make any account. At length they arrive at the taking of the hare.

Two other dogs are substituted for the first; and the sport is continued in the same manner, till the end of the chase. The prize is adjudged, not to the dog which takes the hare, but to the dog who having passed her oftenest is therefore considered the swiftest. Judgment is pronounced by a judge not belonging to the county, but sent by the Greyhound Club, and who is paid very dearly by the betters.

In order to preserve the strength and speed of the greyhounds, they are almost exclusively fed with a species of mutton broth; and as the humid, cold, and variable temperature of the climate might exercise a pernicious influence, they are wrapped up in clothing appropriate to the season. Their beds consist of woollen cushions, and they travel in carriages. Lukewarm baths await them on their return from the chase, and relieve them from its fatigues.

This coursing of greyhounds is adopted less with a view to the pleasures of the chase, than to minister to the rage for betting. It is a means of risking large sums, an amusement which, independently of the loss of bets, entails other very considerable expenses. The pay of the keepers must be added to the cost of the dogs' food. To each course or run is attached a judge, who, following the example of his colleagues of a higher order, charges a very high price for the justice he distributes; and as it would be unbecoming to separate without a dinner, the bill of the inn-keeper contributes to swell out the already very large sums which this species of pleasure entails upon those who have indulged in it. The fortunate betters rejoice; they who lose, dream of opportunities which may prove more favourable to them. Gamblers are the same in all countries.

SHOOTING.

In all that relates to pleasure, the English do not look beyond the mere enjoyment in hand. They dine to get rid of hunger; they display luxury in order to spend money, they ride to reach a journey's end. They are regardless of all those accessory enjoyments so highly prized in other countries. Therefore it is that they shoot to destroy game, without stopping to consider the process by which they attain this end. They hardly seek in the dog which they employ that training which gives such a charm to sporting itself. The care of collecting the birds which they kill devolves on a keeper who accompanies them. As soon as the game is down, they care no more about it. In order to escape the fatigue even of a wish, they leave the management of the day's sporting under the control of the keeper, and do not think of counteracting the indications of his caprice.

To shooting in the open plain, shooting in the woods succeeds. Placed at suitable spots, the sportsmen fire on the game, which those who are appointed to that task, start without allowing to the birds the feeble defence which the rapidity of their flight might oppose to the address of the sportsman. The destruction of game is immense, and nothing but the careful and expensive efforts exerted to keep up the breed would suffice to maintain an adequate supply. The game usually killed amounts to eight hundred or a thousand birds, when the sports take place on a property of moderate extent. On large estates, the amount of game killed is frequently ten times that number.

The indifference displayed in the sport, manifests itself in an equal degree when it is over. The sportsmen hardly know the number of game killed; and were it not for their efforts to resist the inclination to sleep, which the fatigues of the day would prompt them to indulge, they would almost lose the recollection of the idle manner in which they had thrown away their time.

FOX-HUNTING.

On a cold and foggy day, the ground impregnated with water, in which the horses sank up to their hams, we set out from H. H.'s on a journey of twelve miles, to reach the spot appointed for a fox-hunt. We journeyed quickly thither, on horses which we exchanged for hunters that awaited us at the place of meeting. About sixty sportsmen in red coats, an equal number of farmers in their every-day dress, two huntsmen distinguished by their prepared leather caps, and a horn fixed in a case to their saddle-bows, with forty or fifty dogs of ordinary shape and cropped ears, composed (with the fox who was immediately unbagged) the materials of the hunt.

The animal had hardly put his foot to the ground before the sportsmen commenced a hunting gallop, in order to follow a pack of prodigious swiftness, and to which the hedges and ditches which separate the fields gave a great advantage at starting. The rapidity of the dogs not allowing their cry to be heard, it was only by the aid of the eyesight, and by a sort of instinct, that the sportsmen were enabled to follow in the direction they had taken. After a lapse of ten minutes, the hunt presented nothing more than a confused crowd of horsemen seeking to pass each other, bounding over hedges, gates, and ditches, all which they encountered with a resolution which did honour to the astonishing strength of the horses, and to the intrepidity of the riders.

Without having followed an English hunt, one cannot form an idea of all that the indifference to self-preservation may bring a man to require of the strength and training of a horse. Almost all the hedges are separated from the fields they inclose by two ditches, each of two feet in breadth. The horse must clear at one leap the two ditches and the hedge. Wo to the rider if, wrongly calculating his spring, the animal puts his fore-feet in the second ditch. A terrible fall is the consequence. If the ditches are too large to be cleared at one leap, the horse lands on the tuft of earth which separates them, stops an instant, and from his own instinct, and without hesitation, attains the soil (always downwards) in which the second ditch is dug out. These leaps "de haut en bas" are frequent, and do not cause many accidents.

When a hedge is too high, the riders seek a place where the branches, being more asunder, present a sort of passage. Thither you direct your horse, on whose neck you extend yourself, yielding to the instinct of the animal, who brushes through the difficulties with which his way is beset, with admirable address. Neither the double ditch, the hedge, nor the briars which are spread across, nothing, in short, arrests him. The effect of this species of leap astonishes the spectator who sees it for the first time, whether from the training and the species of reasoning it exhibits in the horse, or from the haste with which horse and rider disappear.

After an hour's race, and without the sagacity or the talent of the huntsmen being laid under contribution, the fox was taken. Two or three horsemen, whom chance, or the speed of their horses, rather than their good management, had favoured, were in at the death. The sharp sounds of the huntsmen's horns at this instant summoned the whole field: but a quarter of an hour elapsed before the crowd of amateurs were assembled. The tail of the fox was offered to the most distinguished rider. The high feats and accidents were now recapitulated, and general laughter was caused by the stains of mud which revealed the falls it might have been wished to conceal. Some directed themselves to the places where they had witnessed the fall of those of their friends who were not present at the death, with a view to offer that assistance which, hurried away by the ardour of the chase, they did not think of proposing at a more seasonable moment. At length the hunt broke up, and each one returned home.*

All that I have stated concerning fox-hunting is applicable to stag-hunting, which only takes place in the neighbourhood of the royal parks, and with the royal hounds.

Subjected to a regimen nearly similar to that in use for race-horses, exercised and fed like them in a peculiar manner, the stag intended to be hunted is set at liberty in a country unknown to him. Frightened by the cries and approach of the dogs, he runs till weakness obliges him to seek an asylum in a court or building, with the sight and uses of which his domestic habits have familiarised him. The sportsmen arrive before the dogs can reach him, and a carriage always at hand carries the stag back to the park from whence he had been removed. Every care is then bestowed to restore to the animal the strength required to furnish anew an amusement to which, in the end, he falls a victim.

The passion of sporting is universal in England. From the man of rank and fortune, who devotes to it considerable sums, and almost all his time and thoughts—even to the farmer, who not content with unyoking one of the horses which draws his plough, and thereby augmenting the number of sportsmen, is also satisfied that his well-tilled fields will be thoroughly over-run by one hundred horses,—all are enthusiastic in this kind of pleasure. Ladies take great interest in listening to the recitals of the chase; nor is the time given by infants to this amusement considered as thrown away.

If hunting is looked at as a means of trying the strength of horses, it must be acknowledged that nowhere is this end better attained than in England. Should one seek in it a reasonable pleasure, an amusement dependent on certain accessory combinations, the manner of hunting in England must be placed very much below the system as practised in other countries. Here no talent is required on the part of the rider. None of that knowledge which mingles self-love with pleasure is necessary. The harmony arising from the mingling and concordance of dogs and of horses is unknown. Every thing, even to the limbs of the sportsman, is sacrificed to the idle mania of a run without fixed duration and without arrangement. Properly speaking, you do not hunt, for rarely you see the animal pursued—as rarely do you perceive the dogs—and you never hear them. You are limited to run in the direction in which you remark horsemen, which direction you suppose to be that of the chase.

I can conceive a foreigner following an English hunt, to describe the folly of it, or with a view to buy some of the admirable horses which show off on the occasion; but I cannot conceive that he would be tempted to renew the experiment.

ROADS, CANALS, SUSPENSION BRIDGES, RAILWAYS.

An examination of those works which have for object the improvement of internal communication presents an interesting study, whether that study relates to art, or applies itself to political economy. In France, where the government is almost the only entrepreneur of works of general utility, the persons employed on its behalf are careful to avoid all considerations relating to the expense. This, however, is the object of minute attention in England, where private interest intervenes in every thing, as well in the initiation, as in the execution of projects. Thus, before commencing an enterprise, people wish to satisfy themselves that its results will be commensurate with the outlay it will require. They do not only think of present returns; they consider the returns to be obtained at a future time, by an improvement and increase in the kind of production which the communication about to be established should favour. The enterprise is not undertaken till satisfactory data are collected on this subject.

The same prudence is apparent in the execution of the work. Without an absolute certainty of the degree and extent of the circulation, and, consequently, of the amount of profits, the project assumes only the character of a trial and experiment; but if it be found productive, it soon receives that character of grandeur and durability which consorts with the importance of the communication and the prospect of the advantage it should procure. This is the manner of proceeding in a country where good sense is first consulted, and where not a step is taken without being assured of the solidity of the ground on which you tread.

Some exceptions, however, tend to prove that all enterprises of this nature are not equally advantageous; that, far from returning an interest proportioned to the capital expended on them, they require new sacrifices for the continuation and repair of the works. What is the conclusion to be deduced from this? That there are bad speculators. But it should be acknowledged that English speculators deceive themselves in a degree less prejudicial to their interests than those of other countries, because their advances are relatively less considerable. There are also false calculations, which are not the effect of error, but of a culpable speculation on the part of those who embark in them. There are men whose object is to deceive the credulous confidence of professional dupes who are always disposed to give their money to the first who asks it of them, and who even prefer the seductive promises of the adventurer to the prudent reserve of the wise man. But if there are bad speculations of this kind in England, they are fewer than in France, and they hardly ever exercise an untoward influence upon the execution of the work. The "company" suffer, but the public behold an increase of the sources whence flows their prosperity.

ROADS.

The superiority of the English roads over those of the greater part of Europe, and more especially of France, cannot be contested. The causes of this superiority are far too interesting to the good administration of all countries, to be passed over without mature examination. The excellence of the English roads not only contributes to the prosperity of the country, but it affords to the parishes and individuals to whom the management of the roads is confided, a subject of self-love and of pride. The least equivocal blame would not fail to stimulate the parish or county which should neglect this branch of its administration; and proceedings would be directed against the overseer of the company who should not fulfil the conditions imposed, in exchange for the receipt of the toll levied. Public opinion, then, or respect for contracted engagements, exercises on this subject a powerful and salutary influence.

In general, roads which may be called of the first class, are under the control of the counties, which cause them to be executed, or give them over to companies who remunerate themselves in the receipt of tolls for the advances made. These tolls are often granted to parishes.

It is to this system, repudiated in France, that England is indebted for those numerous communications so well adapted to her general and local wants. Here, the opening or the completion of a road, or the building of a bridge, depends not on the consent of the governors, or the state of the budget. Public interest alone resolves the question. If the opening of a road is a work of no utility, it presents, in the produce of the toll appropriated to it, the means of covering the expenses of its construction. In the contrary supposition, it will not be undertaken; and in one and the other hypotheses, public interest is the clearest appreciator of what is most valuable to the public good. The same rule applies to the completion and repair of roads. If the road is a very considerable thoroughfare, it is undertaken with greater care. The expense of repairing it is in proportion to the wear and tear; but the amount of toll also increases in the ratio of the travelling. Lastly, the repair, the degree of perfection in the travelling, and the general good management, are always secured by the power reserved to other companies, of establishing a rivalry by creating a parallel road or a fragment of one.

The fear of this opposition produces an effect observable at every step. In the beginning, English roads are made with the greatest parsimony. Their dimensions are calculated on the strictest computation of the amount of travelling. They are always made upon the ground on which the old roads stood. Hence they are subjected to all the irregularities which the local casualties and the jumble of properties rendered inseparable from the old roads. They economise in the terraces. The declivities preserve their rapid inclination. The roads are encased in excavations surmounted with thick hedges, or they run to the surface of the soil, no effort being made to correct the inequalities. But in proportion as the necessity of improvement is better appreciated, as the produce of the toll increases—as the probability of all augmenting it by improvements which would bring a great number of strangers is felt, improvements are undertaken. You see declivities softened down, widening losing their steepness, and often wholly disappearing to give place to straight lines and to a greater development of breadth. Thus the road reaches a degree of perfection commensurate with its utility.

The nature of the soil also contributes much to the good condition of the roads. In general the soil is a very strong one. Gravel is found every where at a short distance, and in order to obtain it, it is only necessary to raise a thin coat of vegetable soil, which covers a quarry of very hard and abundant silex. In places where a sufficiency of gravel is not to be obtained, recourse is had to freestone, and oftener still to a gravel drawn from quarries, sometimes very far distant, and brought by sea, or upon canals, or railways, to the neighbourhood of the places at which they are required. It is from the quarries of Scotland that London is supplied with the incalculable quantity of granite necessary for the keeping in repair her streets, which are nearly all macadamised.

The nature of the transport, and the form of the carriages, add their effect to those causes which contribute to the good condition of the roads.

The multiplicity of canals and of navigable rivers, and their application to the transport of materials of great weight, relieve the roads from all carriages except those adapted to light burdens. The rare exceptions to the contrary, far from being prejudicial, appear on the contrary to be advantageous, owing to the extreme breadth and the eccentric nature of the felloes, as well as to the exclusive employment of chariots with four wheels. The manner of travelling has also its effect; carriages do not follow each other in convoys as in France. They do not move in each other's track, and consequently create no ruts.

The roads are, therefore, chiefly resorted to by carriages on springs, very light when compared with those employed for the same purpose in other countries, and which, moving on a uniform surface, without selecting, in preference, one part above another of that surface, present an equal weight, and never that degree of absolute pressure, producing those jerks so frequent on badly made roads.

Lastly, one of the principal causes of the good condition of the roads is to be found in the proper application of the enormous sums expended, not in the formation, but in the minute repair of the roads.* These sums are at least quadruple those expended in France for the same object, though the causes of deterioration are much less powerful, and the price of materials less.

The breadth of roads varies according to the circumstances which mingle in their plan, not only from one road to another, but from one portion to another of the same road. If the land necessary to the making or chalking out the straight line of a road is of little value, the roads are made broad. If a considerable expense would result from raising the roads, or from the purchase of a greater extent of ground, the roads are reduced to the dimensions strictly necessary. Between rows of houses and in places where clearings, levellings, or embankments are necessary, the roads are narrow. The want of breadth is supplied in all that is necessary to the safety of travellers, by gates carefully kept up. In the mountains of Scotland, and in Wales, the sides of precipices are rendered secure, or rather indicated, by finger posts of stone painted according to their height in white and black strokes, in order to be easily distinguished in the night, or in the midst of snow.

In general, the breadth of the roads, with the exception of London and the great towns, does not exceed eight metres; but the whole of this breadth is covered over with stone. Accordingly, though not so broad as those of France, they afford room for passengers.

The additional quantity of stones required does not create any other pecuniary outlay than an advance in the capital appropriated to the formation of the road; for no additional expense of keeping the road in repair is the consequence. As the carriages that travel on a road only occupy the space allowed for covering it over with stone, it matters little what part they go over.

This mode contributes in another way to the preservation of roads. The water runs away more easily, because it is not stopped by the spongy earth which forms the useless deposits on the roads of France. Thus the soil of the road is constantly preserved from a humidity, which in the opposite system is kept there by the infiltration of the waters, which stagnate on the side of the road. The small dimensions of the materials, and the mode of their employment, add their effect to the causes just enumerated.

The English roads have neither ditches nor elevations. They are almost flat. The waters run off by the aid of the almost insensible convexity which is given to them, and still more by the entire absence of ruts, the very appearance of which is guarded against by a careful superintendence. The waters are received on either side of the road by a species of gutters paved in broken stones with flood-gates. They are conducted by other gutters, or small ditches, to those spots where they cease to be hurtful to the road. The purchase of land necessary to the site for ditches is thus economised, and the very considerable expense of their construction and repair, as well as the deterioration occasioned by the stagnation of the waters which penetrate from the ditches to the ground of the chaussées, are likewise saved.

Another system in the making of roads, a system due to the genius of Mr. Telford, appears to prevail over that of Mr. Macadam, from which it differs in this respect, that, in place of a convexity, the road receives a decided inclination from one to the other of its sides, and that the largest of the stones is only about one third of the thickness of that of Mr. Macadam, or eight to nine centimetres.

The inclination given to the road is said to render the draught easier, because, whilst the declivity of the wheels diminishes the rubbing against the axle-tree, the collar, by pressing more on one shoulder of the horse than on the other, procures for the animal a kind of relief which alternates each time that circumstances vary the direction of the inclination. Experiments, the results of which have not carried conviction to my mind, appear to have given to this double observation, in the eyes of the English engineers, the character of an undeniable truth.

The reduction of the thickness of the travelling is but perhaps a strained application of the principle established by Mr. Macadam, that the inferior or lower coats of gravel being placed so as to establish a sort of anvil, on which the superior coats are bruised under the pressure of the wheels, it was advisable to diminish as much as possible the thickness and do away with the resistance of the first, and to place the others on a soil which, owing to its flexibility, would obviate a part of this inconvenience, by only exposing the stones to the action of one of those forces which bring about the destruction of the road. This is a true and proper system, provided you admit that which exists in England, a careful keeping in repair of the roads.

The first cost of the making of roads, already reduced by the causes enumerated, is still more so by the slowness of the stones. It is seldom that these layers have a greater depth than twenty-five centimetres. They are laid in trenches, without curb-stones, on a soil strengthened by the rolling-stone; and when the ground is of bad quality, upon a bed of marl, of the remnants of buildings, of the sand of old roads, &c.

The stones are reduced to the size of a hen's egg, and covered over with round flints of still smaller dimension. These materials are passed through a sieve or skreen, the intervals of which reject those stones that exceed the requisite size.

The dust and mud are carefully scraped off with the help of rakes, and oftener still by brooms, for which, considering the excellent state of the roads, large rakes, drawn by horses, might be substituted, as their oblique forms would sweep down to the sloping side of the road the materials which should be removed from it.

Holes or ruts are seldom repaired, because it is remarked that the stones applied to this operation are soon reduced to powder; and besides the jerk which they give to carriages, they injure that part of the road contiguous to the part repaired. When a partial repair is needed, it is put off till repairs are about to be commenced to a certain extent of road. Partial repairs take place by applying the pick-axe to the surface of the road, which hinders the new stones from rolling about, and disposes them to embody themselves with the old ones, by the aid of a light coat of stones, of equal size and compactness. These layers are placed on the road whenever, by the grinding into powder of the first coat of gravel, the second would be exposed.

The stones are broken by the hand on anvils of cast-iron, framed in a species of hopper, open on the side of the workman. The whole machine has the form of a wheel-barrow. Thrown in shovels into the hopper, the stones are afterwards placed one by one on the anvil by means of an iron ring, fixed to a shaft, or handle, which the workman holds in his left hand, and broken by the aid of a hammer, the head of which presents a hollow space. The precaution taken to pass the stones through a skreen at the moment they are shovelled out, limits the operation of breaking them to those above a certain size, for which it is indispensable.

The skreening is performed thus: the workman who extracts the stones, throws them into a skreen, the rings of which are three or four centimetres in width, and are composed of thick iron wire. This skreen is supported and moved about by another workman. The stones which have the requisite dimension fall; the rest are placed in heaps, for the purpose of being broken. The same operation is repeated by means of a closer skreen, of a form different from the other, and intended to separate the earth from the stones.

The transport of earth is accomplished with inconceivable economy, order, and rapidity, by means of cars, raised upon iron wheels, thirty centimetres in diameter, and running upon railways. These railways are formed of different pieces of iron, each of sixty centimetres in length, laid upon boards, and fixed into one another by a piece of iron at both ends, in the shape of a swallow tail. The railway is continued in exact proportion with the progress of the works. A single horse performs, with little or no fatigue, the labour of four horses, owing to the greater weight he is enabled to draw with accelerated rapidity. The cars are not jerked on the road, and they experience but a slight deterioration from use. They are easy to load, owing to their little elevation. This practice is attended with inconsiderable expense, which is compensated by the economy introduced in carrying on works upon a larger scale; and it is productive of incalculable advantages to the companies who have undertaken to construct and repair the roads.

The general repair of the roads is confided to road makers, whose employment consists in picking up the surface, in order to spread the stones; in causing the water to run off, and in scraping the mud to either side, whence it is immediately removed, when it is not intended to serve for the making of footpaths.

The greater number of roads offer to the pedestrian a footpath a metre and a half broad, and raised to an elevation of from fifteen to twenty centimetres. These footpaths are covered with a small gravel, unfit for the pavement of the road. The gutter intended for the carrying away of the water, is made on the inner side of the trottoir, or footpath. Aqueducts, formed by the junction of three boards, of four bricks, or of hollow tiles placed upon flat ones, afford abundant outlets to the water. On many roads, the footpaths are only made successively, by means of the dust and mud scraped from the road: but care is always taken to leave room for them in chalking out the plan of the road.

Those roads which in France are called Vicinales, are repaired after the same manner. Their breadth rarely exceeds five metres. The means of repair are furnished, as in France, by what is legally called Prestation en Nature, unless the importance of the road, or the want of resources to contribute to its formation or its support, does not render the establishment of a toll necessary, which is never refused by parliament when the reasonableness of such toll shall have been made apparent by enquiry.

The talent of professional engineers is rendered of little use, owing to the simplicity of the mode employed in the making of roads. It is almost a matter of routine. Each parish finds, in the disinterested zeal of some of its inhabitants, all the knowledge and practice required in this branch of its administration. Bridges of brick are usually built by the mason of the village. On the turnpike roads, members of the company by whom the road is farmed, or of the committee of the county, are charged with the direction of the works. Engineers are rarely called in, unless to build bridges over large rivers or canals. The direction of the English roads is carefully indicated by the aid of finger posts, placed wherever there are branch or cross communications. Other finger posts, placed at the boundaries of villages, enable the traveller to ascertain their respective names. The distances are marked by milestones. Within ten miles of London, the roads are watered, during the summer, at the expense of companies to whom the undertaking belongs. This inconvenient practice is pushed to such extremes as to produce a liquid mud in the streets of London, even in the hottest weather. The object is less the comfort of the traveller, than the preservation of the road. Macadamization has been very generally substituted in the streets of London, and in those of most towns, in lieu of the old pavement. The result has been a remarkable economy, a better adaptation for travelling, a great reduction in the repairs of carriages, and an increase in the duration of the labour of horses. This system should be unhesitatingly adopted, provided a sufficient quantity of materials, of good quality, can be had at a moderate price. In some of the streets of London, stones drawn from neighbouring quarries are em-

* In general, the relation in number and extent between roads of the first class or great roads, and parish roads, is as one to four. The keeping the first in repair costs annually 160*l.* sterling (4000 fr.) per mile, or 400*l.* sterling (10,000 fr.) per league.

The cost of keeping the second class of roads in repair is 40*l.* sterling (1000 fr.) per mile, or 100*l.* sterling (2500 fr.) per league. The average expense of all kinds of road is 68*l.* sterling (1760 fr.) per mile, or 170*l.* sterling (4250 fr.) per league.

Unforeseen expenses are calculated at 10-100ths, such as the charges of committees, lawyers' fees, &c.

Extraordinary repairs and improvements are comprised in the computation of the average expense of roads.

played. In the greater portion of the other streets, as well as in all the towns where cheap water carriage is available, the materials are transported from the Scottish coast. Paris, and the towns and roads in the vicinity of the Seine, might, by means of the navigation of this river, procure from the coasts of Cherbourg, granite, the durability of which would amply compensate for the cost of transport.

On comparing the roads of England, without rusts, without holes, without ditches, with the broad and miry sloughs which are conventionally called roads in France, one cannot deny the superiority of the one system over the other; but, at the same time, the difficulty of transporting the English system, and establishing it on similar bases in France, must be admitted. The conditions of locality, of administration, of habits, are too different. One might, however, say to the French government, "Send your engineers to England, let them study what is done there. If the systems they observe cannot be adopted as a whole, at least many of the details are susceptible of beneficial application. The roads are better in England, therefore the means resorted to for making them are preferable to those employed in France. They present facilities for all kinds of transport, in which those of France are wanting. Borrow, therefore, what is good in the English system. Do not hastily adopt innovations, but do not entirely set your face against them. Try the system partially, render the application of it more general, when its advantages shall be clearly demonstrated. Set out with this principle, that the mode of making and repairing the roads in France is evidently bad, since it produces such bad results. Ameliorate with prudence, but do not reject ameliorations."

CANALS.

England is completely intersected by water communications. Some of these are destined to carry on the trade of the capital with the commercial and manufacturing towns, others to communicate from one country to another. To these vast ramifications numerous smaller canals are attached. These latter serve for the transport of the produce of coal mines or manufactories, or for local wants; they are always proportioned to the exigency for which they have been created. When the boats which ply on them reach the larger canals or rivers, they are chained together, and arrive thus at their destination without the necessity of transshipments, which would occasion expense, a great loss of time, and the deterioration of the merchandise.

Nothing is simpler or more economical than the mode adopted for the construction of canals. In order to avoid the risking of considerable sums on enterprises the result of which would be uncertain, a provisional character is given to the work. Narrow dimensions, sluices, and bridges of wood, the substitution of inclined planes for sluices, the interruption even of the canal itself, and the adoption of land carriage when serious difficulties intervene, which could not be overcome without heavy expense,—these are the expedients adopted in England, expedients which would be utterly rejected in a country like France, where nothing is admitted which has not a durable and monumental character. This will explain the multiplicity of this kind of enterprises in one country, and their extreme rarity in the other.

Thanks to this wise system of proceeding, public prosperity, in England, spreads and penetrates every where by the aid of channels which she knows how to open, without display, without ostentation, almost without attracting notice. All this is achieved by a combination of private interests, that powerful engine which is employed as a balance to weigh the considerations for and against the realisation of the project, and, at the same time, as a lever to remove the obstacles which would oppose its completion.

RAILWAYS.

Those iron roads called railways have become useful auxiliaries to canals. Perhaps indeed they may be substituted, in a great number of localities, for the latter, over which they present, in some respects, a marked advantage. The expense of making them is less considerable; they are less prejudicial to the property they traverse; they require less incidental labour or repair; they are not affected by the drought which dries up the waters of canals, nor the frost which impedes their navigation. By means of the application of steam to wheel machinery, heavier burdens may thus be more rapidly transported. All circumstances are in favour of railways, in a country in which iron and coal are cheap, and it is presumable they will prevail, at least in the projected communications.

The most important work of this kind is the railway between Manchester and Liverpool. The cutting through of mountains, the raising of enormous embankments upon valleys, the construction of a road over canals and bridges, thus presenting the phenomena of three modes of transport achieved by different principles,—such are the prodigies effected by this recent railway, on which you travel a distance of thirty-two miles (twelve leagues and a half) in eighty minutes. The success which it has obtained cannot fail to give rise to other railways in many localities, and above all in the environs of London, where celerity of communication is deemed of such importance.

THE THAMES TUNNEL.

Among the works of an extraordinary character, that which has for its object to connect the opposite banks of the Thames, by means of a vaulted tunnel dug under the bed of the river, deserves particular notice. A French engineer conceived and attempted this enterprise, and thanks to the efforts of a genius no less ardent than fruitful in resources, and superior to the obstacles which presented themselves at every step of a soil of capricious variety, which it was impossible to have foreseen, Mr. Brunel has executed the half of his daring plan. The whole would, by this time, have been completed, had not the discouraged share holders refused the requisite pecuniary advances.

As a monument of art, as well as for the interests of two populous quarters of London, this prodigious undertaking should be carried on, in which the greatest difficulties have been surmounted, and the success of which is placed beyond all doubt.

SUSPENSION-BRIDGES.

If suspension-bridges are not so numerous in England as in France, it is because they are made in the former country with too much perfection and expense. They are found too dear for works of a limited duration, and stone or brick bridges are very properly preferred to them. The price of these does not much exceed the cost of suspension-bridges, as built in England. These latter are therefore only employed in localities where it would be impossible to construct any other bridge. Such is the Menai bridge, which traversing an arm of the sea of three or four hundred metres in breadth, unites the island of Anglesea to the Welsh mainland. The largest vessels pass with all their masts under the Menai bridge. Such too will be the bridge about to be constructed by Mr. Brunel, near Bristol, from the rocks of Clifton to the hills which bound the left bank of the Avon. The elevation of this bridge above the river will exceed that of the towers of Westminster. On attentively considering the Hamersmith suspension-bridge, and calculating the sums which it has cost, one can account for the reluctance of the English to the system of suspension-bridges. With the exceptions resulting from its convenience to certain localities, this system should only be employed when, as in France, powerful economical considerations counterbalance those inconveniences which attend it.

However minute the details which have been dwelt upon, they fail to convey even a remote idea of the means employed, in England, for the purpose of creating the different species of communications which exist in that country. This notice can only explain to the reader, that, in these matters, much more is accomplished in England, and with greater economy and effect, than in any other part of the world. The reason is, that private interest alone decides on the utility of the different speculations, and on the means necessary to ensure success. The study of these means is of high importance to all those who are destined to direct any branch of public economy. Such study cannot be too much recommended to the administrators and engineers of France. It would convey to the former useful notions as to the manner of conciliating general and private interests, and the latter might learn to abate the extravagance of their projects, and to guard against inordinate expense in the execution of the works confided to them. Both would convince themselves by a comparison of what is done in England, with what is extravagantly projected, without being executed, in France, that it is better to have a narrow and well repaired road laid down in the soil, than a larger and more imposing one upon paper; a quickly built wooden bridge, than a stone one, of which many generations will not see the completion; a canal of small dimensions, opened as soon as its utility shall be acknowledged, than an artificial river whose bed is dug, in France, before the projector has ascertained where he can find water to fill it; in a word, that it is necessary to devote as small a capital as possible to the erection of public works, and to refuse nothing that is needful to the perfection of the undertaking.

A VISIT TO ABBOTSFORD.

Whilst Sir Walter Scott affected to set a great value upon a state of comparative obscurity, he has succeeded in obtaining imperishable renown, and in turning it to advantage in his lifetime. I do not make this a ground of reproach to him, for never was celebrity established upon a more honourable basis, springing as it did from the most exalted talent and virtues of the highest order. I but state a fact which may be interesting to those to whom the smallest trait concerning men of genius is a matter of lively interest. Sir Walter Scott was of the number. In attracting, however, the public attention, he did not confine himself to the publication of novels, which are every where read and admired; he sought to stimulate the public curiosity by carefully concealing his name, and leaving to the eager curiosity of his readers the task of discovering it. That name was found to belong to a honourable Scotsman, of a cold demeanour, and of a plain and sober features, the plainness of which was well calculated to put to rest all the speculations of the physiognomists, who were prepared to find reflected in the countenance of the author of such lively and varied productions, all that keenness of expression which would have revealed the impenetrable mystery attached to him. It was not the penetration of the public that eventually discovered the author's name; feeling as much wearied at the fruitlessness of their search as they were at their disappointment, he at length disclosed himself.

Sir Walter Scott had laid aside his literary vices many years before my visit to Edinburgh. He resided, at the latter period, at Abbotsford, a country seat about thirty-six miles distant from the capital. Having been informed of the anxious desire I had often expressed to visit the baronet's acquaintance, he was good enough to address me a polite invitation to come and visit him. M— de B— accompanied me. The road to Abbotsford, which it took us seven hours to reach, passed through a mountainous country wholly devoid of picturesque appearance; cultivated, it is true, but yet without embellishments. This road lies at the foot of a valley of monotonous aspect. Within four miles of Abbotsford, Melrose is visible: it is a small town washed by a river, the strand of which is rendered available for manufacturing purposes. Two miles farther on, you cross the Tweed, and arrive by a rapid descent at a chateau of Gothic architecture situated at the foot of a high hill. Recent plantations increase the beauty of an extensive park. On the opposite side, the view, somewhat impeded by mountains, looks on a prairie, at the extremity of which flows the Tweed, her tranquil waters embellishing without animating the landscape.

It is from the court-yard alone that one has a full view of Abbotsford, and can form an idea of the bien entendu of its architecture. Sir Walter Scott, who has drawn the middle ages for his subjects as well as his characters, seems also to have recurred to that epoch for the style of an architecture which he has adopted with all its originality, and with all its faults, even to its minutest details. That irregularity which is the reproach of the chateaux of the eleventh century, exists at Abbotsford in a most remarkable degree. The architect must have combined many odd whims of fancy or memory, as he has done the form and the dimensions of the windows, and to load many parts of the façades of the building with the most incongruous ornaments, in order to render the whole a unique specimen of the confusion of all order.

A peristyle attached to the house conducts you to a large room, in which are ranged arms and armoury of all ages and countries, as well as other varied objects of curiosity. To the left is a narrow hall, whence you pass into the dining-room, which communicates with the drawing-room. At the end of the drawing-room is an apartment of spacious dimensions, appropriated to a library, filled with rare and choice works tastefully bound in the Gothic style. At one end of the library is a door, which communicates with Sir Walter's study. A dark narrow staircase, with high steps, leads you to the first story, on which are many small rooms; you are conducted to them by a narrow corridor, in which two persons cannot walk abreast.

The furniture of this singular mansion is in perfect keeping with its architecture. The greater part is of historical origin; and the original destination of many articles is marked on brass plates, which have been engraved for the purpose. In order to form a correct idea of the richness and variety of this collection, it should be known that all men of rank and fortune in the three kingdoms contributed to furnish the house with many curious articles in their possession; and that Abbotsford has thus become a sort of museum, uniting in itself all, that the country in which the feudal system has prevailed the longest, could supply of most value in that character.

As we were about to alight from our carriage, we saw approaching us as quickly as a halt would permit him, a gentleman, supporting himself on a cane, apparently from fifty-five to sixty years of age; thick set, of middle stature, of a pleasing rather than expressive countenance. Some grey hairs mingled with the fold of perfectly white locks which fell carelessly on his shoulders. His eyes were blue, small, and apparently without expression. His nose was deeply and thickly set, and his cheeks full and fleshy! There was altogether a sickly air about his person, but particularly in the expression of his head. At any other place than Abbotsford, we could never have suspected him to be the man, the fame of whose celebrity was spread over the literary world. Such was Sir Walter Scott.

He received us with unostentatious hospitality, was penurious in words, but prodigal in kindness. In a few moments we were welcomed, lodged, and made acquainted with the customs of the house. Our host excused himself for his inability to converse with us in French, which he understood, but could not speak. Our superficial knowledge of the English language made us regret exceedingly this circumstance; which, in a measure, prevented us from judging, as we ought, a mind which we came purposely to study.

We entered the drawing-room, preceded by two immense greyhounds and two Scottish terriers, the constant companions of the baronet. We were presented to Miss Scott, then to three or four neighbours, and lastly to some members of the family, who, together, composed the party then staying at Abbotsford. At this interview Miss Scott, who, though her mother was a Frenchwoman, does not speak our language, evinced no inclination to contribute, even in her own, to a conversation which her father strove to keep up by common-place remarks. After a little we broke ground on a subject which we conceived most likely to be agreeable to our host, by rendering the homage of our praise to his varied works, and by leading the conversation to those particular productions of his pen which are connected with the history and romance of the middle ages. Our efforts were vain. The remarks which we made could not animate our host; and the brevity of his replies caused the conversation to flag.

Sir Walter conducted us to the apartments destined for our use. I sat down in an arm-chair embroidered by Mary Stuart, opposite a portrait of Henry Darnley; on a table which had belonged to the Earl of Essex, was placed a small mirror which had reflected the features of Anne Boleyn. This furniture recalled ideas to my mind which I in vain tried to suppress. Proscribed, and under sentence of an inexorable tribunal, at the very moment I was looking at these objects, it is not wonderful that a certain similitude of misfortune should have visibly affected me. Nothing contributes more than exile to the development of sentiments of pity and sympathy.

On entering the drawing-room, I found Miss Scott in a most elegant dress, which appeared to have exercised a very favourable influence on her manners towards the company. From that moment her deportment was graceful in the highest degree. She is remarkably handsome, though she had not made that impression upon us in the morning, owing to the pelisse in which she was wrapped up, and the large straw bonnet which concealed her well-formed features and her animated black eyes.

The dinner was served upon silver in the English style. When the cloth was removed, the ladies retired. The gentlemen remained a full hour later, but the conversation produced no brilliant sally on the part of our host.

On our return to the drawing-room, we found the library door thrown open, which, aided by the lights suspended from the ceiling, enabled us to judge of the extent and fine proportions of this apartment. M. de B—— sat himself down in the library with Sir Walter, whom he was desirous of bringing to the topic of politics, on which in Scotland he was, as well as in literature, a high authority. During the conversation, which was long, and carried on in the language of the respective speakers, I was engaged with Miss Scott and the persons who surrounded her. In spite of, perhaps because of, the difficulty we found in the interchange of our ideas, midnight had arrived before we perceived its approach.

I was up at eight o'clock the next morning, and was taking a survey of the grounds. Sir Walter joined me; gave me, with the utmost complaisance, all the explanations which I desired, and proposed that we should take a detailed view of his library. It was in this conversation that I was enabled to judge of the character of his mind, and satisfied myself that his imagination could not completely shine forth without the aid of his pen. Sparing of observations, he doled out his words succinctly, and in a homely fashion. He seemed generally to want those extensive views which I had supposed him to possess. The observer who had so happily seized the characters of Louis the Eleventh, of Elizabeth, of Mary Stuart, of James the First, as well as the customs and manners of the principal personages of his novels, appeared to have exhausted all his thoughts in his works, and to have left his memory a complete void.

In a word, the author of Waverley, Quentin Durward, the Antiquary, and so many other productions of distinguished merit, appeared indifferent to the object of upholding by his conversation the idea which his works afforded of the power and versatility of his genius; not that he disdain to expend his erudition or his wit in conversation, but that he seemed to want the faculty or the habit of it. It must be said that he was suffering at this time the first attacks of a disease which, eighteen months afterwards, terminated in his dissolution.

That minute spirit of detail which detracts so much from the merit of his works, was apparent in all that he did or said. If he spoke, he dwelt too much on trifles; and in showing his treasures of art and literature, he left nothing to the imagination of the stranger; every trifle was explained. In the distribution of his chateau, in its careful decoration, this wish to examine and show every thing, to find place for every thing, even for objects unworthy of the care bestowed or the descriptions lavished upon them, was evident. It was a necessity of Sir Walter's nature to put forward all that fell to his hand, as well as every idea which passed through his brain. By the side of these trifles, one was often surprised by noble objects, disposed to the best advantage: it is perhaps this very contrast which gives a distinguishing character to Scott's productions. He has written for all classes, for all ages, for all countries, for his publisher, and for himself; he has put into the mouth of the beggar, as well as into that of the king, the very language which both should speak. He has traced out the most remarkable features in the history of France, without being able to speak her language; he has rendered the like service to his own country and to England. For the present generation, content to be amused with all that he has written, as for posterity, which will make its selection amongst them—for both he has laboured: for the one he has composed light and elegant trifles, for the other splendid portraits of manners, characters admirably traced, descriptions full of charming variety. For himself he has also laboured, since he amassed, by the publication of his works, a fortune of many millions of francs, of which a misplaced confidence deprived him,—and acquired a fame which, so far from having ever been contested, has been raised beyond the limits which the most favourable award should have assigned him: all have benefited by his labours.

The country which produced such a man has reason to be proud of his character and productions. He was the subject of general conversation and of universal curiosity; his portrait or his bust was in every house; his most trifling actions, his most insignificant words, were published with a species of importance. He was sought for, he was visited: his chateau, like Ferney, had become the resort of literary pilgrimages—whether absent or present, he received the homage of all. The most indulgent posterity cannot judge him more favourably than his contemporaries have done. It is but justice to the memory of this eminent man to state, that so much flattery in no degree spoiled the goodness and simplicity of his disposition.

Death has just removed him from the world; and the sentiments he inspired have assumed a tinge of enthusiasm bordering on fanaticism. The honours bestowed upon his memory bear the appearance of worship; the theatres ring with his praise; statues are about to be erected to perpetuate his name. The nation interferes in his domestic affairs, anxious to repair them, and to transmit to his children the inheritance of his fortune, with the same anxiety with which it has immortalised his name; and, unable to do more, it has classed him amongst its most distinguished and celebrated men. A nation undoubtedly confers honour upon itself by such bursts of enthusiasm; but this should be moderated by reflection: it should keep some share of admiration in reserve for celebrities of another stamp and of another epoch, and not allow it to be supposed that genius is so exclusive, and so rarely to be met with, as to call forth, when it appears, those eulogiums which ages may elapse before another character shall be found to claim.

EDINBURGH.

There is much to see and to observe in Scotland:—the aspect of the country—the physiognomy of the inhabitants—their manners—their tastes—their affections—their hatreds—which not even a union of nearly three centuries* with England can either change or modify.

It is in the highest degree interesting to study the character of a people who have thus preserved their ancient manners, whilst keeping pace with the rapid advances of civilisation: a people who combine a fidelity to the memory of their unfortunate kings with perfect submission and loyalty to their present sovereign; and who remain altogether Scottish, whilst they are an integral part of Great Britain.

Scotland presents to the eye of the traveller a widely different aspect from that part of England which borders upon it. The town of Berwick rises in the form of an amphitheatre from the left bank of the Tweed. It was formerly protected, and is now commanded, by a castle, the architecture of which belongs to the middle ages. Hills, cultivated to the very summit, succeed to the wooded slopes of Northumberland. Large farms are met with at a great distance from each other, unprotected by any plantation from the damp winds which give a character of monotonous sadness to the country. At still greater intervals are to be seen magnificent chateaux, which, owing to the immense extent of the estates, are less frequently to be met with than in England. On the right, at a short distance from the road, the sea presents at first a boundless aspect, and then appears to force its way through the northern mountains, which indicate in the distance the opening of the Frith of Forth. As we advance, the sea becomes narrower, and forms, as it were, but an imposing feature in one of the most splendid landscapes in the world. Some small islands of most picturesque aspect, a multitude of ships of all sizes and all forms, are now visible; and on the other side of the Forth may be seen numerous mansions, distinguished by their elegant architecture. Such is the panorama, to which a road, otherwise devoid of interest, serves as a species of gallery.

In the vicinity of Edinburgh, the country becomes richer in trees and foliage, in the midst of which country seats are seen, of the most exquisite taste. The monuments on the top of Calton Hill announce, at some distance from the city, the approach to Edinburgh. Before entering the town, you perceive the Gothic castle, which, built on the point of a sharp rock, commands the city and surrounding country. A broad street, intersected at right angles by other streets in perfect keeping with it, conveys at once the idea of an extensive and a splendid city. Edinburgh is that city.

The aspect of Edinburgh cannot be compared to that of any other city with which I am acquainted. From Prince street, containing the principal hotels frequented by strangers, one enjoys a prospect of the Old Town, situated on the ridge of a rising ground of moderate elevation. On the right, the eye reposes on a fortification of the twelfth century, from whose summit is enjoyed the only advantage it now offers, a commanding prospect.

On the left it penetrates through a double range of hills, lying enclosed in a valley, at the extremity of which the Stuarts had built a palace, which was to witness the violent deaths of the greater number of their family, and those scenes of grief and trouble which awaited the remainder, and was to become at a later period the asylum of other royal sorrows.

The space which separates the Old from the New Town serves as a site to two churches, built in an elegant Gothic style, and to an edifice of Grecian architecture, in which the Royal Society of Edinburgh holds its sittings.

A large Gothic building—next to it a succession of high towers, rising one above another, and presenting the effect of a single tower;—then a colonnaded peristyle, of extraordinary magnificence—on the side of the hill, a building of Grecian architecture—all these edifices astonish the beholder by the contrast of their forms, the combined and harmonious effect of their masses, the appropriate selection of their sites. The buildings of which I have thus given the outline, are, a prison, a monument of Nelson, the commencement of an edifice the proportions of which are on the scale of those of the Parthenon, and, lastly, a school. On a terrace, from which the eye commands a full view of the picture, a range of handsome houses has been built, forming what is called Regent's Terrace.

The New Town, which has been created within the last thirty years, should be visited previously to entering the old town. Its streets, no less remarkable for their length and breadth than for the architecture, run from east to west along the horizontal ridge of a hill two miles in extent, and are crossed by other streets of less length, but equally broad, which, owing to their slope, are more difficult to the pedestrian, but afford a much finer prospect. The principal street is terminated by a column rising above the handsome trees of an immense square, and by the façade of an elegant church. The other streets are bounded by edifices or vistas, which fix the attention of the stranger. The end of one of these streets discloses the imposing mass of the old castle; another the bold steeple of a belfry; a third, the fretwork of a Gothic edifice, a view of the bay, or some of the mountains which encircle the city. In a word, the New Town seems to have been built in order to prove what can be effected by a pure taste in architecture, when nature affords a fine site and excellent materials, and man furnishes abundant capital.

You reach the Old Town, either by crossing a bridge thrown over a river, or by a steep descent. This is the town of the Stuarts, with its narrow streets, its lofty houses, its pointed roofs, and its heavy churches, built in the worst taste. Here and there some small passages have of late been widened, some handsome edifices erected, and some sharp descents rendered less perpendicular; but the character of the Old Town has been judiciously left unchanged.

In all respects but its unparalleled site, it resembles most of the cities of the tenth or twelfth century. At this remote epoch, it was the custom to build towns, without order or symmetry, on the sides of hills commanded by a rock, the summit of which was calculated for the erection of massy walls and bulwarks, of a castle, in short, well adapted to the unrefined taste of that period, and to resist all attack. Under the protection of such a fortress, a town will have arisen, the circuit of which, undulating with the inequality of the soil, connected itself with the system of defence of the castle. Here, in the midst of those agitations created by the state of uncertainty in which a rising society found itself, shelter will have been afforded to an alternately warlike, commercial, and civilised people.

Edinburgh possesses a school of medicine and many hospitals. For six days in the week, the town presents the spectacle of an active and industrious people occupied in the ardent pursuit of commerce and manufactures, and exhibits a more bustling aspect than most of the English towns, owing to the more numerous population contained within a smaller space. On the Sunday, however, the scene suddenly changes. Puritanism then exercises all its rigour and austerity, and reigns despotic. The streets are quite deserted by the inhabitants; and if one meets a few solitary passengers, they are sure to be strangers, astonished, as it were, to find themselves alone in a great capital, in the streets of which they could hardly force a passage the evening before, owing to the dense crowd passing to and fro in every direction.

On the first sound of the church bell, which ushers in the Sabbath, long files of devout Christians proceed solemnly along the streets on their way to church. All appears silent as the grave when this noiseless movement ceases; nor is the stillness of the scene interrupted till the conclusion of divine service enables the crowd to return home. They meet again in the evening to listen to endless sermons, that supply the place of the profane amusements in which other countries, less rigid in their religious feelings, are wont to indulge. No one drives to church; and the only vehicles met with are some of the public mails, or private carriages, the owners of which hope to escape, by driving into the country, the ennui which could not fail to await them in town.

Religion in Scotland forbids every thought, and the law every act, which have not God for their object. For twenty-four hours, one is not permitted to do more than pray or meditate, with folded arms, in an attitude of devotion. The most innocent games and recreations—even music is forbidden, and one must only speak of matters relating to religion or divine worship.

Edinburgh, like the greater part of English towns, has no public promenades; but the flags of its large and open streets, and the mountains in its vicinity, in a great measure supply the want.

The great desideratum in Scotland is a milder climate, which would permit one to enjoy the varied aspect of that beautiful country. "Does it always rain in Scotland?"

was our question to Sir Walter Scott. "Not always," he replied; "it occasionally snows." This joke is not altogether devoid of truth. The atmosphere is humid, foggy, and charged with violent winds. In summer alone can one rely on many days of fine weather; and therefore it is that those excursions into the Highlands, to which the beauties of the site, with its romantic scenery, invite the traveller, can seldom terminate without some degree of disappointment, unless they be undertaken between intervals of rain, when you still are in fear of a return of unfavourable weather. Summer is the only season which admits of an exception to this rule.

HOLYROOD.

During the period of my sojourn at Edinburgh, Charles X. and his august and unfortunate family resided at Holyrood. It was a sentiment of duty, of gratitude, and affection, which called me to their abode. I had served the Bourbons all my life; they had been always kind to me and mine. They desired the happiness of their country; and they had succeeded in procuring it. They would have fixed that happiness upon a firm basis, if the spirit of faction had not impeded them. I owed them every respect and attachment, and came to acquit myself of these duties.

The palace of Holyrood, which the king inhabited, is composed of a façade terminated at either end by a species of wing or pavilion, flanked by small towers. To this pavilion are joined the wings of a modern building. The square court formed by this disposition of the building is surrounded by arcades, resembling the cloisters of ancient monasteries. The principal building and the two wings, built long after the façade, which appertained to the palace of the Scottish kings, are of an extremely simple architecture. To the left, as you enter, is the apartment formerly occupied by Mary Stuart. The furniture remains in the same condition in which it existed during the life-time of this princess; and is indeed carefully preserved. The portraits of Rizzio, placed in the most conspicuous parts of the wainscot, and over the chimney of the oratory, attest the undisguised openness of the princess's affections. The cicerone of the palace was very anxious to make me perceive on the flooring the blood of the Italian who fell under the daggers of his assassins; but, whether owing to the darkness of the place, or to my incredulity, I must freely confess I saw no trace of blood, though I was guilty of the perhaps pardonable politeness of saying that I perceived it. This is a species of complaisance which is pleasing to Scotsmen, and which a well-bred man should not refuse.

The approach to Holyrood is through numerous small and filthy streets, or rather lanes, occupied by the lowest and most wretched class of the population. The palace is in one of those valleys which intersect Edinburgh: and it would appear as if the palace itself had been destined for the reception of illustrious exiles, with whose misfortunes it was intended to be in keeping, for nothing can be more gloomy than its position, between two mountains of the most sombre aspect, which offered to its inmates no other vista than the skies, every earthly prospect being shut out from view. The internal distribution of the palace presents a suite of immense apartments, the walls of which are imperfectly concealed by ancient tapestry. Antique chairs, Gothic sofas, the dilapidated state of which was disguised by Indian calico, beds with serge curtains, and a billiard-table;—these composed the whole of the furniture. The reception given to the descendants of Louis the Fourteenth, in this habitation of the Stuarts, could not fail to prove to them that Holyrood had changed hands. It seemed as if, implacable in her recollections of the past, the usurpation which had deprived the Stuarts of their rights, designed to call to the bar of its tribunal a family of kings fugitive in its turn, and to arraign the generous hospitality which, in the days of its power, it had bestowed upon another royal family, whose fate afforded matter for such painful comparisons.

At St. Germain, the sovereign of the palace descended the staircase to receive at the door the wandering English monarch; but at Holyrood the exiled French monarch was not soothed by the like consolation. At Holyrood, instead of a powerful sovereign, a hall-porter, with a bunch of keys in his hand, did the honours, and opened the doors of apartments cold, cheerless, and desolate. In place of a strong box filled with gold, for the use of the exiled monarch's privy purse, there lay on the table certain filthy papers hardly legible; writs of capias, and writs of seizure of effects, were the consolations which met the eye of the exiled monarch in a foreign land. The brutal indifference of the nineteenth century was substituted for the delicate and sumptuous courtesy of the seventeenth; in fine, a constitutional king of England was the host, instead of an absolute monarch of France; William the Fourth instead of Louis the Fourteenth. I shall avoid mixing up with details calculated only to gratify an idle curiosity, other recitals of a graver character, and replete with instruction, which are exclusively the province of history. I will not describe those scenes of sorrow when three generations of kings opposed, to the assaults of misfortune, a calm dignity, unembittered remembrances of past grandeur and hopes, with which no feelings of resentment were mingled. I will not paint the suffering virtues of him from whose mouth no word of hatred or revenge has ever fallen, and who has never expressed a wish which had not for its object the happiness of France; neither will I relate how, as in the days of their power and prosperity, distress was no sooner known than relieved; every other habit of the Tuileries had been laid aside; this alone was preserved. The playful innocence, the graceful deportment, the precocious talents of a child, threw even a charm over the sadness of the meeting at Holyrood. Happiness in the choice of words carelessly scattered here and there during the progress of his amusements, sallies of wit announcing not only a lively imagination but a judgment already formed, an elevated mind, called up the expression of real pleasure in countenances to whose features an expression of grief had become familiar.

The good-nature of the Duke de Bordeaux is apparent in those frequent acts of munificence and charity which the sight of misfortune never fails to elicit. His memory is not only retentive but well stored. He speaks with equal fluency the French, German, Italian, and English languages. Gymnastic exercises, to which he had been early accustomed, tended to develop in him a dexterity and elegance of manners which distinguish his deportment and all his movements, and could not fail to attract notice, were he not drawn by his birth and premature importance, an object of general and undisguised interest.

The following anecdotes will give an idea of his cultivated mind, and the readiness and tact of his replies. When the exiled family was about to quit Leith Castle, where they had taken up their temporary abode on their first arrival, in order to repair to Edinburgh, his sister, who, it had been arranged, should proceed by way of London, entertained her brother with the pleasure she should have in visiting the capital. "Will you see me," said the young princess, "that can possibly interest you in a sea voyage?" "The coast of France," was his reply. And the ill concealed emotion started into his eye, and drew corresponding tones from all who heard a reply, inspired by so affecting a sentiment, expressed with such dignified simplicity.

On my departure from London for Edinburgh, the dame, Duchess of Berri, begged of me to convey to her son a dog of which he was extremely fond, and the loss of which, in consequence of the events of July, had occasioned him inexpressible grief. The unexpected recovery of the dog, of which he had given up all hope, might be supposed to have left the young prince little leisure to attend to a visit of pure etiquette; such, however, was not the case. The carcases of poor Zami, her evident delight in seeing her master, did not interfere for a moment with that dignity with which he deemed it becoming to receive me.

I shortened a visit which the prince might find long, but I had an opportunity of judging, from the adjoining apartment where I remained a few moments, that resolution the royal child must have displayed when he could thus check, in my presence, the expression of those bursts of joy, to which he now gave free vent, in carrying his favourite dog so unexpectedly restored to him. The archers of Edinburgh wished the young prince to assist at their sports. One of their body asked me to inform him whether the duke would do them the honour to accept their invitation. The answer in the affirmative, which I was directed to return, caused preparations to be made for the prince's reception.

On the day appointed, the prince found the company in full costume, with a bow, arrows, gloves, and every thing necessary for the sport, in readiness for him.

His first attempts in archery were not successful. His impatience was about to spoil his sport: when, recalled to his self-possession by a few words whispered to him by his under-governor, he requested the captain of the company to show him the manner of taking aim. He drew his bow and reached the mark. On a second attempt, he proved equally successful; and he would have ventured a third time, had he not been advised not to compromise the reputation he had just acquired.

"Sir," said the duke to the captain, "your company is full, I suppose?"

"No, monseigneur," replied the captain.

"Will you admit another archer?" said the duke. "Will you have me?"

"We should be too highly honoured," said the captain.

"Where is your muster-roll?" said the prince. "I wish to inscribe my name;" and on the moment, the muster-roll was honoured with the name of a Bourbon. A few days afterwards, the archers presented to the prince a complete uniform of their company. The Duke of Bordeaux exhibits a marked predilection for every thing that relates to military science, a predilection that would, no doubt, materially interfere with his other studies, if care were not taken to control and regulate it.

The best encouragement that can be held out to him, is the promise of allowing him to witness military evolutions. One day, when attending a review, he was struck with the martial air which a pair of huge mustachios gave to one of the officers.

"How fine these mustachios look!" said he; "would that mine were already grown!" At this moment, his eye directed itself to the seamed and war-worn countenance of one of his suite, who had a slash on his cheek. "There is," said he, "something better still than mustachios—an honourable scar, like that which distinguishes Lavillate. Let but the occasion arise, and I will do my best to be like him." So saying, he threw himself into the arms of the officer, and embraced with enthusiasm the proud record of his bravery.

These anecdotes, selected from a countless number, afford sufficient indications of the generous and dignified sentiments which adorn this youthful prince, and are a presage of what we may expect from an education directed upon the soundest principles, and pursued in the school of misfortune.

The noble character of the Scots exhibited itself in the conduct of the inhabitants of Edinburgh towards the royal family of France. If our princes were unsparing of acts of bounty, the generous people who profited by them were not slow in testifying their gratitude.

Wherever the king went, the most profound respect was manifested towards him by persons of every shade of political opinion. The lower classes of society, to whose necessities the purse of Charles X. was always open, exhibited not only a sentiment of respect, but of affection to their generous benefactor. May we not trace in those points of resemblance (of which the Scots have, perhaps, an instinctive rather than a settled idea) that are found to exist between the misfortunes of a royal family still vivid in their recollections, and the more recent sorrows of another, the origin of the species of veneration which they evinced towards the royal exiles, when they came to seek, in the palace of the Stuarts, that asylum denied them in the land on which they had conferred every blessing during a sway of eight centuries? However overwhelming their adversity, however signal their bounties, was it possible that respect and gratitude could, in the short space of two years, cause an attachment so powerful as to give to separation the character of public calamity, felt alike by men of all parties and of all religious beliefs? Assuredly not. The homage paid to the exiled Bourbons must have had a retrospect to the unfortunate Stuart family.

General sorrow, I may say desolation, was manifested throughout the town, when it was known that the king had determined to quit Edinburgh. The most lively regrets were expressed by the magistrates, the corporations, and all who had an opportunity of approaching the person of his majesty.

The day of departure was a memorable one. The whole population lined the road from Holyrood to Leith, where the embarkation was to take place. The streets, the windows, nay, even the tops of the houses, from whence a last farewell could be taken of the illustrious exiles, were filled with spectators of the affecting scene.

As propriety did not admit of those popular demonstrations which are only exhibited towards native sovereigns, the people of Scotland supplied the place of these affectionate testimonies by a more touching mark of delicacy. It was arranged that each person in the vast crowd should wave, in silence, either a white handkerchief or riband, as the cortège should pass along. By so doing, the people presented to the royal view a colour which recalled the recollection of more prosperous times. A generous flattery dispelled, for a moment at least, from a heart in which grief had taken up her abode, those sensations consequent upon existing misfortune, and threw over the past a consoling remembrance, which would afford a resting-place to hope, whenever it should have to recall the days of past sorrow and regret.

SCOTTISH SOCIETY.

All that hospitality presents as most attractive to a stranger—all that knowledge offers as most varied, are found combined in the society of Edinburgh. In no city in Europe does he find a greater anxiety displayed to win his good opinion. These dispositions appear inspired by the desire to set off to advantage a land cherished by the natives with an attachment bordering upon worship.

The Scots have considerable pretensions to science, and to a certain degree of perfection in the arts. Each individual seeks to excel in some particular branch; from this desire results a more general education than exists elsewhere, and a necessity of displaying it. This, which at the first blush might appear a questionable merit, is, in truth, a real advantage.

The Scottish ladies exhibit a laudable desire to please, and the greater part of them attain their object. Tall, of fair complexion, and fairer skin, they are in general rather handsome than pretty. They atone for that delicacy of feature which nature sometimes denies them, by their gifted minds and graceful manners. One can hardly remain for a few moments in the society of a Scottish lady, without being convinced that they succeed in the most important object of woman's life—in the talent of pleasing. Their beauty is resplendent at a ball; their wit imparts to their conversation an uncommon interest; in point of education, and in their system of domestic economy, they do not differ from Englishwomen.

Scotsmen are serious yet urbane in their manners; their politeness is more plant than that of their English neighbours, and adapts itself more readily to continental forms. They possess in the highest degree an expression indicative of readiness to oblige, a character of hospitality and benevolence, which are never belied when their sincerity is put to the test.

They are in general of high stature, and have paid homage to that physical quality, by creating a club in the capital, under the name of the Six Feet Club. To be six feet in height is an indispensable condition of admittance. Without the adventitious aid of such a stature, the bravest soldier, the most distinguished writer, could not obtain admission. Wallace himself, if he returned to earth with the short stature accorded to him by history—Sir Walter Scott, who, without being a short man, was not of the required height—would both necessarily have been rejected.

NATIONAL CHARACTER.

The affection of Scotland for the last members of the house of Stuart was a sentiment long preserved in the national breast. This affection was fostered by the attempts of that unfortunate family to recover the throne, and by the very measures so energetically adopted to repress it. Even now they cherish a tender and religious sentiment for the memory of the Stuarts; a sentiment which, perhaps, throws an air of coldness over their feelings towards a sovereign imposed upon them rather by victory than by their free choice. Incorporated with Great Britain, they still remain Scottish; and participating in the general interests of England, they nevertheless keep always a steady eye on those particular considerations which have for object their native land.

Their aristocracy still reside, and maintain their influence, amongst them. Their religion differing too from that of England in some of its doctrines, is rendered still more dissimilar by the rigidity of its practice. And though the language spoken by the better classes is common to both countries, still the pronunciation of the Scottish is distinguished by an accent which is readily apparent in the first words spoken by one of that nation.

Several Scottish regiments have retained, in their uniform, many striking parts of their national costume, as if they designed to protest against the conquest of their country, by refusing to amalgamate their costumes and their manners with those of their conquerors.

MISCELLANEOUS OBSERVATIONS.

The Scots have a national music, of which they are exceedingly proud. This claim is founded on the existence of certain national ballads, of a simple and drawing melody, of a melancholy turn, little varied in its expression or elaborated in the composition, but not wholly devoid of a pleasing effect.

Their musical system was evidently adopted in the very infancy of the art, and has preserved its original defects. It recalls those by-gone times when Ossian and the Scottish bards attuned their poems to music. It may safely be averred that many of the most celebrated Scottish ballads were composed by these early bards: the airs are even now calculated to excite their enthusiasm. I draw from this a conclusion more favourable to the national character than to the musical taste of the Scots. A spirit of nationality could alone, in fact, account for the enthusiasm felt by a whole nation for compositions, the chief and perhaps the only merit of which consists in their early origin.

In the Scottish regiments, the drum and other instruments give way to the bagpipe, their national and favourite instrument. Its harsh sounds seem calculated neither to soothe the ear, nor to excite the valour of the soldier.* Independently of this, the bagpipe appears an instrument little calculated to convey to any distance, or to a large assemblage of men, the commands which it is usual to transmit by means of the trumpet and the drum; but the Scots remember that the sounds of this instrument challenged to victory the clans of Wallace, the armies of Robert Bruce, and, in no less a degree, the Highland regiments of our own time.

The Highlanders have preserved the costume of their forefathers, in defiance of its unsuitableness for the climate of their country. This costume consists of a bonnet, which covers only the top of the head; a piece of square plaid, intended to support a cloak thrown over the shoulders in a manner far more picturesque than convenient; a lower garment, somewhat in the shape of a petticoat, called a kilt, and which, leaving uncovered a part of the thigh and leg, presents a feeble barrier against the habitual coldness of the atmosphere. Nothing displays in a more remarkable manner the attachment of the Scots to their national customs than their perseverance in this costume, as well as in the use of inconvenient and short stockings, despite their manifest singularity and disadvantages.

The singular union of English jackets, and a shako with black feathers, complete the dress of the Scottish soldier. The cross-barred stockings of the Highlander, fastened by a red garter, and his shoe covered with a large brass buckle, must prove highly inconvenient, and form a revolting contrast with the dress of every civilised army in Europe, in which such severe regulations have, of late, been adopted.

It may be concluded, from this obstinate adherence to a dress neither in harmony with the age, the personal comfort of the wearer, the customs of other countries, nor even with the existing state of Scottish civilisation, that this people wish to retain the customs imprinted on their character by the seal of centuries, that they wish to protest against those changes which have been forced upon them, and those with which they now consider themselves threatened, and that they prefer their nationality, though attended with so many inconveniences, to changes for which they are not desirous to pay the price of an abandonment of their cherished traditions; even though such traditions and customs may contrast with what prevails in every other country, and with their own manifest progress in the path of civilisation.

The Scots, on becoming united to England, preserved

* The Baron should have said the French soldier the laws which regulated their system of property, as well as some parts of their ancient constitution. The territorial divisions of Scotland, her judicial and administrative forms, have remained unchanged.

The Scottish parliament has been united to that of England; the members they send to the house of commons are chosen in the same manner as in the latter kingdom. The sixteen peers deputed by Scotland to the upper house, are chosen by the other peers, and for the whole duration of parliament.

The constitution of the Scottish clergy is altogether different from that of the English church. They approximate more to Luther in their religious tenets, which exhibits a severity of principles more vexatious and irksome in the practice. Along with the dogma of puritanism, the Scottish religion has adopted the spirit of dark intolerance peculiar to that sect: it rejects episcopacy; and unlike the clergy of the English church, its ministers collect no tithes for their support.

THE HIGHLANDS.

He who loves the aspect of a country which partakes of the natural and the grand, he who is pleased with manners which savour of mountain originality, cannot fail to be charmed with a visit to the Highlands.

However mountainous the country may be, however decorated by beautiful lakes, Scotland has no kind of resemblance to Switzerland, to which country it is habitually compared. It possesses not those bold forelands, those imposing rocks, those detached masses, that spread of green sward, those handsome forests, which constitute the charm of Helvetia. Scotland, moreover, is deficient in that cultivation, in that feature of comparative wealth and civilisation, which are among the admired advantages of happy Switzerland. The disposition, too, of the lakes is different. It rarely happens that the border of the landscape is cut out in the same fashion as in Switzerland; and the conformation of the mountains of the two countries differ in as remarkable a degree. In Scotland, the sides of the mountains resemble inclined planes reaching to the verge of calm and transparent waters. Cows, flocks of sheep, and stags, feed in the midst of small underwoods, while in the distance one sees, here and there, thinly scattered trees. Occasionally, fields, inclosed with hedges, yield a miserable crop of rye or oats, of which the inhabitants make an indifferent bread. In more attractive views, the eye now and then reposes on the prospect of shooting-boxes, and of distant mansions, rarely to be met with, owing to the inconceivable extent of the estates: a principal mansion on each estate, and a few shooting-boxes, resorted to by the owners and their friends during the summer months, do not exist in sufficient number to give the country an air of comfort and activity. The Highlands present, accordingly, a rugged and barren appearance, which fills the mind with melancholy.

There are, however, some exceptions to the exclusive possession of the soil by its titular lords. Comfortable and even elegant houses are often seen, which do not belong to the higher aristocracy. The descendants of the chiefs of ancient clans still retain possession of extensive estates. In addition to their character of owners of the soil, they superadd an extensive influence over all those of the clan who bear their name and wear their favourite plaid. These chiefs of clans keep up the hospitality of the olden time, with all its generous confidence and cordial warmth of manner. The introduction to one family of distinction, in Scotland, is sufficient to obtain for the stranger a ready admittance into the best society in the country; and he is received in their circles with a warmth and cordiality which, in other countries, are reserved for relatives, or old and intimate friends. Should the family with whom the guest is staying, make a visiting excursion, he is taken with them, and presented by some one of the family whose acquaintance he has first made; and his greatest difficulty lies in resisting the good things which the hospitality and custom of the Highlands heap upon him: a hospitality and custom to which a stranger cannot naturalise himself in a short time. There are indeed few strangers of whose social, gastronomic, and drinking powers, the Scots must not entertain a rather contemptible opinion, looking to their own accomplished feats at the social board.

SPORTING IN THE HIGHLANDS.

I was invited to a shooting-party during the grouse season. This grouse is a bird of the partridge species, very common in the Highlands. I set off on a Highland pony, to whose natural sagacity I trusted myself as often as occasion arose, and whose trained experience was sufficient to lead me (failing birds in one quarter) into another, where to find them was almost certain.

Grouse exists in great abundance in Scotland; but it is not permitted, by an ancient usage of the country, to fire twice on the same covey of birds. The necessity of seeking fresh coveys, as well as the heavy nature of the soil, renders grouse-shooting a very fatiguing pastime.

Stag-hunting offers a pleasure of a different kind. The sportsman sets out accompanied by thirty or forty gamekeepers. It seldom happens that the stag approaches sufficiently near to be within reach of the ball of his pursuers: he almost always gains the ridge of mountains crowned by perpendicular rocks, forming a species of natural wall of four or five feet high. Bounding over those walls, he considers himself safe, and proceeds leisurely to graze. The huntsmen arrive without noise, take their station, and, at a given signal, many of the stags fall victims at the first discharge.

The stag often affords a nobler sport, when hunted by large stag-hounds of a prodigious strength. The dogs in general attempt to seize the stag by the throat or by the ears; but sometimes their force is expended before they can make these attempts: oftener they succeed, and have only to vanquish the obstinate resistance which their antagonist opposes to them.

The Scottish stag is infinitely larger than the stag of the continent; his courage and strength render him, also, much more formidable to his assailants. The number of these animals has so greatly increased, that the mountains belonging to the Duke of Athol are said to contain eight thousand.

MELTON-MOWBRAY.

It is at Melton in Leicestershire, a mountainous and wooded country, intersected by valleys and deep rivers, by brooks, and hedges defended by double ditches, that the best hunting in England is afforded. The country is not remarkable either for the beauty of its sites, or as presenting those enjoyments which a small and anciently-built town, totally deprived of those comforts of which the English show themselves so jealous, is the least calculated to yield. The sportsman, however, accords the preference to Melton, because it unites, and comprises within itself, all that variety of difficulties which a sportsman finds not only a pleasure but a glory in surmounting. It may be also that English foxes—like the amateurs who hunt them—appear to delight in dangers, and congregate in preference round Melton. They are found in the neighbourhood in sufficient quantity to furnish a supply for the considerable destruction which yearly takes place.

There is not a hunt which may not afford food for a fortnight's conversation. The brooks and ditches cleared, the rivers swam over, the broken limbs and ribs, the horses killed—such are the anecdotes which form the inevitable episodes of these charming parties!

Caricature, which seizes on every thing in England, has not neglected so rich a subject; it has contrived to turn to humorous account the often tragical occurrences furnished by such dangerous amusements.

The keeping up of what is called an establishment at Melton, entails a very considerable expense. This species of luxury is necessarily limited to a very small number of wealthy people. No Meltonian can dispense with a dozen horses, each of which costs, at the least, two or three hundred guineas. Some stables contain even thirty.* The labour of a hunter is not prolonged beyond three or four seasons. From the care bestowed upon them, two horses require the attendance of one groom. This may convey some idea of the enormous expense incidental to this kind of enjoyment.

The intervals between hunting days are filled up by brilliant assemblages at the country mansions, by play, and by cock-fighting, which serve as pretexts to bets often amounting to a very considerable sum.

Melton is one of the places in the world where one is most careless of one's purse and person, and where the one and the other are sacrificed with the greatest zest.

COCK-FIGHTING.

If the character of nations were to be studied in their popular games, special attention should be bestowed on cock-fighting, which holds a high rank among the amusements to which the people of England are most fondly attached.*

In the attention paid to the preservation of the race of these birds, a spirit of order and perseverance is manifested. In the enormous bets to which cock-fighting serves as a pretext, is disclosed the taste for a species of chance, the caprices of which, nevertheless, offer the basis of a sort of calculation. In the courage of the bird, the idea of a resemblance with that of man presents itself; and in the tragical conclusion of the struggle, the need of an impression lively enough to excite imaginations which a slight movement of curiosity could not agitate. In the enthusiasm of the spectators of all classes to take part for such or such combatant, without any other motive than the idea of the moment and the inspiration of play, a similitude is afforded to that ardour which induces the English to engage themselves, fortune as well as peace, in political quarrels with which they have no concern. In a word, in all the details of a frivolous amusement, not of summary of their conduct throughout life is manifested.

Celebrated by its fox-hunts, Melton is not less renowned by its cock-fights. In the environs of this town the most celebrated race of birds is bred; and here it is that all schemes are followed which are likely to add to the purity of breed, and to increase, by crossing, the perfection of the cock. It is in the environs of Melton that, from the peer of the three kingdoms, to the farmer, nay, even to the groom, the passion of play confounds all rank. Bets are here offered and accepted without examining from whence they come, or into what hands they fall.

People interest themselves no less about the genealogy of a cock than about that of a race-horse. Any coupling of these birds which is calculated to impair the breed, is repudiated with as much horror, as a derogatory marriage in the family of their owners. And in this classic land of social distinctions, aristocracy, with all its pretensions and the rigour of its despotism, condescends to imitate in the manner of breeding fowls.

Thanks to the care taken of the ancestry of the cock—which is traced back through several generations—you are sure that the birds destined to fight have what is called blood, that is to say, that they descend, by an uninterrupted succession of grandsires of noble origin, from a stock capable of furnishing combatants well suited by their courage for the arena in which they exhibit their valour.

Cock-fighting has its laws, as rigorously observed as those which regulated the passes of a tournament, or as the brutal rules observed in the boxing-matches of London.

The great bets are made on the success of a series of fights between a certain number of cocks. Thus, each better fetches about thirty of these birds, and divides them into three parties. He opposes one of them to the bird presented by his adversary, and the bet is adjudged to the better whose champions have been most frequently conquerors, first in each party, and afterwards in two of the three parties.

Other bets are offered even during the battle, on the chances which it presents; and it is thus that the rapidity of judgment of the betters are called into exercise. A knowing eye conjectures, from the manner in which a cock enters upon and maintains a struggle, from the blows he gives and receives; from the effect produced on his countenance by a wound inflicted on such or such a part of the body, the probable issue of the contest; and from one end to the other of the cockpit, the spectators propose, or, to speak more properly, cry out bets, which are accepted with the same readiness, the proportions varying according to the opinion which the better entertains of the result.

A circular hall, furnished with steps which enable one to descend into the pit, is filled with spectators. Two men appear, bearing silk bags, on which the escutcheons of their masters are richly embroidered. They draw forth the cocks which are to fight, and place them before a judge, who examines them, and who assures himself, by an inspection of their weight and confirmation, whether they are of equal strength. This formality fulfilled, the cocks are returned to the men who have brought them to the pit, and are placed upon the turf which serves as the theatre for the combat.

The birds are prepared for this combat in a manner suited to the occasion. The comb and such feathers as would be both useless and inconvenient ornaments, are removed. Their heads are therefore stripped of these, and their wings reduced to an extent which only allows them to raise themselves to a small height. Their tail, which is cut square, gives them a martial turn, and imparts to their gait a spruce and easy appearance. Their spurs are armed with steel, very sharp and cutting, and of the form of a poniard.

Like horses prepared for the race-course, cocks are subjected to a regimen, to which is to be attributed, in a great measure, the strength they put forth. The food they receive tends to prevent fat, and adds to the energy and play of their muscles. They are purged, are made to swallow stimulants, and kept in continual irritation, as well as in a forced exercise. The effect of these minute observances discloses itself by a rapidity and violence of movement, which gives to the birds thus treated an uncontested superiority over their fellows subjected to an ordinary regimen.

As soon as the combatants are in presence, they look at each other with fierceness, and each in some sort measures and judges his opponent. Immediately afterwards, they give tokens of a fury, the gradations of which can be easily observed; incline their necks towards the ground, and, after having preserved this attitude during some seconds, as if to gather up their courage and their strength, rush towards each other. The bill is the first weapon of which they avail themselves, but the most formidable is the spur. They seek to strike each other with it in the head, upon the back, in the sides. The blood runs from their deep and numerous wounds, from the bill, even from the eyes. Their fury increases in consequence; they watch each other's motions, and deal out fresh blows till one of the combatants drops.

It often happens that while both lie dying in the arena, they summon up, as though by concert, a remnant of life, rush against each other, add to their wounds, and fall down again. But their fury has not forsaken them, and the gambols of their agony still wear the character of valour, and afford to the umpire the means of deciding with whom the victory rests.

When the fight is only disastrous to one of the combatants, the conqueror walks proudly round his fallen enemy, and attempts, with an exhausted voice, a crow of triumph, to which the acclamations of the enthusiastic spectators respond.

The race of cocks has lost its Thersites. Sometimes, however, but rarely, there are cowards, in whom the sight of an adversary causes a tremor, and who fly to avoid the sight. The spectators at first, and afterwards their masters, are without pity for them, and the bisces of the one are but the prelude of a sentence of death pronounced and inexorably executed by the other.

In their absurd prejudice in favour of birth, the English persuade themselves that cowardice is only discovered among birds whose pure breed has been interrupted by a disproportioned alliance. In France, so ill-sounding an opinion would be anathematised by its application to the breed of cocks.

The aspect of a cockpit differs from all assemblages that have pleasure for their object. He who has not been present at the sittings of a certain assembly, where graver interests are discussed, would find it impossible to form an idea of the cries, the gestures, the applause, the blows, the stamping and clattering which the spectators resort to by way of expressing their impatience. There are only wanting, to complete the resemblance between a cock pit and the nameless chamber, those gross insults and menaces which are not allowed in the English assembly. In order to check the excess of turbulence, there is suspended from the ceiling, by means of a cord passed through a pulley, a large basket intended for the reception of disturbers who transgress the limits—for the rest extensive enough—assigned to ill-breeding.

France, which is so eager to model her institutions on those of Great Britain, should resort to this means, which perhaps would have more efficacy than a president's bell.

IRELAND.

GENERAL CONDITION OF IRELAND.

Ireland contrives to afford subsistence to a population of eight millions, which England rather coerces than governs. The exercise of the catholic religion furnished, for a long time, a pretext to those professing the faith of the established church, to put under a species of ban seven-eighths of the Irish population; and now that a more humane policy has raised up the hitherto proscribed catholics to the rank of subjects of the same state, an unquiet and unruly spirit on the part of the latter, threatening to overturn all, seems in some degree to justify those exceptional measures, so long maintained with rigour, and so lately removed from the code of British legislation.

Since the year 1798, an epoch of unhappy memory for her, Ireland has manifested an impatience of the English yoke, and a general discontent, which have obliged England to have recourse to additional measures of severity. The passing of the Catholic Relief Bill, far from having calmed the excitement, has, on the contrary, but tended to give fresh courage to the disturbers of the public peace. At this instant, the public tranquillity is daily compromised, under all the pretexts and forms which faction can invent. These unvaried interruptions of public order may lead to the most disastrous results.

The political excitement finds a powerful auxiliary in the distress of the country; nor is a physical force, for which almost any change must be a benefit, unwilling to lend its aid, on occasions when it may be found convenient to enlist its services. The Irish demagogue discovers for the Irish peasant a fancied or a true analogy between politics and religion, and bids him take courage from the extent of his distress: thus excited, the peasant is let loose against power, property, in fact against every social and legal institution. Under the names of Whitefeet, Ribbonmen, &c. Irish Jaquerie exercises its lawless violence, its rapines, its burnings, in different parts of the country. Bound together by oaths which it were death to violate, these Irish factions commit the greatest excesses, unrestrained by the terrors of the law. In truth, all law is in abeyance in Ireland, for witnesses will not, and dare not if they would, declare the truth.

A perfect organisation, therefore, emboldens these confederates to raise the standard of almost open revolt. And now, as if things were not bad enough, a new organisation springs up under the name of volunteers, spreading themselves over the towns and villages, as well as over the face of the country, and composed of men of the middle classes of society. When a unity of purpose and a settled direction have been given to their movements, they afford the protection of their numbers, and their ardour, to the agitators, who proceed openly towards the attainment of their object.

This object is no less than the repeal of the union between England and Ireland. Hence the name of Repealers, adopted by the Irish who wish for the dissolution of the union. Conjoined by a community of views, as well as of religious belief, recruited from the classes of the Whitefeet and the Ribbonmen, all of whom groan, as they conceive, under the yoke of a political servitude, the Repealers are still more formidable by the talents of the men who have placed themselves at their head.

From time to time conflicts take place, for which the payment of tithes forms the pretext: some are killed; burnings of houses ensue; peaceable inhabitants are murdered in a cowardly manner on the high road, if the popular rage has been excited against them: vengeance thus glutted, turns itself towards another point.

What the Irish desire is complete freedom; the equality of the catholic with the protestant faith; the exercise of those rights which the inhabitants of England and Scotland enjoy.

They want, in a word, their old constitution of 1782, and a native parliament, which would consider their interests distinct from those of England, and oblige the proprietors of the soil to abide on it, and spend in their country those revenues which are now squandered in foreign lands.

The Repealers have their leaders, as well as their government, which manifests its power in an open way. Its mandates are cheerfully obeyed; it levies taxes, which are boldly demanded and readily paid; it musters its troops in open array; and its tribunals execute its fearful sentences, of murder and burnings, with audacious impunity. The train of insurrection, so sedulously laid, requires but some daring hand to set fire to it. That well known hand exists, directed by a powerful will and a steady purpose: but the considerations which hold it back are as well known as the hand itself.

RELIGION.

Among the main causes of the disastrous condition of Ireland may be placed that difference of opinion which, for more than two centuries, has manifested itself between the great body of the population professing the Roman Catholic faith, and a small fraction of it, favoured by their exemption from a penal code to which their catholic brethren were till lately subjected. In a population consisting of eight millions, seven millions, professing the catholic religion, have long groaned under all those harassing persecutions which religious rancour could superadd to party spirit. Large masses of wealth, in the hands of a few, enabled these few, for a time, to sustain an unequal struggle against a strong tyranny; but deprived of the favour of the sovereign, and indelible to the posts of honour, wealth in Ireland, in catholic hands, could confer neither power nor distinction. For a time, wealth might no doubt procure some degree of consideration; but a too tardy national justice deprived property of that influence which, under a good system of government, property should always enjoy. The people, seeing that it failed to confer the protection and happiness which are naturally expected from it, began to regard the proprietors and wealthy men with indifference, and perhaps envy. Nevertheless, during the existence of persecution, a community of suffering and degradation, and a hatred of the government, their common oppressors, attached in some sort the tenant to his landlord; but that more intimate alliance between the lord and the vassal, which has always subsisted in England, and which is the effect of a prudent foresight as well as humanity on the part of the one, and of gratitude and duty on the part of the other, exists not in Ireland.

The state of poverty and degradation in which the catholic clergy of Ireland languish, has placed the exercise of the sacerdotal functions in the hands of men little qualified by education to maintain, by their social position, or to exalt, the dignity of that church. The catholic priesthood in Ireland is recruited from the lowest ranks of society. Too poor to acquire the necessary education, the catholic priest supplies this want by a blind fanaticism, which becomes more dangerous from its rapid communication to the body of the people, in whom the priesthood excite, to the highest pitch of exaltation, a spirit of religious enthusiasm.

Hence that constant state of uneasiness, that disposition to discontent, those unceasing aggressions against a government always on the watch, and exaggerating the precautions necessary for its safety to the extreme point of converting those very precautions into an insufferable tyranny. Hence this division of Ireland into two political and religious classes; one of them, the most numerous, the poorest, and the most excited; the other, the weakest in numbers, the strongest in power and wealth, and the most impelled to abuse both the one and the other. Hence, in fine, a hatred always ready to burst forth with that character of violence resulting from the respective situations of the conflicting parties.

In order to modify this state of things, no help could have availed, short of that civilization with which England was, in a measure, supplied from the continent; and which showed her the justice of exercising a benign influence towards unhappy Ireland. It was necessary that England should have rolled back upon her, from the Irish shores, those cries of liberty, those declamations against intolerance, to which she has so clamorously given vent in all quarters of the globe. It was necessary that England, the country which prides itself on its spirit of the most expansive liberty, should be made to behold in its true colours that state of political and religious coercion which she maintained by the exercise of an oriental despotism. But it was necessary above all, and before all, that the people, for whom humanity and justice were raising their united voices, should burst their chains of bondage, and threaten to convert them into weapons against their oppressors.

The measure which was to call Ireland to a participation of rights too long overlooked, did not fail to meet with an obstinate resistance in the prejudices and feelings of the dominant nation. England feared the uses to which Ireland would turn her recovered liberty. Such a transition from servitude to comparative freedom was the more to be dreaded, as it had been prepared beforehand by the efforts made to excite the passions to the highest pitch of hope, and by a state of wretchedness which could not fail to drive the people into acts of despair, and which there existed no means of effectually relieving.

Able statesmen clung to the then existing state of things, not that they approved of it, but that they feared the dangerous consequences which might flow from the most trifling modification of the system. To their successors they bequeathed the difficult task which they had not the courage to undertake; and finding it easier to perpetuate tyranny than to administer justice, they concluded that the easiest course was that of keeping Ireland in thralldom.

The government was at last obliged to abandon the line which it had prescribed to itself; but in adopting that resolution, it was no longer enabled to guard against the consequences which must inevitably attend it. The concession which was thus wrung from power was looked upon, by the Irish, as an indication of its weakness. A religious spirit now came to the aid of that philosophy which had, hitherto, only struggled for the removal of an unjust ascendancy; and lending to the cause all its accustomed bitterness and rancour, as well as its language, threw its whole force into the political strife. This religious spirit is now at work. It still mingles in the combat, harassing its enemy, and seeking to obtain, with its own peculiar weapons, those new and extensive concessions, which it is not in a condition openly to exact. This spirit calls to its aid other passions, other interests, all species of discontent, every form of opposition. It allies itself to every complaining tongue, to every strong arm, and finds, moreover, far more formidable auxiliaries in the embarrassments which beset the government.

In this conjuncture, the government has recourse to various expedients, which at another season, under different circumstances, had proved successful—expedients which they loudly condemned, when a neighbouring government broke down in the attempt to resort to them, under circumstances infinitely more urgent, menacing, and dangerous. These expedients are borrowed from an exceptional system. Will they succeed in the present condition of affairs? and if they do succeed, can their success be durable? The future alone can reveal the truth; for in the present convulsed state of society, and of the principles on which society rests, it is difficult to foresee what may yet come to pass. But is the future, such as it has been prepared by the daring innovators who now dread to consult it—is this future calculated to calm our apprehensions? Is it not from Ireland that will blow the storm, the fearful elements of which had been so long slumbering, and have been since spread abroad with such fatal fury? England may well tremble with apprehension, for already are heard at no great distance the howl of the tempest and the roar of the whirlwind.

In vain it is sought to lull the storm, by yielding up some of the numerous abuses which had crept into the practice of the dominant faith in Ireland. In vain it is now proposed to surrender some portion of the wealth of the established church.

It is still a problem in physics, whether the conductor does not invite, rather than avert the electric fluid. The same uncertainty still exists in political science concerning the effect of concession, which may be called a species of political conductor, more likely, in truth, to invite and invigorate the spirit of destruction, than to avert or annihilate it.

Richly endowed for doing nothing, the clergy of the established church in Ireland were mainly intent on levying tithes, of which they too often spent the produce in England. Ministers have now assumed the initiative, in reducing the wealth of an establishment which conferred no benefit on the Irish people, and the revenues of which were certainly not turned, by the incumbents, to very apostolic uses.

The catholic clergy, whose social position will in no degree be improved by these reductions, will not, in consequence of them, be a whit more disposed to support the government; for these changes fail to remove the great defects of the catholic clergy, their poverty, their want of education, the abjectness of their social position. The measures, therefore, which have been adopted in reference to religion, in Ireland, have only succeeded in causing the cessation of a prolonged legislative injustice, in producing a fiscal improvement, but they afford no preservative against dangers which are daily assuming a more alarming character.

IRISH ESTATES.

The tenure by which Irish property is held, the mode of holding it, the union of many small farms into one of considerable extent, the vastness of some estates—these are, also, master-causes of the deplorable condition of Ireland. Small farmers have wholly disappeared; the class heretofore so denominated is fallen many steps lower in the social ladder, and is now subject to all the ills and inconveniences incidental to poverty, a poverty which, contrasted with their comparatively happier state in former times, is rendered the more insupportable. A spirit of envy and hatred has, accordingly, sprung up in the minds of the people towards the richer and more favoured classes of the community.

A diminution of manual labour has been consequent on the extension of farms. Machinery is now introduced into agriculture, as it has long since been into manufacturing industry; and whilst, for the mass of mankind, such introduction is a palpable benefit, it is yet a great and overwhelming evil for those engaged in the particular labour which has, to a certain extent, been suppressed by the use of machinery. This effect has been more apparent and more deplorable in Ireland, than in England; for in that country the great proprietors are, with few exceptions, non-residents, and know not whether their tenantry stand in need of their sympathy and protection. The great object of the Irish landlord seems to be, to diminish as much as possible the cost of labour, and to increase as much as possible, and by whatever means, his annual income: thus he neither receives nor deserves the benedictions of his tenantry. In this respect, he forms the disreputable exception to the landlords of more civilised communities; in quitting the land of his birth, and becoming, as it were, a stranger to it, the Irish gentleman, by his own act, deprives himself of the affection of his tenants. If he return to it, his visits are few, far between, and of short duration; the reception which he meets with on these occasions is generally cold, sometimes even hostile. Disgust, a real or supposed fear, caused by their own acts and course of conduct, finally induce Irish proprietors to leave a country in which they seem apprehensive for their safety: thus is engendered a reciprocal animosity and hatred, without the least likelihood of their giving way, on either side, to better feelings.

In addition to the disadvantages just enumerated, there is another inseparable from the condition of an absentee. He takes every thing out of his country, and sends nothing into it. For a series of years, enormous sums have been extracted from Ireland, to be expended in England—on the continent—every where, in fact, except in the country whose sweat and labour have supplied so much exportable wealth. The sources of this wealth and production, owing to frequent draining, are now dried up, to the great chagrin and dismay of the landlord, and to the more urgent misery of the tenant, who, in addition to the discontent of his landlord, has to undergo the severer punishment of a redoubled privation. Bread, the basis of subsistence in other countries, is in Ireland a luxury, to which the poverty of the tenant does not allow him to aspire. The potato, without any other nourishment, furnishes subsistence to the people at large. Happy is the family in Ireland which can even acquire a sufficiency of this species of nourishment.

Hence has arisen a prostration of the moral and physical faculties of Ireland, which has destroyed all finer feeling,—and blunts all sense of wretchedness, all desire to find a remedy for it. Ireland can only be stimulated by the cravings of hunger. Indifferent to every other feeling than hunger, the Irish peasant does not trouble himself concerning the almost complete nakedness of his offspring, or the filth of the cabin,* which he holds in joint tenancy with the pig, the calf, and the fowl, that supply him with a few shillings, from time to time, wherewith to procure his family whiskey. He works little, because labour is unfrequent as well as ill paid, and this discouragement to work brings idleness in its train.

The immense tracts of unreclaimed common and bog, in Ireland, are a reproach to the agricultural industry of Great Britain. An obsolete legislation, adapted to an epoch when there was a dearth of farmers to cultivate the soil, suffers a vast quantity of unreclaimed land to lie fallow. Such a practice might be accounted for in a country thinly populated; but what apology can be made for it in a state of society where hundreds of thousands are dying of hunger in the midst of lands which might be made to teem with fertility? What can be said of the policy of reserving such lands for some undefined purpose, which can never occur under circumstances more favourable than those which would now recommend their immediate cultivation?

In vain does the unfortunate peasant turn a wistful eye towards these unreclaimed lands; he sees in the bosom of the now unfruitful earth, a prospect of labour, and a reward of toil, a harvest which may grow to maturity, abundant means of existence; but he knows that he will not be allowed to turn those advantages to account. Never shall his plough till these fields—never shall his spade turn up a soil dedicated to perpetual sterility. All he can expect to enjoy is the produce of some miserable animals, and too often does his hard for-

* Lord B—attempted, on his estate, to substitute healthy habitations for the miserable cabins of the peasantry. He caused many comfortable cottages to be erected, with separate apartments and chimneys, a luxury not generally known in Irish cabins. He was compelled to resort, as it were, to a species of coercion, in order to compel the peasantry to inhabit these new cottages. On his return from London, on one occasion, he found every thing destroyed but the walls and roof of his new buildings,—the partitions, the chimneys, the windows—every thing had disappeared. In want of the common necessities of life, the poor could only view those comforts in the light of superfluities.

tuno deny him even the possession of them. By the side of those animals which a wretched nutriment renders almost valueless, a whole family pines away in inaction; while the surface of grazing land necessary for the support of a cow would amply suffice to provide for their wants.

To these causes of wretchedness and poverty is superadded the rigorous enforcement of tithe from the cultivators of the soil. Gathered for the profit of pastors without flocks, collected for the uses of a religion to which the people do not belong, tithe serves but to feed the luxury of the clergy living out of the country, and wholly regardless of the misery of the tithe-payers by whose labour they subsist. The unfortunate natives, belonging as they do to a different religion, are beyond the pale of the sympathy or care of the protestant pastor.

It is chiefly in Ireland that the corporations of London are possessed of estates: proprietors directed of all attachment to the soil, without any personal interest, or any of those strong motives of duty which should bind the landlord to the tenant—their whole object seems to be to receive their rents, and to spend them out of the country; a twofold and unavoidable cause of impoverishment for the land condemned to be thus misgoverned.

In order to expend on her soil some fragments of capital, of which so many causes tend to divest Ireland, Great Britain quarters a large military force on her dependent province. Some few millions distributed in the payment of this force are almost the only circulating medium of the country.

IRISH POOR.

Ireland may be said to be peopled with poor. The number of families who live in easy circumstances, forms a fearful disproportion to those who are in a perfect state of destitution. The last and only comfort which remains to the inhabitants of Ireland, a people more wretched than those of any other civilised country, is this—that it is a miserable one—that the distress is universal, and common to all the inhabitants. Those, therefore, who suffer in a state of society where all are alike wretched, are spared the additional misery of instituting comparisons which could only aggravate the misery of their situation.

There are in Ireland no poor-laws as in England. Public charity is the uncertain purveyor to the certain wants of the Irish poor; and immense is the task which is imposed on this casual handmaid. Matters are now, however, advanced to a state in which they cannot much longer continue.

The first remedy which presents itself to the mind of philanthropists anxious for the happiness of their species is the institution of a system of poor-laws similar to that which obtains in England. To judge, however, of the English poor-laws by the results which they produce in England, it is with difficulty one can agree in the conclusion that they are calculated to meet the emergency which is admitted to exist in Ireland.

Notwithstanding the enormous cost of the poor-laws, they but imperfectly attain the end of their institution: and, perhaps, one of the most positive effects of these laws is to encourage idleness, to create new wants in the part of the poor, and to generate a carelessness and indifference as to the future, which cannot but have a disastrous influence on their moral faculties.

To these laws are attached conditions little in harmony with that liberty which is the boast of Englishmen; and the condition of the poor, notwithstanding the considerable sums bestowed on their relief, is, in reality, worse than in any other country.

In France there exists no other law concerning the poor than that which, however inadequate to meet the object in view, nevertheless forbids mendicancy. In France, it is justly supposed that principles of religion and humanity would do more to extinguish mendicancy than the law itself; for they would act with more discernment and with better feeling. The form of relief accordingly assumes an endless variety; such, for instance, as the customs and resources of the different localities. The expenses are met by a voluntary contribution, which is the more readily assented to, as it may be levied by a tax upon produce, and as each contributor is assessed in a degree proportioned to the means at his command.

If the indigent population of Ireland be numerous, the extent of its uncultivated lands exceeds all belief. Much

* It must however be acknowledged that the corporation estates are generally administered with care, and upon liberal principles. They are admirably cultivated: the roads running through them are kept in proper repair, and the wants of the poor upon those estates, as well as their instruction, are humanely attended to.

misery would be relieved by the employment of useless hands in the cultivation of a soil wholly valueless at present, and by the endeavour to raise the means of supplying what would still be wanting, in consequence of the inadequacy of the produce of labour for the support of the poor.

If the establishment of poor-laws in Ireland should, from the existing disproportion between the resources and the wants of that country, encounter many obstacles, perhaps it would be agreed on to depart wholly from the abuses of the English system, of which we have been speaking; and then we might expect to witness results the more important as the institution of poor-laws would be directed to the relief of classes comparatively more wretched, and, whether owing to necessity or habit, more abstemious than the like classes in England. Some potatoes added to the nourishment of an Irish family, would suffice to create for such family a degree of relative comfort; and the culture of some barren and unproductive lands would give them habits of labour, finally produce good conduct, and a strict observance of religious duties, by which means a visible improvement would take place in the moral condition of that degraded part of society.

IRISH EMIGRATION.

In order to escape the numerous and complicated miseries which await them on their natal soil, a vast number of Irish families emigrate. They collect together, for this purpose, their wretched resources, the foul lees which remain after the juice of the grape has been fully expressed. With these remnants of means, they pay the freight of their passage to America, the Canadas, or New South Wales. In those countries similar privations, nay, a species of slavery, awaits them; for, in order to subsist, and to procure lands and the means of locating themselves, it is necessary that they should mortgage their labour for many years in advance. Sometimes the unfortunate emigrants perish in their venturesome attempts; but death in these instances is not immediately occasioned by hunger—it is a slower and less horrible death, and there is this consolation, that a more hopeful future than their native country presented is reserved to the members of the family who survive them.

England also receives her share of Irish emigration; each year brings to her shores thousands of Irish, who come to mingle with the already too numerous crowd of unemployed natives. They bring to the common stock vigorous and sinewy arms, too often rendered unfit for labour by the immoderate use of gin. These Irish find their way to all the workshops and mix in all quarrels: one sees them every where, where there is work and where there is riot, equally prepared for the one or the other, and always restless and troublesome. Those dispositions often interfere with their employment, and are sometimes among the causes which produce their distress.

IRISH CONSTITUTION.

For a long period of time Ireland had her own laws: a special form of administration—a parliament composed of two houses like the British parliament, which voted the ways and means, and regulated the general interests of the country. To the union of this parliament with that of England, Ireland opposed the strongest and most prolonged resistance; but at length their independent representation was exchanged for a share in the national representation. By the arrangements which took place at the time of this incorporation, twenty-eight of the Irish peers were to be elected, from the whole body, to sit in the upper house. This arrangement is different from that which took place at the Scottish Union. A Scottish peer does not sit in the English house of lords for life; he is liable to be re-elected or rejected at the dissolution of the house of commons:—whereas an Irish peer sits for life.

Ireland sends to the lower house one hundred and six members, elected according to forms nearly resembling those which prevail in England. This unequal representation places the interests of Ireland in complete subservience to a combination of English and Scottish members. Hence that inevitable collision between England and Ireland. Hence complaints, well or ill founded, discontent, hatred, resistance, exceptional measures of a fearful energy on the part of the government. Hence, in a word, the present state of things, so fertile in troubles, and which may in the end become fertile in disastrous events.

IRISH COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

Like all other sources out of which her prosperity should spring, the commerce and industry of Ireland are in a state of severe suffering. The extreme poverty of the people opposes itself to that active consumption which is, in every country, the surest basis of rapid and important commercial operations. Placed at the extremity of Europe, and separated from the Continent by the most commercial of all nations, Ireland suffers from the disadvantage of her geographical position; and to this, that capital, which naturally flows towards every country where a profitable return can be calculated on, has, owing to some unfortunate combination of circumstances, never found channels for communicating itself to Ireland.

It should certainly appear that capital would find a profitable return in manufacturing industry, in a country in which the superabundance of labourers should diminish the rate of labour; but the fact is otherwise: with some few exceptions, Ireland possesses no manufactures of any note.

A capitalist will seldom adventure his money, unless he can constantly superintend the operations of that labour which he has put in action; and he is unwilling to subject himself to the risks of a continued political fermentation. Be the cause what it may, the effect of this absence of capital is deplorably felt, and its influence in perpetuating the national distress cannot be contested.

IRISH SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

Without having any national literature which she may properly call her own; without any marked superiority in science or in arts, Ireland has contributed nevertheless, her full quota to the general stock which illustrates the annals of Great Britain, by the number and talent of those distinguished men to whom she has given birth.

Bishops Jebb and Magee, and Dean Kirwan, have acquired a just renown by their pulpit eloquence. Science is deeply indebted to Young, Donavon, and Westley. Literature may justly be proud of such men as Usher, Goldsmith, Sheridan, Swift, Sterne, and Moore; and of Burke, Castlereagh, Grattan, Curran, Plunket, Ponsonby, Canning, and O'Connell, as orators and statesmen; and whatever opinion individuals may entertain regarding the direction in which he exerts his talents, of the Duke of Wellington, whose military glory is, however, so transcendent, as to eclipse the renown to which he may lay claim as a statesman:—all these stand deservedly high in public opinion.

Ireland, then, should be ranged among those nations which have produced, and still give promise of producing, men distinguished in the walks of literature and science, and above all, in politics.* It is, therefore, only just to conclude, that the vices and imperfections of her sons arise from an absence of, or an imperfect, education, rather than from any inherent or natural vice.

MILITARY SPIRIT OF THE IRISH.

Irish turbulence has hitherto consented to submit to the yoke of military discipline. Poverty drives into the army a vast number of young men, who become excellent soldiers. Ireland is the nursery which supplies the greater part of the recruits of the British army. A considerable proportion of the most distinguished officers, of all ranks, are also of Irish birth. One of the most remarkable traits in the Irish character is their great aptitude for a military life. In the ranks of the army, where turbulence must yield to a severe and strict discipline, the national spirit of the Irish appears in the most favourable light, and is entitled to the most unreserved praise.

IRISH CHARACTER.

Ireland contains as wretched a population as any in the world: a population too, which, it may be said, makes the best efforts of any to escape from its wretchedness and misery; a people unquestionably, also, the most enslaved, but who, in a great measure, justify the exercise of acts of coercion and restraint, by their perpetual efforts to escape from an authority disposed to measures of moderation; a people the most sincere and devoted adherents to the Catholic faith, but who, in following its minute observations, have allowed the spirit of that religion to evaporate; a people who rank among the most simple and yet the most gifted nations, no less brave than prone to acts of the basest and the most cruel revenge;

* Whether it arises from a want of taste, or from the dormant faculties of the nation, in this respect, not having been awakened, certain it is, that Ireland has produced no name renowned in the fine arts.

habituated to privation, yet among the least sober—of energetic resolve, and as great inconstancy in action; a people, in fine, among the readiest to labour, and yet among the idlest of modern nations. There is no vice in the Irish which is not qualified by some latent virtue, and a virtue which is not disfigured by some defacing vice. The Irish character is a compound of finesse and naïveté. It is a mixture of the Gascon and the Boottian, of piquancy and folly. If the Italians had not already embodied forth the character of harlequin, the Irish people could have furnished the outline of it.

Their hasty passions are quickly excited into all the violence of anger; hence arise their imprudent resolves, of which reflection does not retard the execution; their transition from good-humour to passion is short, and quickly embraced. In politics, they are as headstrong as in private life. Anger is the monitor to whose counsels they most willingly listen, and they are ever prone to adopt its suggestions. Accordingly, they are perpetually falling into error, the first consequence of which is an aggravation of their evils. In consequence of this bizarrie, and of the contrasts in which it abounds, the Irish character may be considered as the cause and effect of the state of things which has just been described.

CONCLUSION.

Arrived at the limit I had proposed to myself, it becomes me to cast a retrospective glance at my labours, in order to ascertain whether my observations have preserved, in a collected form, that character of truth, which, isolated, they presented to my mind. It becomes me to see whether, in the judgments I have pronounced, prejudice has not invaded the ground of impartiality, to examine whether my criticisms bear the impress of a depreciating spirit, which it certainly was no part of my intention to give to them—to enquire whether my encomiums have not been exaggerated; in a word, it becomes me to know whether I have attained the object I had in view. A conscientious examination still presents the subjects of my remarks in the point of view in which they had at first appeared to me. Generally consigned to paper the moment they struck me, the impressions I have received have remained unchanged. I have described manners and customs such as they have presented themselves, and as experience revealed them. I have rather stated the dissimilarities which England exhibits on a comparison with other countries, than pointed out any peculiar failings. I have sought to trace the principal outline, and some of the shades of difference which distinguish the English physiognomy, rather than its features of resemblance, which it has been my endeavour to avoid. Have I succeeded? This is a question which it does not become me to answer.

If I should be accused of having infused too much severity into certain opinions, I will call to witness my intentions, and declare that the imperfections, the bizarries, (or what I conceived to be such,) which I have pointed out, originate, according to my ideas, in a principle entitled to respect, the advantages of which infinitely counterbalance its inconveniences. These imperfections are, in my mind, a consequence of the national character, grave even to dullness, and moving with a prudence which renders it often stationary. It brings in its train a long retinue of laws, usages, and prejudices. With such a cortège, it would be difficult for it to march as quickly as the civilisation of other countries; it is, therefore, always some steps in the rear, and requires to be urged on and stimulated. It marches slowly, because it is unwilling to be separated from any thing to which long custom has attached it. Such is its perseverance in this system, that it destroys no part of those customs which now and for ever are fallen into disuse. It preserves, under the rust of ages, laws in which one would vainly seek a provision—the slightest idea—at all applicable to the existing epoch; but there is wisdom in preserving those laws as a mark of respect for the past, and as a warning to future generations, that they should uphold existing institutions. Thus it was that the English constitution was formed, an ancient edifice, composed of the legislative architecture of times and manners, the tradition of which has scarcely reached us, and of which Westminster Hall, with its Gothic walls and modern arrangement, appears in some sort to be the symbol. Accordingly, we are witnesses to the maturity of reflection displayed by the national character, at a moment when it is beset on all sides by the fury of passions on the watch to invade it. How soon it recovers from emotions the effects of which it could not altogether resist; how soon it returns to what it was before; and how, when obliged to move onwards, it cautiously treads the unknown soil before it! This is because good sense forms the groundwork of that character; and for nations as well as for individuals, this precious gift is the first condition of happiness.

Let England, therefore, console herself for the absence of that mobility of imagination, calculated to diminish calamities for nations. Let her turn her eyes towards a neighbouring country, endowed in the highest degree with that brilliant faculty, and see whether the halo of glory with which she dazzles herself is not too dearly purchased by a continued state of present disturbance and of future uneasiness. And should England betake herself to view with a feeling of regret the distance which, in certain respects, separates her from some parts of the continent, let her compare her situation with that of those countries which she might have the weakness to envy, and let her then declare, whether the permanence of her institutions, her perseverance in a line of conduct fruitful in happy results, be not preferable to the vain glory of shining in the arts, or in astonishing the mind by unheard of discoveries; preferable, in fine, to those dangerous systems which disturb the peace of Europe, and prepare an all-consuming conflagration by the aid of those lights with which the votaries of such systems pretend to enlighten the world.

PHILOSOPHY OF EXILE.

For two years and upwards, to escape a political condemnation, I have dwelt in England. What have I seen there? What have I done there? How have I there spent my time, my money? What is left me instead?

Such are the questions which I put to myself on the second anniversary of my arrival in a country to which I had brought great uneasiness, painful recollections, an uncertain future, and prejudices which ill prepared me to be pleased with it. A storm in which, unfortunate pilot as I was—call me unskilful if you choose—the vessel committed in part to my charge, had perished, threw me upon its shores. I solicited of them an asylum, which, from choice, I should have sought elsewhere. Prudence counselled me to submit with a good grace to what to me was an imperative necessity, and to banish, as useless, discouraging thoughts, the comparison of my past condition and of my present lot, of my native land and the land of exile, of what I had been and what I was about to be; in short, to do in adversity what I had done in more favourable circumstances—obtain from my situation all that it could yield of honour, of consideration, and of pleasure. Regrets, hesitation to enter upon the position to which I was doomed, ill-humour with its inconveniences, resistance to its demands—these would have been the only results that would have accrued to me from a contrary resolution. It was more rational to put away whatever was of a nature to give me pain, to adapt my situation to my resources, to caress it, in order to render it the more complaisant, to employ my mind in such a manner as to leave the less room for care, to advance with eyes shut towards a future, which my will had not the power to modify, that I might not see all the threatening things which it might bring with it, and not to open them unless to look at a very short distance; to depend a little upon calculation, a little more on the reputation which I possessed, still more on the facility of my character to give way to men and circumstances, and a great deal upon the chance which a combination of all these should produce; in short, to impose silence on my imagination, if it should dare to assail me with importunate regrets or desires, by comparing my lot with what it might have been—London with Ham—liberty in a foreign land with a prison in my own country.

This plan—if plan it were—has succeeded. If it has not gained me happiness, it has at least rendered time supportable. It even seems to me that when the sorrows of the first moment had once become blunted—and they were very keen—my life has not been either more unhappy, more idle, or more unpleasant than formerly. It seems, indeed, that I should have to applaud myself for this trial, even if it were not destined to be prolonged. Proscription has proved to be a title to consideration and interest: I have endeavoured to give to exile the character of travel. I dwell in a world that is new to me. I there find other manners, other amusements. But it is life, it is consideration, that an honourable man saves from the wreck of a high position; above all it is liberty, it is air. Ought I to complain when I reflect that I might, that in all probability I should, have been deprived of the one, and have had no more of the other than the barred window of a fortified castle would have admitted? I have found, I know not how, good-will, which, treated with due attention, has ripened into affection, acquaintances who are become friends.

That varnish of condemnation which I carry along with me has not been unserviceable to me. The curiosity which in England attaches to whatever is out of the common course, to men as well as to things; the vanity which causes those who have played a conspicuous part to be sought after; filled up all the voids left, especially at first, by the various elements composing my existence. They have bound them together in such a manner as to give them an elevated situation in society, and to make of me, in spite, nay, perhaps on account, of the events which have been my downfall, a personage who by common consent is sought after, questioned, consulted; for whom the first place is every where reserved; and who, notwithstanding his previous habits, is regarded as a sort of political authority.

A continual alternation of visits among a numerous society, which appeared desirous to lay itself open to my observation, and of complete seclusion, placed at my disposal valuable materials, time and solitude to study and arrange them. I was in a now situation, stimulated by a something to which I was unaccustomed, and which extended itself to my moral and physical economy.

All this acted powerfully upon my senses, roused my spirits, and gave them an impetus and a direction which they had never had. My sensations issued from a corner of my imagination in which methought I had never yet rummaged; thoughts, ideas, to which I was a stranger, came forth from it.

I set about cultivating a soil from which I had not yet demanded any crop, and which, without costing me fatigue, yielded far beyond my hopes. Placed hitherto in high situations, I had considered them only as means of seeing farther, of embracing wider prospects.

I was then in the first boxes of the great theatre of the world. I saw more at my ease; perhaps I did not observe so closely. Thrust down into the pit, mingled with the crowd, elbowed, squeezed, in my turn, looking from below at the scene which I used to view from above, objects appeared under another aspect, whilst the drama lost none of its interest.

I had time; I had wrought for myself independence; I employed them in rendering an account to myself of what I had seen and done in the course of my administrative career, and during the short but stormy period of my ministry; of what politics, events, chances, were preparing for or against the cause with which my lot was connected; of what struck my eye and my mind in the land of exile.

Too true not to be offensive, composed to record, but for myself alone, recollections that are precious to me, the period at which these memoirs shall appear cannot be specified. In all probability I may not be permitted to judge of the effect which they shall produce. There are facts which my situation, whilst imparting a thorough knowledge of them, forbids me to reveal. The anecdotes which might serve to season the whole would attack men whom it is my duty to spare, and to whom I have vowed gratitude and affection. Were I to suppress these anecdotes, I should be but the cold and spiritless narrator of events, which I should relate, just as many others have done, without diving to the bottom, in order to discover their causes and to trace their results. I find myself compelled, therefore, to keep these memoirs in my portfolio, or not to take them out of it unless to communicate them to a few friends, and to give authentic evidence of possession.

To confess the truth, I regret that it is so, because I think that I perceive in the subject, and in the colours which I have given to it, something that classes a historian.

By availing myself of the facility of character consistent with my personal dignity; by forgetting so much of the past as would have produced only useless regrets; by calling, above all, to my aid those family affections, those relations of a friendship tried by adversity, those attachments to one's native land, so powerful against misfortune, so consolatory in affliction; I have created for myself an existence endurable within myself, honourable and even brilliant without.

When the pangs of exile are too acute, when the separation from all that is dear to me is too painfully felt, I have recourse to my imagination; I give scope to it by directing it towards my country, the access to which is not forbidden to it, as it is to me. It there seeks, it there finds, the objects of my affections, and it returns laden with a harvest of soothing thoughts, of precious recollections, which I examine at leisure, which I cull, as it were piecemeal, one by one; which I press to squeeze out of them all the pleasures, all the consolations, which they contain.

These encroachments upon sorrow, these short revivals in illusions, assist me, in some measure, to shift my fortune from one shoulder to another, and tend to lighten the burden.

I had enough to do with my own troubles. I have, as far as lay in my power, kept aloof from those which were not absolutely personal to me. Many griefs are purely conventional: we should greatly diminish the sum total of these, were we to enclose them, like mourning, within a specific circle of affections. That we should grieve on account of those we love is quite natural; but to carry pity to the length of grief for calamities which will never reach us, and which we cannot alleviate, for persons whom we have never seen, and who will not thank us for it, is a luxury of affliction, in which we ought not to indulge, unless we have nothing to do in that way for ourselves, and we are annoyed by an excess of happiness and joy—a very rare circumstance in life, and of very short duration! A noble mind takes a real share in the afflictions of those who are dear to it; a weak one has affections in reserve for all the sorrows that are revealed to it. The sympathy of the one may be of service; that of the other is of none.

There are—I know it from experience—few misadventures, at the bottom of which, if we make strict search, we shall not find consolations: the difficulty is to apply them, often, indeed, to own them to ourselves, because they sometimes hurt honourable feelings, and are based upon considerations which appear to be not so. In the end, however, they produce their effect: all that is requisite is to allow them time. It is sufficient to leave to the latter the task of reconciling them with decorum. In thanks to that mediator, what would be wrong today will be right in a month—in a few days. Should we be very culpable, if we were to assist, to urge, the operation of the remedy, paying due respect at the same time to the decencies of social life, which we can never oppose without great prejudice to ourselves?

Whilst defending myself against grief, I did not, however, resist certain melancholy impressions which resulted from my position, and which it would have been impossible for me to escape.

Few can have any conception of that grief which is felt for an absent father-land, who have not experienced it with the terrible accessory of exile, which deprives you of the hope of ever revisiting it, and the happiness of having a point upon which to base your plans. The recollections which, under other circumstances, you would have called forth as means of comfort or resignation, to set you, annoy you, because they are then but regrets.

Have those friends of whose affections they remind you yourselves remained faithful? Are not those who have retained their attachment to you as unhappy as yourself upon your account? Shall you ever see her again? That adored mother, whose old age it is your duty to render less oppressive, will expire, and her last actuated by that instinct of tenderness, which carries all other sensations, will in vain seek your hand to lay upon it her last blessing. Your wife, separated from you for ever, is doomed to a precarious position, a precarious existence, a melancholy life, and blighted prospects. Your children, educated afar from you, will soon find your features erased from their memory, as well as your affection from their hearts: they will know you only by the name which you have transmitted to them, which they will be reproached with as a fault, which will be objected to them as an obstacle. Who knows but that weary of your proscription, which will extend to them, they may behold with indifference, nay even wish for, the event which will replace them in the ordinary condition of society?

Upon nothing—not even upon inanimate things themselves—dare you suffer your thoughts to dwell. If the flower which enamels the meads of your country springs up beneath your feet, its form, its fragrance, remind you of happy days which will never return, of affectionate recollections which perhaps you alone still cherish, of the sports of your childhood, and even of the friends who shared them—but they remind you too that you are condemned never to behold them more.

The estates which you possessed, and to which you owed the enjoyments attached to wealth, you are forced to renounce. The dwelling which you had taken delight in embellishing, the trees which you had planted, the woods which lent you their shade, you will never see again. Never more shall you set your foot on those alleys which you laid out yourself. No more will your eyes rove over those scenes which you were never weary of contemplating. Your imagination will fatigue itself by the imperfection of the picture, upon the objects which chance shall present to it.

The gait of a stranger will remind you of a friend. You brush away the tears that dim your vision, that you may take a better look at an aged woman, whose fixed and sorrowful eye persuades you that she too is pining after a son who is never to be restored to her. The eagerness with which a boy runs to meet his father will bring to your remembrance that thus your son too would fly into your arms.

To re-unite in your memory cherished features, you will love to place yourself amidst a group of children of the age of your own: from one you will borrow its blue eyes, from another its light hair, from a third its ruddy cheeks. Others will furnish you with their smile, their air, their stature, the tone of their voice. But at the moment when the illusion is on the point of being complete, your exhausted imagination will suffer these traits, which it had been so assiduously collecting, to slip from its grasp; and you will find yourself surrounded by noisy urchins, uninteresting to you since you have ceased to seek in their faces resemblances to that which you were striving to retrace.

By separating the dearest objects from one another, exile produces on the soul a grief which finds no remedy but in hope, if the separation is to have a term; in oblivion, if it is to last for ever.

In the first case the sorrow is less keen, but of much longer duration; because the thoughts dwell incessantly on subjects which nourish grief. In the second, it makes an effort to wean itself from what would afflict it to no purpose; it portions off the past, in order not to embarrass the future with it. It soon directs itself towards other objects; it is occupied with other engagements, other combinations. By interposing between it and the affections with which it must learn to dispense, time insensibly effaces the recollection of them.

Weary of the attempts which it makes to preserve some traces of the features of relatives, of friends, of those who are dear to it, the heart relinquishes to the mind the task of retaining the fleeting impression.

The memory, in its turn, divests itself of names. If, at long intervals, it succeeds in catching them again, it feels neither interest nor regret on the occasion. One has ceased to love; of what use would it be to remember?

Soon nothing more is left of the country which the exile shall never see again but affection for the place of his birth. That affection subsists even when indifference has disarmed it of those who seemed desirous of causing it to be cherished.

These reflections incessantly haunt the thoughts of an exile. Torments of his life, they take away the relish from the rare pleasures which he might be permitted to enjoy. They mingle with his meditations to such a degree as to prevent his indulging in them. They oblige him to fly that he may leave them behind him; to shift from place to place, in order to baffle their approach; to seek noisy scenes, for the purpose of keeping from his ears all the painful things with which they would fill them.

And what would he gain by giving himself up to grief? Nothing. It would weaken the fortitude which is necessary for him, without imparting any useful counsel whatever. It would paralyse his energy, and would give him up, in a more feeble state, to attacks, with which all the strength that nature has bestowed is not sufficient to cope. It is his duty, on the contrary, to arm himself with resignation for the endurance of the ills which he cannot prevent, with resolution to combat what he cannot avoid; to accustom his mind to create a future for itself, and to enrich it with all that can make it a medium of compensation for the past, of consolation for the present; and to seek diversion in the indulgence of tastes which are most habitual to him, and which he is most capable of gratifying.

Habit comes to the aid of philosophy in the efforts which she makes to lighten the burden of misfortune.

Between the sensations and the position of those who suffer, there are relations to which must be attributed that equal division of good and ill which is to be observed among the various classes of society. Joy and grief are, though with very different causes and very distant points of departure, carried to the same degree by individuals belonging to different social situations. The artisan who carries home to his family the wages of his week's labour, is as well pleased as the ambassador who has just obtained payment of the order for his monthly salary. The one thinks of the noisy joys of the pot-house; the other of the pleasure of gratifying some expensive whim.

try girl, as one of the great world in the society of a duchess. The banker, to whom a bankruptcy has left a fortune of no more than two or three millions (of francs) fancies himself, and is in reality, as unfortunate as the farmer who has lost his cow. There is as much grief in the soul of the poor wretch who is turned out of a garret because he is unable to pay the rent, as in that of a monarch driven by rebellion from his dominions. At the end of their career, the king and the beggar, if they had kept an exact account of their joys and their griefs, and were to compare them, would find that each day had brought them an equal proportion, and that life has not been heavier or lighter for the one than for the other: each of them has enjoyed and suffered after his manner: that is all the difference which would strike them.

I have had occasion to ascertain the justice of these reflections, in comparing my past existence with my present existence, my pains and pleasures of past times with my present pains and pleasures, my own country with a foreign land. The days, the months, the years, pass away in one situation as they did in the other. Setting aside my affections, the preference which I should give to the old manner of suffering and enjoying over the new one proceeds entirely, I am certain, from a relic of habit.

Determined not to neglect any thing which could tend to lighten the pressure of my situation, I solicited succour from adversity itself against adversity. I have found that a great affliction, which predominates over, embraces, absorbs, all the trifling vexations of a painful position, is more easily endured than petty crosses, the place of which it in some measure usurps. I have a notion that all my philosophy would have found it difficult to overcome the mortification of losing a lofty position, and the influence and consideration attached to them, or to combat even the habits resulting from them, had any ordinary circumstances suddenly hurled me from the eminent post which I occupied to the spot whence I started to attain it. A great catastrophe accompanied that event. It substituted dangers to the vexations which I should have dreaded.

Sorrowful recollections of the past, an inclination to compare it with the present, at the risk of finding in the latter nought but subjects of grief, regret for advantages which were never to return—all fled at the prospect of the perils which threatened me, and the sensation of the happiness which I felt at escaping them.

I no longer think of my having been minister and possessed of power.

I have escaped the horrors of a situation which might have been terrible. This idea leaves no room for regret: if there is some left for a little hope, 'tis as much as there is.

Adversity finds, moreover, resources and consolations in the dignity and resignation with which it is accompanied.

Time, when one is wise enough to suffer it to act without thwarting its action, succeeds in making a position endurable. It wears down recollections, beginning with their asperities, retrenches what was too painful in them, frames pleasures proportionate to the faculties which are left for relishing them, and throws them into the road leading to the term of all woes, in order to induce them to pursue it.

Among my blessings I reckon the ills from which I am exempt: envy is one of them. I have always thought that life is too short to waste any portion of it in fretting at the prosperity of others. Strictly speaking, this way of looking at things is a calculation of personal interest; for envy is a painful sentiment, a vexation which brings in nothing, and for which it is necessary to find some consolations, of which one has but too many occasions to make a better use.

I am addicted to habits and tastes which it would cost me painful efforts to modify or correct. I am not aware of any great necessity to do so. To have made the attempt in youth, at a period when the future stretched out far before me, and when errors may have consequences of long duration, might have been proper enough. But now that the future is very much abridged, that I can calculate its remotest term within a few days, to devote the remainder of it to a contest with the habits in which I have grown old, would be the height of folly. I keep them like affections.

Then comes an age, when, weary of every thing, what one deems the best part of the pleasure is the end of it, and when the summary of an amusing day is sleep. I have reached it. A similar enjoyment ought to be reserved for me, when, withdrawing from the vortex of the world, and from the remnant of business, which I give myself up to absolute repose. Who knows if it will not be the same when my eyes shall close never to open again!

When I have exhausted reflections and consolations of this kind, I invoke the recollections of self-love. I search my past life to discover in it good done to my country, services rendered to my friends, circumstances honourable to myself. Neither are these attempts vain. I glorify myself without scruple, though, were I not to do so, nobody else would take the trouble; for it would be silly to calculate upon the gratitude of nations for the good one has done them, or their esteem for the important things one has executed. Create, amidst a thousand difficulties, by dint of resolution, labour, perseverance—create for agriculture, commerce, and industry, new means of development; establish the prosperity of a country on solid bases; and you will draw down hatred upon yourself, opposition upon your plans, and obloquy upon your intentions, which will subside so long as you are in power. When you are removed from it, public opinion will correct itself. It will discover good in what has been done, injustice in the judgments that have been pronounced.

At a later period, very long afterwards, a statue will perhaps be raised to the benefactor of the country, not because he has done good, but because, by throwing a mantle over the dress which he wore, he may be made the subject of a monument, which would set off the public place of some city, and which is recommended by the vanity of some administrator, who aspires to the honour of having erected it, and of obtaining a similar one in his turn.

This posthumous glory, this accidental recollection of talents long unappreciated, though usefully employed, this tardy reparation of an obstinate injustice, are of no benefit to him who is the object of them—he is dead. His very grave, were it opened, would not present any vestiges of him. His children will not find in the honours paid to his memory a recommendation that may be advantageous to them, still less a compensation for his neglect of his personal interests and the fortunes of his family.

But, if he had built a play house, if he had planted a few trees in rows to make a drive, to which people would not have failed to give his name, then would he have immortalised himself; he would be thought more highly of for fifty paces of promenade than for fifty leagues of high road.

The moral which I draw from these reflections is, that little things serve for a ticket to great ones; that is, that if we create the latter to recommend ourselves to posterity, we must not neglect the others, if we would gain the good opinion of the present generation.

My observations are deduced from my own experience.

In the course of a long administration I am conscious of having done some good. Who notices it? who talks of it? Not a creature behind my back; a few polite people when they meet me.

I have embellished a quarter of Nismes; the people have given it my name; all vied in complimenting me upon it.

This administrative bagatelle, to which I attached no importance, which I considered as merely a diversion from labours of a higher order, has contributed more to my reputation than the results obtained by undertakings of real utility, more even than the part which I had in the success of the expedition against Algiers.

After this, ransack your brains for honourable ideas! expend your health in realising them! Sacrifice yourself to the public interest, that you may see the most insignificant of your labours preferred to your noblest conceptions, and frequently a coxcomb or an idiot to yourself, who are neither! Let an occasion for popular delirium arrive; offer your services in expiation of the crime of not having had force sufficient to make reason triumph, and you will see if they will abate one iota of the rigour of the sentence: you will be banished, imprisoned—too happy if they do you the favour to spare your life!

My conscience does not forget itself whilst engaged in soothing afflictions originating in the counsels which it gave me. It was this that induced me to pursue a track, the difficulties and dangers of which reason failed not to point out. It was this that encouraged me to persevere on occasions when I might, without dishonour, have withdrawn myself from a danger which I saw imminent—irremediable.

When I reflected that, for the loss of liberty, perhaps of life, no compensation would be made either to me, if I survived, or to my memory, if I should perish; that, in the event even of a triumph, the glory of it would be contested, to say nothing of the risks which I should have run; that the prince whom I should have served, that the public interested in my success, would repay my services with ingratitude alone; that envy, which would not fail to interfere, would be sure to attack my very intentions: it was again my conscience that lifted me above these considerations, well founded as it acknowledged them to be.

At this moment it tells me that there are principles from which a man of honour can never deviate, without doing an injury to his reputation and a still greater injury to society; that the principles which are connected with the stability of governments belong to this number, and ought to be placed in the first line; that on the respect paid to these depends the welfare of nations; that, all these principles going back to royalty, which is the personification of nations, we owe to kings the tribute of a devotedness free from considerations which would tend to restrict its limits and its operation; that, in accepting the confidence of a monarch, we are bound to the nation whose representative and organ he is as we are to himself; that to violate the fidelity we have sworn is a crime against society; that to hesitate about the execution of the orders which he issues is to compromise the safety of the state; that, in calculating the chances of finding the public interest in the will of a sovereign, or in the adverse will of factions, there are more probabilities in favour of the former, because it is more deliberate, more calm, because it is founded on antecedents and facts, and because it tends to preserve: whereas the popular will, fond of theories, hasty, and inconsiderate, tends to destroy; that consequently the public interest imposes upon us as a duty, fidelity to kings, and that in the term fidelity we ought to comprehend all the acts which can render it complete and efficacious; that in certain instances the application of these principles may fail of its effect, but that nevertheless it ought always to be tried.

Then, returning to what concerns me personally, it adds, that I did right to sacrifice the situation which I held, and which I liked, not to a prospect of ambition (mad indeed must have been who had suffered himself to be so surprised in 1833,) but to considerations of duty to a king whom one durst no longer serve; to the sight of the danger which threatened him, and the disgrace which there would be in withdrawing one's self from it when summoned to take his part; that it was my duty to employ, for the defence of the post committed to me, all the resources which honour, reason, and the desperate state of affairs, should suggest; all the energy inherent in my character; that the means which I consulted appeared to me, as they still appear, the only serviceable, the only possible ones, and that they were prescribed in Article 14 of the fundamental law; that if they failed of their effect, it was because they were not so complete as I had required them to be; that, at the aspect of the inevitable chance of ruin which presented itself at the moment of the attempt, such as it had been prepared, it was my duty to conduct myself as I did, and not to separate my cause from that of the monarch and the monarchy, which nothing then had power to save, and of my colleagues who generously associated themselves with their fate; that I had satisfied the claims of self-love by pointing out the errors committed, and the commands of honour by seriously taking my share of their consequences; that I ought to accept, as an indemnification for misfortune, the honour of having done my duty and set an example of fidelity, misjudged by the present generation, whose opinion is governed by the event; but which will some day perhaps be appreciated, and find imitators more favoured by circumstances than I have been.

I accept these consolations furnished me by a conscience to which alone I applied for directions relative to the line of conduct which I was to pursue: they take from my griefs their moral side, and thus lighten what I have left to bear.

I should be ungrateful were I not to mention one of the principal compensations of the misfortune which has befallen me.

Something is yet left me of my past greatness: that is, friends who owe me no grudge for having been prosperous and powerful, and who remember the share which I gave them in my good fortune. Not an inhabitant of the country which was under my administration, to what class and to what opinion soever he may belong, comes near the spot which affords me an asylum, without devoting to me his first visit. All of them speak to me of the good which I have done or tried to do; all show me affection or gratitude. And I, who in prosperity kept carefully on my guard against flattery, complaisantly suffer her to come and pay court to me in adversity.

As this tribute is wholly disinterested on the part of those by whom it is offered, I take it for truth. When one is proscribed, is one so very culpable to seek alleviation for one's woes in the idea, even though exaggerated, of the esteem or affection which one inspires?

But, how soothing are their words, how sweetly they fall upon my ear, how quickly they reach my heart, when, adding to all these flatteries something still more touching, my friends talk of my return to my native land! How thankful I feel for the hope which they give, and the wishes which they express for its realization.

When national consolations are at fault, I apply for one, which is not without efficacy, to the doctrine, or, if you please, the superstition, of compensations, to which I am strongly addicted. I believe in a sort of ponderation of good and ill. I never enjoy any good that comes to me without tempering my joy by the presentiment of something untoward. But on the other hand, I never meet with any misfortune or vexation, but hope, under a vague and indefinite form, mitigates the impression. Now as, in spite of my calculations, the sum of ill exceeds that of good, I gain more than I lose by this method of mingling the future with the present.

Such are the sources in which I steep my soul, to brace it against the calamity which has oppressed me for the two long years that have just elapsed. This period, which I might call that of recollection, is one of those which I have had most to myself, in which I have lived most, and best felt and employed my existence. Till then, my faculties had exercised themselves with energy upon special objects only; now they embrace at once both the past and the present, and as much as they can grasp of the future. I apply to a real calamity a philosophy of which I had been very careful, from a presentiment that it might be of service to me some time or other, but which I had had occasion to oppose only to the vexations of a fortunate position. I exercise it at this moment upon a real adversity. I prepare it for still more grievous situations, the idea of which, without my being able to account for it, will come and intrude itself between me and the hopes of a better lot, and remove them to an indefinite distance, like those dun colours which perspective lays on the first planes of a picture, for a background, and to give more vagueness to objects, the details of which the eye is unable to seize.

So much for the past. As for the future, I have divided it into two:—one part is under the control of my reason, which takes care to restrict its limits in such a manner that it can thoroughly know and duly manage it; the other is abandoned to my imagination, which, though no consequence thence accrues, disposes of it at pleasure, and embellishes it as much as it can. Is it wrong? I think not. But it were better to have nothing to do with it than to treat it shabbily.

THE END.

CAPTAIN X—.

BY THE AUTHOR OF TRAITS OF TRAVEL.

During my career of service I have met with numbers of brave men, and a few cowards. I have seen courage and fear display themselves in various ways, and many modifications; but I never met with but one instance of a thorough mixture of audacity with poltroonery, of the basest faint-heartedness with presence of mind.

On joining the regiment to which I exchanged, for the sake of serving in Spain, the very first of my brother officers to whom I was presented by the major commanding, was the captain of the company to which I was attached. I never was so prepossessed in favour of any one at first sight. He was a fine handsome young man, of most elegant address, full of ready wit, and apparently burning with military ardour. He was a prodigious favourite in the regiment. Nothing could exceed his attentions to me, except the pains which he took to instil a portion of his own gallant spirit into mine.

The first time I went into action with this new regiment, Captain X— was unfortunately taken ill, just before our brigade was ordered to advance. He was obliged to let me lead on his company, and his regret made a deep impression on me. It appeared to me that he suffered more mental anguish than bodily, even though, I think, he specified his being desperately ill in three places.

After we had succeeded in driving the enemy from a strong redoubt, the captain joined us, in great spirits and good health, all his spasms having given way to some violent habitual remedy, which he told me was either "kill or cure" with him. He almost wept at finding that the fighting was all over.

We had several smart skirmishes soon after this affair. Captain X— was often in the field, but I never happened to see him through the smoke, except on one occasion, when he showed great tact in the use of a pocket-glass, with which he constantly looked out from behind a tree or a mound of earth, and gave orders with great coolness to me and the other subalterns, to advance and retreat, as occasion required.

In a storming business, when I was detached with a few men, a serious accident was near happening to Captain X—. As soon as the place was taken, and I returned to the regiment I received a pressing request to repair immediately to him, as he feared he was at the last gasp—dreadfully wounded. I ran to his quarters, in a house just under the rampart, to which he had crawled; and I picked up the surgeon of the regiment on my way, forcing him to abandon some other patient to give his whole attention to my friend. We found him lying on a mattress, almost insensible.

"What has happened? where are you hit, my dear X—?" said I.

He could not speak, but placed his hand on his side.

"Let me examine you, Captain X—," said the surgeon. "I have not a minute to lose—we have many others wounded, officers and men."

"Ah, my dear doctor, are you there?" said the sufferer, opening his eyes for the first time. "How kind this is—but never mind me—hurry off to my poor fellow-soldiers—It is of little matter what becomes of me—I am too far gone for help—I am a dying man—yet you need not exactly say 'killed' in your report; I don't wish to shock my friends too suddenly. Merely put me down 'dangerously wounded.'"

"I can put down nothing, Captain X—, till I see your wound," said the surgeon, drily. "Where are you hit, sir?"

"Why, as to that, my dear doctor, I really can't exactly specify—that is to say, I cannot say directly, that I am absolutely hit—but—but—"

"But what, sir? I am in a hurry—the life of many a brave man is risked by this delay—I cannot be trifled with," exclaimed the surgeon, with most unfeeling emphasis.

"My dear fellow," resumed X—, "I am the last man in the world—the very last —"

"What is your wound, Captain X—, if you are wounded at all?" peremptorily asked the surgeon.

"Ah, never mind me, never mind me," replied the captain; "leave me to my fate—but spare my friends—break it gently to them—only say 'severely wounded' and let me die!"

"What is your wound, sir? Of what nature, is it you again?"

"It must, I think, have been a cannon shot—I feel my side almost battered in—that is to say, a spend shot."

"Is there any mark?"

"Why, no—no—not decidedly a mark—I cannot say there is a direct contusion: it might have been, in fact, the wind of a twelve pound shot, or something of that kind—you may, in short, put me down (to save the feelings of others, very dear to me) you may put me down 'slightly wounded.'"

"Why really, Captain X—"

"Not a word, not a word, my worthy friend—off to your duty—go, go along—you must put me down 'slightly'—whatever you like, in short—something—anything—only pray let my name be in the list of the wounded! Not another word—good by, good by, my dear, my very dear doctor!"

The doctor smiled, as bitterly as though he had just swallowed a dose of rhubarb. He left the place; and my infinite surprise, and that of the whole army, I may say, the London Gazette, which some weeks after brought us the official account of the storming, showed us the unprecedented notification, in the list of casualties, of Captain X— being "very slightly" wounded. He was the only individual of the regiment who was not thoroughly ashamed of this, and who did not feel the actual caution of the surgeon's printed sarcasm.

I now began to know my man; and was not much surprised, at the night attack on a fortress soon after, to hear myself called loudly from the head of the company, (I occupying my post in the rear, as we advanced in subdivisions to the breach,) by Ned Flanagan, of Galway town, Captain X—'s covering sergeant.

"Mr. Hartigan, Mr. Hartigan! For God's sake, your honour, come up, come up quick, and lace the company,—the captain's run away already."

Every one knows what a hot affair Fuente d'Onore was—but no one took it so coolly as Captain X—. The village had been taken and retaken several times till a final charge in which our regiment bore a part, drove the enemy out, and left us in possession of the place. As we forded the river, in close column of companies, Captain X— quietly slipped behind, and took up a position among the rubbish of an old house which afforded him a fine view of the business. The colonel by whom we were that day led on, a Scotsman, who was by hereditary right as brave as a lion, turned round suddenly to the adjutant, and asked him,

"Where is Captain X—?"

"Hiding under that wall, Sir," answered the adjutant, pointing to the reconnoiterer.

"By G—, that's too bad!" exclaimed the indignant colonel. "Gallop up to him—at him—over him—and if he does not rejoin the regiment instantly, cut him down on the spot! Now, my brave lads, on them, steadily and coolly—give them the steel, the steel, my boys, and plenty of it!" added the colonel, turning to the regiment, and quite forgetting Captain X—. But the adjutant rode fiercely up to him, and hurriedly repeated the orders he had received.

"Nay, nay, my good friend," said X—, "what's the use of being so confoundedly hasty? Just let me say a few words in explanation. May I die, my dear friend, if—"

"Die and be hanged!" abruptly uttered the adjutant, putting spurs to his horse, and dashing back to his post, where he had scarcely arrived, when a musket shot through both his cheeks tumbled him to the ground, and put an end to his gallant conduct for that day.

As soon as we were thoroughly in for it at Salamanca, when the grape-shot began to pepper the head of the column, and the men dropped right and left, an officer of ours was seen to throw himself bodily into a dry ditch; and those who could not distinguish who it was, thought we had another brave fellow knocked over. But those who identified Captain X—, were quite satisfied that he was in safe quarters. As soon as the business of that hard fought day was well and thoroughly done, we had ceased firing, and were charging after the broken enemy, when an officer was dimly observed through the smoke that was clearing off, about fifty yards in front of our line, waving his hat with its long streaming feather, in one hand, and flourishing his sword in the other, cheering on the regiment, with shouts of most vociferous valour, the Arapilles echoing to his cry. A roar of laughter burst along the line, and became particularly loud when our company joined in it, for we soon recognized our resuscitated captain, and knew better than any others how to appreciate his prowess.

But his best, and, poor fellow, it was his last exploit, occurred not long after this, at the siege of a place memorable for the determination of its defence, as well as the vigour with which it was attacked and carried.

The approaches of the English army were pushed on with a frightful proximity to the place; so much so, that the guns from the bastions were fired point blank at individual officers and men, who had the temerity to raise their heads above the trenches; and they were often hit from cannon of large calibre, with as dead a certainty, as though the most unerring sharpshooters had levelled at them with rifles.

Our entire company was ordered down from the camp, on a working party, one fine morning, out of our turn of duty, and not a little to our surprise, to replace another which had taken its place in the trenches during the night, but was almost annihilated soon after day break, by the terrible cannonade from the enemy's works. One of our subs was killed the day before, so that Captain X— had but myself and the ensign, a gigantic Kerryman of about twenty years old, and six feet five inches high, under his command. We were under cover, as soon as we came within range of the enemy's guns; and so hot was the fire, that not one of us felt disposed to despise the captain's example of keeping as close as possible.

There were several small redoubts thrown up along the trenches, from which elevations, the officers on duty could keep a sharp eye on the men at work. I slept or rather crept into one of these, to relieve the last surviving officer of the company we replaced. He was in the act of eating a crust of bread, which his servant had procured him for breakfast; and as he was leaving his post to my occupation, he incautiously raised his head, to look at the hostile ramparts, when it was carried clean away by a twenty-four pound shot, and the body knocked several yards out of the redoubt.

These were not pleasant occurrences for any man's comfort, but least of all so to one of Captain X—'s temperament. I was scarcely settled in the redoubt, when I saw him moving towards me along the trench, stooping much lower than the utmost prudence required; and he soon came crawling into the redoubt, requesting me to change places with him, and take the command of the whole party, as he wished much to sketch the bastions of the fortress: and he took out his sketch book and pencil for the purpose. I could not refuse his request, a most unlucky one for him, for had he stayed where his duty required, he had most probably escaped the catastrophe which ensued.

I had not changed places with my captain five minutes, and had just stepped up on the ridge of the trench where the soldiers worked, to look about, as it was my duty from time to time to do, when the general of the day galloped up, attended by two aids-de-camp, and a couple of orderly dragoons. He was one of the bravest of the brave; too brave, indeed, as was proved by his death not long after, on a distant service unworthy of his fine talents. He, too, was an Irishman, and knew our regiment well.

"Who commands this party, Mr. Hartigan?" asked he.

"I do, sir," answered I.

"There is a whole company here, isn't there? Who is the captain? Where is he?" were the rapid questions next put.

"There is an entire company—Captain X— is the captain—he is sitting in that redoubt, sir," were my immediate answers.

"Sitting in that redoubt! May he be doubly —! What is he doing there? Hark ye, sir," added he, addressing our finger-post of an ensign, "you have long legs; step out then quickly—go to that redoubt, and bring back Captain X— here instantly. Stoop, sir—stoop low—lower, I tell you, or you'll not have a head left on your shoulders."

The intrepid Kerryman strode along, but cared nothing for the general's caution, and scorned the shelter of gabions or fascines. When he came to the redoubt, he summoned out the captain, repeating verbatim the general's speech.

"What a cursed hot-headed fellow!" exclaimed X—. "Go back to him, my trusty ensign, and tell him I am taking a sketch of the first importance; I am proving the engineers to have been all wrong. Tell him the service will absolutely suffer if he disturbs me."

The ensign strode back again, and delivered this message to the general, who was moving about busily, giving various orders around him.

"Taking a sketch! The engineers all wrong! What an impudent scamp! D'ye hear me, sir—go back—tell your captain, once again, that I order him to come here; and if he refuses, drag him neck and heels out of the redoubt, and up to this spot."

"I'll tell you what, my friend," said X—, in reply to this second summons, and hoping that while he temporised, the general would take himself off—or, possibly, that he might be taken off—"I'll tell you what—"

"Don't give yourself the trouble to tell me any thing. Captain X—, but come out of this immediately, I tell you again," said the ensign. At this instant his cap, which was visible above the wall, was knocked off his head, perforated by a cannon ball.

"God bless me, what a narrow escape! how very lucky that you were not three inches taller!" exclaimed the captain.

"Never mind whether I'm tall or little, Captain X—," said the Kerryman, coolly clapping the shattered cap on his head again. "I'll tell you what, the short and the long of it is—if you don't come with me, quietly and by fair means, I'll drag you out of it, dead or alive—so come along, I advise you."

X— finding all resistance or subterfuge to be vain, stood slowly up and followed the Kerryman along the trench; muttering that "a man's life was not safe a minute on service with these infernal mad-brained Irishmen; but that with persons of common discretion, one might go through a dozen campaigns, as securely as though one had never smelt powder."

The enemy seeing a general officer so close, sent their missiles towards us in double quantities. One of the orderlies was literally cut across with a shot, and an aid-de-camp's horse severely struck with the splinter of a shell. Captain X— saw all this as he came forward; and by way of ending the business, and stopping the general's mouth, he held forth the little sketch book, and began some stammering sentence.

"Not a word, not a word, but listen to me, sir!" said the general. "Resume your place here—do your duty—or, by heavens, I'll make you such an example as never—"

Here the general was himself stopped short, by the explosion of another shell, directly over the heads of the group—and the report was instantly followed by a terrified mixture of groan and shriek from poor X—, who clasped both his hands across his breast, and with a dreadful expression of agony in his face, fell flat on his back, almost under the feet of the general's horse.

"Good God, is it possible!" cried the kind-hearted general, his wrath at once appeased. "Who could have thought of his ever dying so fine a death! Well, he's gone, poor devil! He was at any rate a clever, a pleasant fellow, and a gentleman—ay, every inch, but his heart—but, he could not help that! Here, soldiers, throw one of those great coats over the body of your captain, and bear him to the camp. We could, after all, have better spared a better man."

With this quotation, the general coolly trotted off with his aid-de-camp and orderly, in the midst of a shower of shot and shell. The ensign and myself were too much shocked by what had passed, to think of any thing for a minute or two, but the fate of our captain, and we stood gazing after the body, as it was borne away, the limbs already stiffening before it was out of sight.

What was the astonishment of the general, who thus pronounced Captain X—'s funeral oration, on riding back to the camp about an hour afterwards, to see the identical Captain X— unharmed, unblushing, and unabashed, dressed, as was his wont, better than any man in the army; and cantering his little Arabian pony along the lines with a feather streaming from his hat nearly as long as the pony's tail? And what was my surprise when I met him the next morning!

But this could not last. A significant hint was that day conveyed to him from the highest authority. The following morning brought him (he said) letters, requiring his instant return to England. He set out at once. The next Gazette announced his resignation; and as Captain X— has been ever since an ex-captain, I have nothing more to say of him.

ANECDOTES OF A DETENU.

Fanny Beauharnois, dinners.—The viscountess was in the custom of giving a weekly dinner to a numerous party. The fare at her table was invariably so bad that her guests were compelled to lunch before they came to her house. The dinners given by Napoleon to those whom he honoured with an invitation were, on the contrary served up in the most magnificent style: his chief cook, with the exception of that of Cambacères, was the most celebrated artiste of the day. Napoleon seldom remained more than twenty minutes, or half an hour, at table, and the instant he rose all the guests departed. "When I dine with Fanny Beauharnois," said Lauragais, "I cannot help thinking that I am exactly in the situation of Lazarus picking up the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table. At her cousin the emperor's banquets, I endure the punishment of Tantalus, surrounded with luxuries, and deprived of the power of enjoying them." The difference between Napoleon and Fauny is this: the one is a potentate, and the other is a late en pot—(a dirty scullion, or saucepan scraper.)

Corn conducive to patriotism.—During the war in Russia, in 1812, the King of Naples gave orders to General Nausouty, who commanded a division of cavalry, to charge the enemy. The horses being worn out with hunger and fatigue, the attack was unsuccessful. Murat having complained to General Nausouty, the latter answered, "I don't know how it is, sire, but the horses possess no patriotism. Our soldiers fight pretty well even when they are without bread, but the horses will absolutely do nothing unless they get their oats."

The schoolmaster in France.—A cockney detenu, who was residing at Verdun in 1810, kept a little shop: he took it into his head to set up a school, and in his window was to be seen a bill, on which he had written in a cramped, crooked hand, "LEARN TO READ AND WRITE!"—"That is an honest fellow, at least," said Sir James Lawrence, "I will call next month, and if I find he has made sufficient progress I will send my two nephews to his seminary!"

INTRODUCTION.

Mr. MacKenzie, in his recent sketches of Canada and the United States, remarks very happily, that "A book about America might be written every six months by the same traveller periodically revisiting the same scenes, and yet possess in a high degree the charm of novelty, so rapid is the career of improvement and so interesting are the changes which the agency of man is continually effecting in the western world." This proposition is in a great measure true, and if not realised by the same traveller producing an annual volume, is more than effected by English travellers in succession. Among the whole of these no recent book maker has produced a more agreeable or readable work than Lieutenant Coke, whose pages we feel confident in commending to the approval of our readers. He writes agreeably, and sees with keen intelligence—allows us merit where due, and criticises sensibly though strongly. His visit to Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, together with some unfrequented routes in the "States," will particularly attract attention. His first ride in Canada gives him occasion to show his British prepossessions, but he afterwards does us ample justice; we may safely congratulate ourselves on being so greatly in advance of our Halifax neighbours, as, if so disposed, to retort tenfold the empty sarcasm and pointless insinuations of recent tourists among us, and to add weight to the argument by reminding the Halls and Hamiltons that there the inhabitants are under English protection and patronage. But the day for this recrimination has passed.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

Feeling dissatisfied with the various statements which have issued from the press in such rapid succession within the last two or three years, respecting the United States, and being convinced that much yet remained to be learned relative to that part of the vast western continent, I came to the determination of availing myself of a short leave of absence from my military duties to cross the Atlantic, and inform myself more fully upon the subject.

After travelling over 2000 miles of the most interesting districts, and visiting the principal Atlantic cities in the United States, I extended my tour through an equal distance in the British provinces. As my only object in publishing the following narrative is to contribute, in however small a degree, to the knowledge already possessed of those countries which are so fast rising into importance, I hope that I shall not lay myself open to a charge of presumption.

In the following unpretending pages, I profess only to give an unbiassed and impartial statement of what came under my own observation. My remarks are confined to those things which require but a short residence in a country; and, merely pointing out some of the most interesting objects and places of greatest historical note, I leave the full definition of Republican, National Republican, Federalist, Nullifier, Democrat, and all the other various shades and sects of the political world, to those who have made state affairs their study.

I much regretted that circumstances would not permit a longer stay in so attractive a portion of the globe, and do not hesitate to recommend those who are at a loss how to kill time during the summer months to make a similar trip. If their expectations are not too sanguine, they will be amply repaid for the slight inconvenience of rough seas and rough roads, by not only becoming acquainted with an interesting people, but by the opportunity which will be afforded them of viewing some of the most stupendous natural curiosities as well as some of the finest specimens of art in the world.

CHAPTER I.

VOYAGE FROM LIVERPOOL TO PHILADELPHIA.

As nothing can be more uninteresting to unprofessional readers, than a recapitulation of all the various changes of weather, the heavy squalls and gales, the more tedious long rolling calms, the dense fogs and dangerous icebergs (on the banks of Newfoundland,) the passing sails, and, in short, the usual contents of a ship's log; I shall only briefly take notice of a few incidents connected with the voyage. After a detention of three days at Liverpool, owing to contrary winds with rough and boisterous weather, the packet ship, in which I had engaged a passage, hauled out of Prince's dock at daylight on the morning of the 23d of April, and stood down channel; but it was not until the fifth day from that time that we were clear of the southernmost cape of Ireland: a foul wind possessed, however, one redeeming quality, by successively displaying the fine bold coast of the Emerald Isle, and the picturesque mountains of Wales.

I had selected the Philadelphia in preference to the New York line of packets, and made some small sacrifice to accommodation and society, from a supposition that but few emigrants would be bound so far to the southward; knowing full well, from previous experience, the great inconvenience of a crowded steerage. I was therefore much surprised to find that although a vessel of only 370 tons, she was carrying out 146 passengers in that part of the ship. I had, however, no cause to regret the choice I had made, as I found myself in an excellent sea-boat with an active and experienced commander, who had already crossed the Atlantic seventy-six times; no trifling recommendation to a pleasure-seeking passenger. The weather, for the season of the year, was unusually boisterous, and the wind variable; blowing scarcely for twenty-four hours in succession from any one point of the compass: but having a good stock of provisions and pleasant society on board, it mattered little to the cabin passengers (who were, with one exception, old sailors) which way the ship's head was; but to the emigrants, an increasing gale was a source of great tribulation and alarm; the deck resounding with their groans and prayers until it moderated. The captain and myself were walking upon deck one equally day, when seeing several of the steerage passengers sitting on the fore hatchway, exposed to every sea which came aboard, yet at the same time apparently regardless of it, we had the curiosity to ask them, what they were doing there, and why not below in their berths?

"Why sure now, captain," said the spokesman, an Irishman, "and isn't it that we are waiting here, so that we will be ready to get into the boats, if the ship goes down; for we know you wouldn't wait to call us." The weather itself was not more variable than their conduct: in a calm, the Welch and Irish kept the whole vessel in an uproar with their broils and fighting, which ever arose from national reflections: and each man having brought a store of liquor on board with him, as part of his sea-stock, the combatants were generally more than half intoxicated; while in rough weather, the self-same parties would be leagued together singing psalms, in which they were assisted by the English and Scotch, who kept aloof during the storm of words and war of fists. Amongst the emigrants, however, were many respectable farmers, who, with their families, were about to seek their fortunes in the New World; but the majority were artificers, and some few were men, who, if they could not make their fortunes, judging from outward appearances, could scarcely mar them. They were well equipped for the early commencement of operations in America, being burdened with no such heavy baggage as bedding, trunks, wives, children, or even a change of apparel; and it was a matter of conjecture to many of us, how they could have procured sufficient money for the payment of their passage. A man obtained a free one in the following by no means uncommon manner:—The crew in overhauling the stores in the sail-room, a few days after we had put to sea, discovered him snugly stowed away within the coil of a cable, and bringing him upon deck, he proved to be a great, broad-shouldered ruddy-faced son of Erin, "a poor orphan," as he described himself, who having taken a drop too much of the cratur, had found his way into the sail-room by accident, and fallen asleep, when the ship lay alongside the quay, and that his provisions were in his coat-pocket, which, upon due examination, proved to contain only a solitary copper, and a dry crust of mouldy bread. Our worthy skipper put him in great bodily fear, by threatening to tie him up to the gangway, and after giving him a round dozen, to put him on board the first fishing-smack we met off the coast of Wales; but it was merely a threat in terrorem, as the following day he was duly initiated into all the rites and mysteries of Jemmy Ducks; and after being invested with full power and command over that very requisite department, he became a most important and useful personage. Some accident, however, relieved him of part of his charge, by administering a quantity of oxalic acid, which carried off all our stock of grunTERS at "one fell swoop." A woman, also, with the tact of her own sex, avoided detection until we had been a month at sea, and was only then discovered through the impeachment of one of her fellow-passengers. She had gone quite on the opposite tack to the "poor orphan;" so far from courting concealment, she had ever been observed to be cooking or loitering about the cabin, was the most noisy of all the females on board, and had once or twice even ventured upon the sacred limits of the quarter-deck. So proud a bearing blinded every person on board; nor could any one have imagined, even when challenged with the fraud, but that she had paid her passage, so menacing and formidable an appearance she assumed, with her arms a-kimbo, and a cocky, unassuming toss of the head. Although the captain keeps a sharp look out (there being a fine imposed upon ships carrying a greater number of passengers than the law admits, according to the tonnage), yet few vessels sail from Liverpool without carrying more than their complement. Sometimes an affectionate wife introduces her husband as master on board in the guise of a trunk filled with clothes, or in a crate, as her stock of crockery, in which he is half smothered, and tossed about most unceremoniously, during the confusion attendant upon reefing the anchor.

Having anticipated a three weeks' passage, the few books I had brought on board were exhausted by the time we were half-way across the Atlantic; and as a last resource, almost amounting to a fit of desperation, I obtained the loan of Dr. Emmons's "Freedonia; or, Independence Preserved," from a fellow-passenger, who toiled in a most persevering manner through at least two of the almost interminable number of cantos (forty, I believe) which compose the work.

Thrice happy indeed was I, when the green water, and again making its appearance, showed that we were at soundings. The unusual length of the voyage had not only been rendered extremely unpleasant by the noise, but also by the want of cleanliness in the steerage passengers, some of whom would not even breathe the fresh air upon deck in moderate weather.

On a fine, mild afternoon—the first we had been favoured with since the shores of England had sunk beneath the waves—there was a cry of "Land a-head!" from the fore-top gallant yard. Every one in an instant was upon deck, some for the first time during the voyage, and the rigging was covered with those who previously had not courage to mount the ladder of the hatchway. Every eye was in vain strained to gain a glimpse of the wished-for coast of America, and three cheers greeted the captain as he descended upon deck; the women crowding round him, dancing and singing, as though he had rescued them from some imminent danger. Many had certainly suffered much from that worst of all series, sea-sickness; and those who had seen better days from the company they were obliged to keep in the steerage; where the small-pox and inflammatory fever had broken out a few days after we had sailed from Liverpool, attacking many, and three or four perishing fatally. The wind, however, which had been dying away for hours, now totally failed us, and it became a dead calm. So our sole employment consisted in watching the movements of the innumerable sloops and small craft which were rolling about at the distance of some miles, and which, whenever a slight air or cat's-paw crossed them, appeared as if concentrating to one point, their heads tending to some great emporium of commerce. Two exceptions to the above afforded much amusement. These proved to be rival pilot schooners, taking every possible advantage of flaws of wind and wet sails, but still making little progress towards the ship which was striving to gain; at last, however, our attention was attracted by a small black object, which appearing at intervals on the swell of a sea, was at first taken for a portion of the drift-wood which so thickly covers the Atlantic off the American coast; but, upon examining it through a glass, was found to be a small cutter, pulled by two men, and in the course of an hour the victorious pilot stepped on board, having fairly outmanœuvred his opponent. Every one pressed close round, asking him ten thousand senseless questions; but he was a man of few words, and all the information we could reap from him amounted to—"that they had frost and snow in April;" and that "there was a war in congress." Having delivered thus much in a gruff tone of voice, he threw a bag of clothes from under his arm alongside the helm; and after passing a few minutes in looking up and scanning the rigging with a seaman's eye, lay down upon a hammock, and, overpowered by his exertions to reach the vessel, was soon fast asleep. His appearance as a pilot was by no means prepossessing; far different indeed from that of the hardy-looking race of the English Channel. He was a tall, gaunt old man, with shoulders bent by the storms of some seventy years, and a face bronzed by the sun until it resembled that of a copper-coloured Indian. I really pitied him, as he tottered along the deck, with one of his hands, which had been jammed between the cutter and ship's side, to his mouth, and thought it high time that he was placed upon the retired list. The day being warm, he was attired in a thick white waistcoat, nankeen trousers, originally blue, and a yellow painted canvas hat. I should judge that the captain was as little pleased with the appearance of the man who had taken charge of the ship, as any one else; for after asking in a significant and dry tone of voice, "if there were any more pilots on board the schooner," he descended into the cabin.

A light breeze springing up at midnight, the following morning showed us the tops of the trees and headlands of the low coast of Maryland, suspended as it were in mid-air. After standing a few miles to the northward, by sun-set we made the capes of the Delaware. It was now the 25th of May, and the day, like the preceding one, was fine and clear, with a warm sun, the thermometer standing 90° in the shade: such a sudden change in the atmosphere, together with the low flat shore, forcibly reminded me of scenes in the East—the entrance to the Bay of the Delaware resembling the mouth of the Hooghly or Iriwaddi rivers. The distance between Cape Henlopen, in Delaware, and May, in New Jersey state, is about fifteen miles. The coast near the latter cape bounds with dangerous shoals and overfalls, and the navigation of the river is rendered very intricate throughout by numerous sand-banks. After passing between the two capes, the river expands into a noble bay about thirty miles long, and thirty wide, when it again contracts to a width of two miles, and continues so with little variation up to Philadelphia. On the Henlopen side of the bay a large breakwater was commenced a few years since, which is to be a mile in length, with the upper end of the harbour protected by an ice-breaker, so that vessels may ride in safety during the winter months: the latter was highly requisite, many ships having been lost through exposure to the river ice. Seven planks in the bows of the packet, in which I was at this time, had been cut through in less than two hours, three months previously, by the drift-ice being kept in motion by the strength of the tide, and acting like a saw against them; the vessel being only saved by running it ashore. The expense of this great undertaking will be enormous, much of the stone required in its construction being brought by sea from the Hudson River quarries, 120 miles distant.

Evening had set in before we fairly passed between the capes, and at the distance of five miles the surf could be distinctly heard roaring against Henlopen. During the day, while our anxious pilot was asleep upon the booms, a boat was lowered to catch a turtle floating on the surface of the water, in as happy a state of forgetfulness as the old man himself; but the ship having too much headway upon her, the boat could not again reach her, and we were under the necessity of awakening the pilot, to heave the ship to, which he most reluctantly ordered, venting his displeasure at the same time in a low inward grumbling. Not feeling very confident as to the safety of the ship under such a man's charge, I took the precaution of retiring to my berth at night without divesting myself of my clothes, thinking it more than probable that I should find it convenient to be on deck ere morning without much loss of time. My suppositions proved correct; for about half-past two o'clock I was awakened by a slight motion of the ship, and although it did not equal in force that of a heavy sea striking it, yet the grating of a vessel with all sail set upon a hard sand, produces a sensation which, when once experienced, will never be forgotten. All hands rushed upon deck in an instant; when, lo! and, behold! our worthy Argus was snugly stowed away in a corner, fast in the arms of Morpheus, while the vessel striking heavily for some minutes, finally fell over a little on its side, and remained immovable. At this time there were no fewer than three lights in sight, two a-stern on the capes, and a floating one directly a-head. I never heard how the old man accounted for running us aground—this, however, was no time for explanations; but the boats being lowered as quickly as possible, and soundings being taken, it was found that we were on the windward side of the "Browne," a dangerous shoal about twelve miles from land; and that so long as the wind continued from the present quarter, there would be no hopes of the ship floating; and, if the sea rose, she would inevitably go to pieces. As day dawned, the ominous prospect of the head and bowsprit of a ship showed themselves above water, a few hundred yards distant, being all the visible remains of the "Canuing" packet, lost two months previously. It was now for the first time, I heard a genuine Yankeeism: "The ship's lost to all eternity," said the captain; "it aint, I guess," drawled out the old pilot, giving the sentence at the same time a most inimitable twang, which even Mathews himself would have failed in producing.

It was in vain that all efforts were used for three hours to get the ship off; it remained firm as a rock, excepting during the turn of tide, when it again struck heavily. Seeing no prospect of its being moved until lightened, the "star-spangled banner," reversed, was hoisted at the mast-head, while the passengers awaited the arrival of boats from the shore to carry them away. The first craft we saw was a sloop, which, laden with shingles, and steered by a negro, run close alongside of us. The fellow hailed us very coolly, with, "Have you a pilot on board?" and being answered in the affirmative, he continued on his course without tendering any assistance: fortunately, however, we needed none; for the wind veering a point or two, and freshening with the flood-tide, we once more floated, and standing our course up the river, soon overtook our black friend and his shingle sloop, at whom, en passant, a volley of abuse was fired.

As we gained the head of the bay, and entered the contracted part of the river, we caught occasional glimpses of small villages and neat white cottages, scattered at intervals along the banks, which were covered with walnut, oak, and patches of pine. I was leaning over the side of the vessel, admiring the scene, but regretting that the clearings were so "few, and far between," when seeing a carpenter, a countryman of my own, similarly employed, I asked him what he thought of the New World at which we had arrived. "Oh, sir! it is a fine country; only look at the timber." I smiled, as the old story of "nothing like leather" occurred to my recollection; and the worthy planer of wood continued to enlarge upon his opinion in a strain of encomium. He came up to me a few hours after landing, quite delighted with having been hired at a dollar per diem on the Ohio rail-road.

The scene was, indeed, a most pleasing one. The clear bright atmosphere, which is unknown to England, diffusing a cheerfulness over every object, with not even a passing cloud to hide the brilliant rays of the sun, as they fell upon the thousands of white sails which covered the surface of the broad and noble Delaware; while, ever and anon, one of those huge leviathans of the deep, an American steamer, darted past, leaving a long train of white smoke from its timber-fed furnaces. The whole presented a scene striking and novel to an Englishman. If there was any thing to detract from the beauty of the landscape, it was the perfect flatness of the face of the country, there not being a rising knoll, or single ridge to break the back-ground; nor could much be seen beyond the smiling verdure of the forest-crowned banks: it was a scene, indeed, at this moment, of life and sunshine; but, probably, if viewed on a squally, wet day, would be thought tame and uninteresting enough. We hove to again towards evening to be boarded by an officer from a revenue cutter, moored in the centre of the stream; and at dusk came to an anchor near a small island, where, at five o'clock the following morning, we buried a child which had died of the small-pox during the night; and then getting under weigh, arrived abreast of Fort Delaware, or the "Pea Patch," built upon a low reedy island, which divides the river into two channels, and is an admirable position for defending the passage. The works are of masonry, and very extensive; but the whole of the interior, including the barracks and light-house, was consumed by fire two years since. No steps have yet been taken towards repairing it, great sums having been expended upon its construction only a few years previous to the above accident. The channel between it and the main land is so narrow, that with a head wind and heavy squalls there was not room to work ships, and we were once compelled to let go the anchor. Opposite to, and about a mile distant from the fort, is Delaware city, at the junction of the Chesapeake Canal with the Delaware. I went ashore for an hour at mid-day, and walked through the city, which is but a miserable straggling hamlet, with an inn at the landing place, and a few stores: at which a friend, who accompanied me, managed to obtain a few cigars, and some Lundyfoot snuff, though the storekeeper would not vouch for its being the true Irish—"It might be Yankee, and made at Boston, but he guessed not." The canal appeared of noble dimensions, being sixty feet wide at the surface, and calculated for vessels with a draught of eight feet water. The inhabitants, however, told us it would not answer now so well as formerly, a rail-way having been formed five miles higher up the river in the same direction, on which most of the passengers travelled between Philadelphia and Baltimore. While we were standing on the side of the tide-lock, two sloops passed through, laden so high with enormous oysters, that the vessels' decks were on a level with the water; being fastened astern of a steamer, they were towed up the river at an amazing speed, for the gratification of the gourmands of Philadelphia. The cholera had broken out in England prior to our sailing, and rumours of its ravages had reached America some time; and as, most probably, its effects had been much exaggerated, every one lived in the greatest dread of its appearing in the States. A gentleman, who was standing on the quay at Delaware city, welcomed my friend, and congratulated him upon his return to his native land; but the latter telling him in jest that we had the cholera on board, he parted from us very unceremoniously, nor could all our assurances that it was only the small-pox, induce him to return and continue the conversation.

The passengers were unfortunately prevented from quitting the vessel, on account of the small-pox having been prevalent on board, which (although the last case was disposed of) would probably subject us to quarantine for some days, unless we could manage to pass the Lazaretto before the 1st of June, on which day the quarantine flag is hoisted, and its performance rigidly enforced upon all infected vessels. It was now the 31st of May, and every one being anxious to avoid farther detention, the ship got under weigh with the flood tide at night; and after running into the mud only once, from which it was again raised by the tide in a few minutes, it carried on all sail until past midnight, and anchored half a mile above the quarantine station, nineteen miles from Philadelphia. The hospitals, with the storehouses, are very prettily situated within a picket fence on the right bank of the river: a small village adjoins, and the ground rising with a gentle acclivity from the water's edge for upwards of a mile, is covered with farms not too thickly wooded, but in many places assuming a park-like appearance. The country, from the town of Wilmington, the largest town in the state, (Delaware) containing about 12,000 inhabitants, twenty-four miles below, loses its dead flatness; but the ridge, which runs parallel with, and at some distance from the river, does not exceed 200 feet in height. Throughout the day of the 1st of June it blew so heavy a gale of wind, that the ship drifted a considerable distance from two anchors, nor could the pilot venture to get under weigh. The following morning, during the ebb tide, several of us rowed one of the boats to a small island, towards which we had been drifting the preceding day, where a farmer had established himself. In landing, we found a sturgeon of about 120 pounds weight, which had been left by the tide in a shallow pool, and seized upon him for the benefit of the steerage passengers, who, like ourselves, were rather short of provisions, and to whom we thought a little fresh fish would be acceptable. But it was not until after hard struggling and battling, with much splashing and rolling about in the water, that three of us succeeded in securing our prize, and lifting him into the boat. The farmer, also, selling us a lamb and some vegetables, we returned in triumph to the vessel, and again got under weigh, and soon caught the first glimpse of the city—a shoal-tower, and huge building in the navy yard, with a forest of masts approaching above the trees. The smart white frame houses, with their green Venetian shutters and gardens, overhung by weeping willows, and numerous peach orchards, on the Jersey side, with the large well-cleared grazing farms upon the Pennsylvania bank, were evident proofs that we were nearing some great abode of men. One island particularly (the possession of which I envied the owner,) of about 200 acres, won by lottery ten or twelve years since, was remarkably beautiful, and quite studded over with cattle.

The tide failed us most provokingly off Gloucester Point, at the upper end of the fine reach, just as we had rounded the land and came in full view of the city, at the distance of only three miles; the wind too, following its example, the ship could not stem the ebbing tide, and very reluctantly the anchor was let go within almost reach of the goal.

In the evening several of us landed, and hiring at a small inn one of the common four wheeled open wagons of the country, called a dearborn, (from the inventor,) proceeded over a road, which, though in the immediate vicinity of the city, was wretchedly bad; the carriage, too, was as uncomfortable an invention as could be well imagined, there being but one narrow wooden seat, slung in the centre of the vehicle upon straps, with two rude wooden springs to support it; upon this two of our party took up a position, while another, who volunteered to drive, sat in a chair in front, and two others occupied chairs in rear of the centre seat, while a little curly headed negro was posted upon one of the shafts, where he sat grinning and holding on like a monkey, his dusky skin forming a charming contrast to an old gray mare which was to draw us. Our time being short, the whip was not spared; so that we were whirled along, rolling and pitching about through thick and thin, and wherever a drain or deep water course crossed the road, the carriage giving a heavy lurch, and all the chairs shooting forward with one consent, our volunteer coachman was nearly precipitated on to the horse's back, and the two in rear of the centre seat, not having any thing to plant their feet firm against, were thrown on to the backs of those occupying the seat in front. It was, indeed, a broad caricature of "travelling in the south of Ireland," and we were right glad to gain the outskirts of the city in safety, and abandon the uneasy conveyance, leaving it in charge of our sable attendant.

While one of the party went to sound the ship owners if we could remain ashore during the night, and until the vessel reached town, the rest of us (after walking about the dimly lighted squares and streets, with which we were soon fatigued, our feet being tender from the little exercise we had taken of late) proceeded to an oyster cellar, and there awaited our sentence with great calmness, discussing the various merits of English natives, and American oysters. The latter are so large, that one of our party, who had laid a wager that he could eat a dozen and a half of them, was obliged to cry, "hold! enough!" ere he had arrived at the twelfth. At midnight, our spy returned with the doleful tidings that we must return to the ship, and that on the morrow a medical man would inspect it, and set us at liberty. To hear, was to obey; so without any more ado we retraced our weary steps, and found our little man of colour and his charge, the pale horse and dearborn, most patiently awaiting our arrival. The road appeared to have grown either somewhat rougher, or our charioteer did not steer so small (to use a nautical term) as before; but after running a wheel once or twice into the deep ditches, with which the road was flanked, he brought us again to the tavern door by one o'clock, where the landlord, aroused from his slumbers, soon made his appearance at the bar. Every thing was strange to me; I might truly say I was in a new world; I had heard of American landlords, but, like the room, this man was beyond my conjectures. He came down stairs the very beau ideal of a dandy, with a tiny, little spiral hat, placed knowingly on one side of his head, gold studs, and brooch at his breast, watch guard chain round his neck, rings on his finger, with his nether man cased in a pair of red striped "continuations;" and, to crown all, he cursed and swore "like any gentleman." We enquired if the boat had been off for us, and were informed it had been, but had returned to the ship at ten o'clock, as he had told the crew he would fire a signal when we arrived. Thanking him for his kindness, we thought as a recompense, we were in duty bound to call for something to drink; and a considerable time having elapsed in carrying our good intentions into effect, and seeing no preparations making for firing his promised signal, one of the party asked him if he would favour us by commencing operations. "Aye, aye," said he, "I told the mate I would fire a gun—I would fire a gun in anger when you came; but wait a bit, I'll take a glass myself, first," and then with the most admirable sang-froid, he set about making a glass of port wine sangaree, stirring the sugar about with a small circular piece of wood, to which a handle was attached, and which he twirled about in his white hands with great dexterity. Having quaffed this mixture off to our healths, and welcome to America, he lighted a cigar, offering one at the same time to each of the admiring spectators, and then crossing his arms over his breast, à la Napoleon le Grand, he talked of passing events, and asked the news.

I turned away from him, unable to repress a laugh, and, as bad luck would have it, unfortunately saw a dog lying upon the floor, which I stooped down to pat with my hands. Mine host no sooner saw this movement, then he was out from his bar in a twinkling, holding forth at great length in praise of the animal, which, from his account, possessed all the various qualities of spaniel, greyhound, and pointer, combined. And after having, in his own opinion, established his dog's reputation, he at last commenced the tedious operation of loading an enormously long barrelled gun, respecting whose good qualities, also, we had to endure a long dissertation, while he was springing the ramrod, and ramming down about three fingers' deep of shot, with as much labour and flourishing movement as there is in loading a twelve pounder field piece; and, finally, we had the infinite satisfaction of hearing Washington, or some such nobly named dusky son of Africa, summoned, who received orders to proceed to the end of the wharf, and fire the long wished for signal. Shortly afterwards the plash of oars reaching our ears, we bade our loquacious host a long and last farewell, having paid him two dollars and a half for the use of his dearborn and gray steed ("he wouldn't be too hard upon us.") and by half past two o'clock were once more in our snug cabin.

The sun was high in the heavens the following day before I awoke from strange and troubled dreams of oysters, dearborns, landlords, negroes, dogs, and guns. A medical man coming on board as the anchor was weighing, said he was satisfied with the health of the passengers, and that we had permission to leave the ship, which an hour after mid-day was safely moored alongside one of the city wharfs, and we all stepped ashore with heartfelt joy, having been forty days from Liverpool.

CHAPTER II.

PHILADELPHIA.

Philadelphia, the reverse of Lisbon, at first presents no beauties; no domes or turrets rise in air to break the uniform stiff roof line of the private dwellings. And, if I remember aright, the only buildings which show their lofty heads above the rest, are the State House, Christ church (both built prior to the revolution,) a presbyterian meeting house, and shot tower. The city, therefore, when viewed from the water, and at a distance, presents any thing but a picturesque appearance. It is somewhat singular, too, that there should be such a scarcity of spires and conspicuous buildings, there being no fewer than ninety places of worship, besides hospitals and charitable institutions in great numbers. In place, too, of noble piers and quays of solid masonry, which we might reasonably expect to find in a city containing near 200,000 inhabitants, and holding the second rank in commercial importance in North America, there are but some shabby wharfs, and piers of rough piles of timber, jutting out in unequal lengths and shapes, from one end to the other of the river front; and these again are backed by large piles of wood, warehouses, and mean looking stores. On the narrow space between them and the water are hundreds of negro porters, working at vast heaps of iron bars, barrels of flour, cotton bags, and all the various merchandise imported or exported; singing in their strange broken English tone of voice, some absurd chorus, such as,

"I met a nigger"—(chorus all) "long time ago!"

"I met a nigger"—(chorus all) "long time ago!"

"I say, where you going?"—(chorus all) "long time ago!"

"Pull away, my boys!"—(chorus) "yoh! heave—yoh!"

or some such elegant strain.

Fifty paces hence, the stranger enters the city, which possesses an interior almost unrivalled in the world. On walking through the fine broad streets, with rows of trees, which, planted on the edge of the causeway, form a most delightful shade, and take away the glare of the brick buildings, he is struck immediately with the air of simplicity, yet strength and durability which all the public edifices possess, while the private dwellings with their neat white marble steps and window-sills bespeak wealth and respectability. The neatness, too, of the dress of every individual, with the total absence of those lazy and dirty vagabonds who ever infest our towns, and loiter about the corners of all the public streets, passing insolent remarks upon every well dressed man, or even unattended female, impress a foreigner with a most pleasing and favourable idea of an American city.

I was recommended by an American gentleman to an hotel in the principal street, where I was immediately accommodated with a room. It will scarcely be out of place to mention here, that the bed rooms in the hotels in the United States are not, generally speaking, so large, comfortable, or well furnished as those in English houses; but the establishments themselves, with regard to size and capacity for accommodating numbers, far exceed those in England. In America much comfort is sacrificed for the purpose of admitting numerous guests into the house: a private sitting room, or separate meals, are scarcely to be had, and then only at a high price; and, therefore, as almost every one is under the necessity of dining at the table d'hôte, a large hotel presents a scene of great confusion and bustle. At the one in which I resided during my stay at Philadelphia, there were about a hundred persons at each meal, and the majority of them being merchants, from the back settlements, on their summer trip to purchase articles for their customers in the west, lawyers and shopkeepers (or "storekeepers," as they term themselves, a "shopkeeper" being only a retailer on a small scale,) they devoured their meals with a most astonishing rapidity; and vanished instantly to their offices and counters, intent upon business alone. I was lost in admiration, and nearly lost my dinner, too, the first few days I was ashore, in watching the double quick masticating movements of my vis-à-vis; I truly believe that one third of the people had disappeared ere my soup was cool. A young man, who opens a store, if a bachelor, has seldom any other apartment than the shop he rents, while he boards and sleeps at an hotel, paying generally about 400 dollars per annum, if at a large and respectable one; the board for occasional lodgers being one and a half dollar per day. It is not customary in most towns to make any extra remuneration to the waiters or other servants of the establishment; but of late years, this bad habit, like many others from the mother country, has been creeping into the cities of the coast; and though the servants do not actually want any, yet they usually expect it: they are generally Irish emigrants, or half castes, if I may use an eastern term: for though during my stay in the United States, I did not enter less than a hundred hotels, I never saw a waiter whom I could ascertain to be a free born American; their pride not allowing them to fill such places in country villages, where the attendants are females. I have frequently seen the one waiting upon me at the dinner table, take a chair near the window, or the other end of the room, and read a newspaper until she observed I required any thing; but during my whole travels, I never knew a waiting man to take a similar liberty.

The breakfast hour is usually from seven until nine o'clock, dinner at two or three, tea from six to seven, and supper from nine to twelve; the table at each meal being most substantially provided. Even at breakfast there is a profusion of beef steaks, cutlets, mutton chops, eggs, fish, fowls, Indian bread, flour bread, sweet cakes, cheese, sweetmeats, and a mess of other et ceteras; but little wine is drunk at dinner, though spirits are placed upon the table without any extra charge being made to the consumers. Yet since the institution of the temperance societies, the use of ardent spirits amongst the higher classes of society has been almost laid aside. I have seen a range of well filled spirit decanters placed upon the dinner table before upwards of 150 people, and not a single stopper removed.

Many hotels have a "temperance house" inscribed in large gilded letters over the door or sign, as a notice that wines and malt liquor only can be obtained there. Like all other new institutions, the temperance societies had their enthusiasts at first. Abstinence societies emanated from them, the members binding themselves to drink pure water only; and, in some churches, neither males nor females were admitted to the communion unless they had enrolled themselves amongst the members of one of the other society. All these bigoted absurdities are now softened down into wholesome and sound regulations. Wines are generally high priced, and not of the first quality, so that little of any thing is drunk during dinner. But in the old fashioned hotels, where temperance societies have not any sway, the bar during the intervals between meals, is besieged by a host of applicants for iced mint juleps, brandy, egg nog, gin cocktail, rum and water, gin and water, port sangaree, and all the various combinations and mixtures of liquors imaginable. When a foreigner (as was the case not unfrequently with myself) finds himself established for two or three days in such a house as this, he must summon his full stock of nerve and resolution to enable him to withstand the dense fumes of tobacco smoke, with which his apartment is fumigated, and to breathe an atmosphere strongly impregnated with the conjoined scent of the above mixtures. The intolerable habit of chewing tobacco is very prevalent amongst the storekeepers, and lower grades of society, but I think it is almost confined to them; the very act of mastication itself (tremendously as it is here performed) is not half so offensive to the eyes of a foreigner as the results arising from it. In a country, however, where there is ostensibly no distinctive gradation of classes in the people, one must of necessity sometimes, as on board steamers and canal boats, mix with all classes; but I will bear witness that I never observed any impropriety, or, during the whole time I was in America, received the slightest insult from (what I will term) the lower orders, and to which individuals, and especially foreigners, are so subject in my native country.

It is singular to see the footing upon which a landlord at an inn is with his customers—appearing rather to confer than receive a favour, by admitting them into his house. At dinner, he frequently takes the head of the table, drinks his wine, and asks those sitting near to take a glass with him; chats, and laughs away, and sits longer after the cloth has been removed than nine tenths of his guests.

Upon first landing, I was much struck with the personal appearance of the people, as being tall, slim, narrow shouldered, whiskerless, and narrow chested, with high cheek bones, sharp, saw features, and a slouching, relaxed kind of walk. I think narrow shoulders and sharp features may be deemed characteristic of the natives of the Atlantic states; one never seeing any such sturdy, robust, rosy faced, John Bull sort of people as Britain produces. Their costume, also, differs much, every man invariably wearing trousers, and the lower orders being better dressed than people in the same walks of life in England. As it was summer, white straw hats, with broad brims, were common, the back part over the collar of the coat, turned up like a shovel hat, giving the wearer a most grotesque appearance; many of the young men wore spectacles, and weak eyes appeared very prevalent.

The first evening I was ashore, I attended the Arch street theatre (the most fashionable one, the Chesnut, being closed,) for the purpose of seeing Mr. Hackett, who was in high repute with his countrymen, perform the part of "Nimrod Wildfire," in the "Raw Kentuckian; or, Lion of the West." The play is intended to censure and correct the rough manners of the states west of the Allegheny mountains, and delighted the audience exceedingly; though to me the greater part of the dialogue consisted of unintelligible idioms. Mr. Hackett possesses great talent for broad comedy; and I was informed that the effect of his performance in the West was such as to excite a strong feeling against him; and so incensed the "half-horse, half-alligator boys," "the yellow flowers of the forest," as they call themselves, that they threatened "to row him up Salt River," if he ventured a repetition of the objectionable performance. I was sorry, however, to see rather a bad feeling displayed towards the old country. In various parts of the performance frequent allusions were made to circumstances which ought long to have been buried in oblivion; and which could only tend to diminish, or rather prevent, mutual good will. These allusions, which ever told against the English, were much applauded by the audience. The theatre is a fine building, and the interior arrangements are excellent. There are also two more in the city, superior in external appearance, and more capacious within than any of the minor theatres in London, and all are well attended.

The 3d of June was so cold and rainy a Sunday, as to remind me of Washington Irving's description of that passed by him at the little town of Derby; but here there were neither the "ducks paddling about the inn yard, the hostlers and post boys lounging about the stable doors, or the bells chiming for church." In vain did I stand at the window looking into the flooded street; there was not a coach passed by the live long-day, and but one peal of bells in the city, those at Christ church; while the ringing of the solitary bell at each of the other meeting houses and churches of all denominations, sounded more like a toll of the passing bell, and added to the gloominess occasioned by the weather. As evening set in, I followed the example of the author of the Sketch Book, and took up a newspaper; but reading only "molasses—flour—whiskey—pork—bagging and bale rope," or the not more interesting news of "the president's speech has arrived in England, and a bitter pill it is for an Englishman to digest," &c., I turned over to the advertisements, generally the most amusing part of an American paper; a runaway apprentice being advertised as fond of pressing down the bed in the morning, with a reward of one cent, and no charges, offered for his apprehension. Printers were cautioned against a swindler, who was thus described:—"He stole his trunk, &c.

out of my house last night, and he has gone away without paying his tailor's bill, or his board bill. Said Rogers is about twenty-three years of age, has red hair, fair skin, and a large homely mouth; the upper teeth jutting over very much. He plays the flute, and makes some pretensions as a poet! but it is easy to see that he is a plagiarist. It is presumed that editors interested for the character of the trade, will give the above a few insertions.

"JOHN CROMWELL."

"3 times.

The following morning I was engaged in passing what little baggage I had brought with me through the Custom House, which was done with but little trouble or vexation, as there were no inquisitive searchers who make it a point to pry into every writing desk, dressing case, and carpet bag. In the evening I again attended the theatre to witness the performance of the "Gladiator," a Philadelphia tragedy, from the pen of Dr. Bird. The principal character was sustained by Forest, the Roscius of the American stage; but I was quite unable to judge either of the merits of the actor, or the play itself; for being rather late, the house was so excessively crowded, and the gentlemen, with scarcely any exception, wearing their hats in the dress circle, I could only obtain an occasional view of the stage. I at first attributed the latter to want of due respect to the ladies, but afterwards came to the more charitable conclusion, that it was an ancient custom bequeathed to them by their quaker forefathers. I caught one glimpse of the star of the night, and he appeared to possess a fine figure, but farther, deponent knoweth not. An American gentleman told me that Forest intended to cross the Atlantic, and introduce the "Gladiator" upon the English stage; and that, if we could only divest ourselves of national prejudices, he must succeed, for the play was so admirably written and so excellently performed! But when I asked him, a few evenings afterwards, to accompany me to see young Kean in the part of Cloten, in Cymbeline, which he was performing for the benefit of an American actor, and was received by the audience in a most flattering manner, he declined in the following words: "No; I make it a point never to see anything English, only what is truly American, performed."

CHAPTER III.

PHILADELPHIA.

I now commenced visiting all the public institutions. Of charitable societies the number is amazing; probably no city in the world, of the same population, possesses an equal number. It may be truly said, that it deserves its name, of "Philadelphia;" there are upwards of thirty humane institutions and societies for the relief of the poor and orphans, besides above one hundred and fifty mutual benefit societies, on the principle of the English clubs; being associations of tradesmen and artisans for the support of each other in sickness, each member contributing monthly or weekly a small sum to the general fund. Of the public institutions the "Pennsylvania hospital" is on the most extensive scale. It is situated in a central part of the city, near Washington Square, and was founded eighty-two years since, Benjamin Franklin being one of its promoters. It contains an excellent library of about 7000 volumes; and it is calculated that about 1400 patients are annually admitted into it, of which number three-fifths are paupers; the remainder paying for the advantages they derive from the institution. The building occupies an immense extent of ground, and on three sides of it an open space is left for a free circulation of air: the west end of the building is a ward for insane patients, of whom there are generally more than one hundred. The necessary funds for the support of the hospital are derived from the interest of its capital stock, from life contributors, and something from the exhibition of West's splendid painting of Christ Healing the Sick, which produces about five hundred dollars per annum, and is exhibited in a building on the northern side of the hospital square. The artist intended to have presented the original painting to this hospital, but his poverty could not withstand the offer of 3000*l.* made for it in England; and it was sold with the proviso that he should take a copy, which was the one now exhibited here, and presented conditionally that it should be placed in a house of certain dimensions, and that the proceeds from its exhibition, being a charge of one shilling sterling for each person, should be added to the hospital funds. The painting, which contains fifty-eight figures, is about 16 by 9 feet, and with two small marine pieces, which he painted when a child, occupies a room in the second floor of the brick building, with the light admitted from the roof. The woman who has charge of it has most probably been wearied by tedious visitors, for she did not even accompany me up stairs, but left me to admire its beauties without interruption.

On the opposite side of the hospital, in the open square, is a fine statue of Penn, executed in England; and on the western side is the public almshouse, with infirmary attached, another huge pile of building, capable of containing 1600 inmates; but not being considered sufficiently extensive, and objections being made to its present situation, a new one is erecting on the rising ground at the opposite side of the Schuylkill river, capable of containing 3000. The institution is supported by a rate upon the people, and the average number of inmates is considerably above 1000. There were many lunatics in one of the wards, where I saw a man with most forbidding countenance feeding a poor girl who was chained to the wall, and her hands confined in a strait waistcoat; but I was assured that such severe measures were but seldom, and blows never, had recourse to. The majority of the insane patients were confined from mania à potu, their number increasing as the warm weather approached. I asked one of them, who appeared rather sensible of his wretched state, how he felt. His answer was, "much better, but (shutting his eyes and concealing his face on the pillow) I have such 'horrid dreams:' never was Shakespeare's "Oh, that men should put an enemy into their mouths, to steal away their brains!" more dreadfully illustrated. The various wards appeared remarkably clean, and great attention was paid to the inmates.

Strangers are admitted to view the institution for the deaf and dumb, a short distance from the almshouse, during certain days of the week, upon making application to one of the directors. It was only incorporated eleven years since, and endowed by a grant from the legislature, with an additional provision for the annual payment of 160 dollars for four years, for the support of each child admitted, with the provision that such annual payment should not exceed 8000 dollars, the sum originally granted. The children, of whom there are about eighty, are instructed in various manufactures, and receive a good moral education.

The museum, commenced by Charles Peale, a private individual, occupies the two upper stories of a building called the Arcade, and contains an excellent collection of stuffed quadrupeds and birds; also the most perfect skeleton of a mammoth in the world; the few bones which were not perfect, or could not be found, being supplied by an excellent imitation in wood. The skeleton was discovered in a morass in Ulster County, state of New York, in 1798, and was dug out of it after much labour and expense by the founder of the museum, in 1801. The skeleton of an elephant which is placed by its side, appears a very diminutive animal. Amongst the objects of curiosity are Washington's sash, presented by himself, an obelisk of wood from the elm tree under which Penn made his treaty with the Indians in 1680, and a manuscript poem of Major André's, written but two months previous to his execution. It is a satire upon the failure of General Wayne, in an expedition which he commanded for the purpose of collecting cattle for the American army; it is entitled the "Cow Chase," and the first stanza is almost copied literally from the old English ballad of "Chevy Chase." He is very severe upon the American general, amongst whose captured baggage, he enumerates the following articles:

"His Congress dollars, and his prog,
His military speeches,
His cornstalk whiskey for his grog,
Black stockings and silk breeches."

and concludes his poem with a check to his satire—

"Lest this same warrior-drover, Wayne, Should catch the poet, and hang him."

It is a singular fact that the militia-men who took the unfortunate André prisoner, were a party from the army under the immediate command of Wayne; his subsequent fate is well known. There is also an interesting gallery of 200 original portraits, principally of those who signed the declaration of independence, and the officers who figured in the revolutionary war, during which period most of the likenesses were taken.

The State House, which has one front in Chesnut street, and the other in Independence Square, is the most interesting building in the city, and, being more than a century old, bears some marks of antiquity: it occupies a great extent of ground, having the courts and public offices attached. On one side of it is the mayor's court, which was holding one of its four stated sessions at this time; and on the opposite side is the room in which the celebrated Declaration of Independence was drawn up, and which was read from the steps in front of the building on the 4th of July 1776. Some Gothic in office modernised the room, for the purpose, as I was informed, of giving his nephew a job, and tore down all the old panneling and pillars which supported the ceiling, and substituted a coating of plaster and paint. It is a matter of surprise to me that the inhabitants ever permitted such a profanation, being generally so proud of their revolutionary relics and deeds of arms. Those who now have charge of the building are busily engaged in discarding every indication of their predecessors' taste, and are restoring the room to its original state. At the upper end of it, there is a wooden statue of Washington—the work of a cutter of ships' figure-heads. The profile is considered excellent, and he is represented with his right foot upon the torn bond which cemented the colonies to the mother country. On the pedestal is the following inscription:

"First in War,
First in Peace,
First in the hearts of his Countrymen."

It is intended to fill a vacant niche behind the figure, which formerly contained the arms of England, with a brass plate bearing the Declaration of Independence as an inscription. The building is surmounted by a tower, the lower part of which is brick; and the upper, of wood, was added in 1828, imitating as closely as possible the original one, which, being much decayed, was taken down soon after the revolution. I had a very talkative old man to show me over it, who was a perfect match for any of our Westminster, St. Paul's, or Tower guides. The bell in the brick tower was cast in 1753, with the following inscription upon it, well speaking the spirit of the times, which did not, however, burst forth until after the expiration of twenty years:—

"Proclaim liberty in the land to all the inhabitants thereof.—Leviticus, 25 chap. 10 verse. By order of the Assembly of the Province of Pennsylvania, for the State House of Philadelphia."

My old conductor rested one hand upon a supporter, while I was copying the above inscription, and then favoured me with a long dissertation upon the blessings of liberty, and an abusive tirade against the English, winding up his discourse with informing me that the bell was rung when the catholics gained their liberty in the old country. He took me up to the wooden tower, and descended largely on the fine mechanism of the clock; how many revolutions such a wheel performed in a minute, and the thickness of each bar in the works; how, when he discovered a fire in the city, he tolled the bell, so as to inform the inhabitants in what quarter it was. One toll signified north, two south, three east, and four west; making a short pause between the tolls, as, one, and after a short interval of time, three in rapid succession, signified northeast: the streets running towards the cardinal points, the situation of the fire could be easily ascertained by the firemen. Having then led me on to the outer gallery of the tower, and pointed out the various buildings in the panorama beneath, and after expressing his sorrow that the room where congress sat during the greater part of the immortal struggle for freedom should have been mutilated, we parted.

I attended the district court, which was sitting in a large carpeted room on the second floor, to witness the trial of an information, filed by the attorney of the United States, against goods landed without being mentioned in the ship's invoice. There were not more than twenty people present when I entered, and a counsel, attired in a blue coat and black stock, was commencing his address to the jury: he possessed great fluency of language, and spoke warmly in defence of his client, an Englishman.

* Mr. MacKenzie, in his Sketches of Canada and the United States, has made some curious errors of spelling proper names. He says, the State House clock at Philadelphia was made by Isaac Lukins, instead of Isaiah Lukens; our ingenious townsman. He gives credit to Joseph G. Lewis, instead of Joseph S. Lewis, Esq. for the plan of the city water-works. With good taste, he remarks, "If I were to choose a retirement in the United States of America, in which to spend the evening of my days, I should strongly incline to prefer Philadelphia." He makes one observation which wants, and will long, confirmation:—"I have seen several black gentlemen riding in their carriages," in Philadelphia. The work is, in some respects, valuable; and that part relating to Canada, so statistical and minute, that it is not likely to be reprinted here.—Ed.

Independence Square, about two hundred and seventy paces each way, is prettily laid out with walks and fine trees, and surrounded by a strong iron railing; but Washington, the adjoining one, is both larger and a more fashionable promenade, being crowded between the hours of five and six in the evening with elegantly dressed females. The greatest objection to the manner in which all the squares are laid out is, that the grass is allowed to grow; and, when I was in Philadelphia, labourers were making hay in them. In this, as in other instances, the Americans prefer profit to appearances, or even comfort. A statue or monument is shortly* to grace the centre of Washington Square, which was a burial ground, or Potter's-field, as it is termed, during the time the yellow fever raged so violently in the city, at the end of the last century.

The twenty-first annual exhibition of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts was holding in a spacious building constructed for the express purpose, containing a fine rotunda with dome, and several galleries for paintings and statues, or casts from celebrated busts: there are several specimens of Canova's and Chantrey's sculpture in the collection, which is extensive; but I was no judge of its value,† nor could the catalogue which I purchased at the door, give me much information as to the sculptors' names. Amongst the paintings, were some by Salvator Rosa, Vandyke, Rembrandt, West, Shee (President R. A.), Leslie (R. A.), and a large one of "The dead Man restored to Life, by touching the bones of the prophet Elisha," by Washington Allston; but the greater proportion of the remainder displayed little talent—the portraits were young and stiff performances; but I was probably more inclined to be fastidious from having so lately viewed West's noble effort.

The great lion, however, of Philadelphia, is the enormous line-of-battle ship, the Pennsylvania, which is on the stocks in the Navy-yard at the lower extremity of the city. I took advantage of the kindness of an officer in the American service, to walk over it; and he also favoured me with its dimensions:—the keel was laid in 1822, and the vessel finished to its present state in seven years; the timber being exposed to a free circulation of air for the prevention of dry rot; it could, however, be prepared for sea in six months. The shed which protects it from the weather is two hundred and seventy feet in length, one hundred and five in height, and eighty-four in breadth, with a reservoir at the top of the roof, which can be filled with water by means of a force-pump, the city water-works throwing it within fifteen feet of the summit. The upper deck is two hundred and twenty feet in length, and no forecastle; the extreme breadth of beam fifty-eight feet; depth from spar-deck to keelson, forty-four feet four inches; and draft of water twenty-seven feet six inches. Her decks are seven feet high, and from the orlop to the gun-deck is seven feet four inches. The anchors were wrought at Plymouth, Massachusetts, and the sheet anchor weighs 10,171 lbs. When manned, she will carry a crew of 1500, including 120 marines, and from 140 to 160 guns; but is rated at the former number, 70 of which are thirty-two-pounders, weighing 61 cwt. each; 38 forty-two pound carronades of 27 cwt., and 32 forty-two-pounders, weighing 76 cwt. 1 qr. each. The spars for it are not yet made, but the main-mast will be one hundred and thirty-five feet in height, and forty-four inches in diameter; and the extreme height from the keelson to the summit of the flag pole, upwards of three hundred feet: the guns were cast at Georgetown, near the city of Washington.

Another shed near it contains a double-banked frigate of sixty guns, whose keel was laid in 1819, and could be fitted out for sea in forty days: the state cabins are paneled with mahogany and white maple; the gun carriages of white, and the principal timbers of green oak: both vessels are considered by the Americans as well-built, and the frigate as a perfect model.

The Navy-yard is small, compared to any of those in England, but considerable additions were making: the barracks in it will contain one hundred and fifty men, and from sixty to seventy were doing duty there at this time; their undress uniform, a shabby-looking French gray, gave them any thing but a military appearance; their full-dress of dark blue is much neater, nor could I ever understand why it was not usually worn.

A fine Marine Asylum is building near the road to Gray's Ferry, a short distance from the city, on a most capacious plan; the front of it being little less than four hundred feet in length, and a broad double verandah upon two sides.

* We fear "shortly" is too strong a word.—Ed.

† Candour worthy of imitation.—Ed.

The scenery in the immediate vicinity of Philadelphia is tame and uninteresting, with the exception of one or two spots on the banks of the Schuylkill, where the face of the country is rather more broken and abrupt; swimming in some places rather a romantic appearance. Advantage has been taken of these by gentlemen who have laid out their grounds with good taste, and much improved their farms by adopting the English system of agriculture.

The greatest lounge for the inhabitants appears to be the Fair Mount Water-works, upon the excellence of which they very justly pride themselves; and at last having expended a million of dollars in experiments, they have discovered a plan at once economical and serviceable. All attempts having failed, at an enormous expense, to supply the demand for water in the city, it was determined to lay aside the use of steam for the introduction of water power; and the present works were commenced in 1819, by throwing a dam, 1500 feet in length, at an obtuse angle across the Schuylkill, so as to be less exposed to the force of the current. A mill, 238 feet in length, containing several double forcing-pumps, is situated immediately below the dam on the left bank of the river, with a race-way to lead the water over seven wheels about sixteen feet in diameter, which can force nearly seven millions of gallons of water per day into the reservoir on the summit of a hill, one hundred feet above the level of the river, and fifty above the highest part of the city. They contain nearly twenty millions of gallons; and the present consumption of water does not exceed two millions, and in the winter months one million per day. The expenses of the mill are but four dollars, two men being sufficient to attend the works; while that of steam was 206 dollars per day, and did not raise half the quantity. The corporation are improving the garden attached to the works, by the introduction of fountain statues, &c. They are a place of great resort for strangers, to whom the simple and ingenious machinery is very interesting, and the gates are daily beset by a large assemblage of carriages. A wooden bridge of a single arch, of the enormous span of 340 feet, crosses the Schuylkill in the immediate vicinity of the water-works; being fifteen feet narrower in the centre than at the abutments, with a roof and windows at the sides, which are walled in, as a protection against the weather; it presents a singular appearance to a person who has been accustomed to more substantial but lighter looking structures. There is a second wooden bridge nearly a mile below this one, with three arches and stone piers; a marble obelisk at one extremity of it states that the cost of its construction was 300,000 dollars, and recounts the great hardships and fatigue the workmen experienced in laying the foundation of the piers: the length of the bridge, with its abutments, is 1300 feet; the space of the centre arch being 195, and the width of the road upon it forty-two feet. One of the piers was commenced in the middle of winter, 800,000 feet of timber being employed in the construction of the coffer-dam: the masonry of the pier was begun a Christmas day, 1802, and finished to low-water mark a forty-one days and nights, though the foundation was on the rock at the amazing depth of forty-one feet below the water; being, it is supposed, the greatest depth at which regular masonry has ever been constructed. Some months were occupied in preparing the dam and repairing damages; the subaqueous work consuming in fact a great proportion of the expenditure.

I had heard much of the expertness of the Philadelphia firemen, and feared I should be disappointed in my hopes of witnessing it. A few days, however, before I quitted the city, hearing the alarm-bell, I ran out, and, remembering the old man's instructions at the State House, took the requisite direction. Though I hurried as speedily as possible to the scene of action, when I arrived upwards of fifteen engines and hose-carriages were already play upon the fire, which had gained considerable height, but such an immense flood of water was poured upon it, that it was shortly extinguished. I afterwards walked to the house in which the carriage of the Philadelphia Hose Company was kept, when some of the members very kindly drew out the carriage, and gave me a copy of the rules and by-laws they had established. It was decorated and painted in a most costly manner, and with 1000 feet of hose, had been purchased for 1500 dollars, bearing the well-executed classical device of the car of Tydides and Nestor at the siege of Troy, as represented in Westall's (R. A.) painting, and the motto "res eibi sed omnibus." The other carriages were all neatly painted and decorated in a similar manner. There are about thirty engine and sixteen hose companies; but all the firemen, unlike those in other cities, are volunteers, and defray the expenses of their engines from their own private funds; the first company of the kind being established by Dr. Franklin. The hose formed upon the same spirited principle as the engine companies, were established for the purpose of supplying the latter with water in greater quantities than the old system of carrying it in buckets. Each carriage has a large cylindrical roller in the centre, round which the hose is lapped, with brass screws and joints at intervals of about fifty feet through its entire length. One end is screwed into a street plug, and the water forced through the hose to the engine, which can have a greater supply of water than required. The hose companies who arrive first at the fire taking the nearest plugs, lend their surplus hose to the last comers, who are thus enabled to bring the water from almost any distance in the adjoining streets. There are about 100 members in each company, generally young merchants and tradesmen, amongst whom there is a great esprit de corps, and anxiety to reach a fire before any other company. Fines are imposed upon members who attend upon such occasions unequipped in their thick water-proof dress, and glazed hat, with badge upon it, or who leave a fire without permission from a director; and there are many other similar regulations. Each member also pays a certain sum upon his entrance into the company, and a small annual subscription. It was an interesting sight to witness the regularity with which the various companies moved rapidly through the streets at night to the place where their services were required, by the lights of numerous torches, and with the ringing of the large bells suspended from the cars: and, after the fire was extinguished, all moved away to their respective station-houses, where the roll was called over, to ascertain the absentees. Such an enthusiastic public spirit is doubtless kept alive only by the constant call for the services of the young men; and every fire will tend to diminish it in some degree, an edict having been lately passed, by which a heavy fine is imposed upon any one erecting a frame-house within the limits of the city.

The Bank of the United States (or, as the Americans term it, Uncle Sam's strong box) was commenced in 1819, after the plan of the Parthenon at Athens, omitting most of the merely decorative parts of the building; and is situated in Chesnut street, the most fashionable street in the city. The building is entirely of white marble (161 by 87 feet,) the porticoes at each end being supported by eight Doric columns, each 27 feet in height, and four feet six inches in diameter. When viewed by moonlight, I think I never saw any thing more soft or beautiful. The banking room, in the centre of the building, is 81 by 48, and 35 feet in height, with a tessellated floor of American and Italian marble; upon each side of it are rooms for the directors, engravers, and copper-plate printers. The capital of the bank is 35,000,000 dollars, or rather more than 7½ millions sterling, divided into 350,000 shares of 100 dollars each; the government being proprietors of one fifth. It has twenty-two branch banks, distributed in various parts of the Union. Great consternation was created amongst the directors, during my residence in the country, by the promulgation of General Jackson's veto upon the bank charter, which will expire in 1836. The original charter was granted for twenty years; and a bill for renewing it from the 3d of March, 1836, had passed both houses of congress, but did not receive the assent of the president. His veto most fully laid before the people his reasons for taking so decisive a step.

CHAPTER IV.

PHILADELPHIA—GERMANTOWN.

The Philadelphians, and I think I may include the Americans in general, have a great rage for playing at soldiers, and fondness for military display: scarcely a day elapsed on which I did not see either the Jackson Guards, Liberman Greens, Washington Greys, Philadelphia Blues, or some such named troops, parading with bands of music up one street and down another, until they had run nearly the gauntlet of the whole city, when they were dismissed. There was nothing objectionable in their appearance as volunteers, for all were particularly well clothed, with clean and neat accoutrements; and, as to stature, many were exceedingly fine-looking companies; but although they could keep step in marching, diminish their front in a narrow part of the street, and wheel to the right and left at the corners tolerably well, yet the words of command which were frequently given savoured but little of a military education, or as if much attention had been paid to the study of the evolutions. These volunteer corps are composed of respectable young men, who form themselves into companies, for the purpose of avoiding being called out to the militia trainings, which take place annually, and which are generally much more ludicrous than is represented even in England, and where the citizen soldiers learn more that would unfit them for actual service, in one training, than six months' severe good drill would break them of. The system is altogether deprecated by every reasonable man in the United States; and all exertions are made to cast ridicule upon, and bring it into disrepute.

On my way to the office of a rail road, which was opened on the 7th of June, between the city and Germantown, six miles distant, I witnessed a most extraordinary mode of selling the stock in some new bank. It was a scene worthy of St. Giles's or Billingsgate; and such as I should never have expected to see in the quiet city of Philadelphia. The manner in which it was disposed of was as follows: the sellers were in a house, with a small aperture in a window-shutter, only sufficiently large to admit a man's hand, and through which he delivered his money; but having received his scrip, after a lapse of some time, it was impossible for him to withdraw through the crowd of purchasers; no one would make way, lest he should thereby lose his chance of ever gaining the window. The only plan then was, that one of his friends throw him the end of a rope, which he fastened round his body, and part of the mob, who came as mere lookers-on, dragged him out by main strength, frequently with the loss of the better half of his apparel. Many had, however, come prepared for the worst, by leaving their coats, shirts, and hats, at home. It was here that the strongest went to the wall, and various were the schemes adopted to keep possession. One fellow had very knowingly brought a gimlet with him, and, boring it into the shutter, held on with one hand, while he fought most manfully with the other! A bystander told me that a large party had leagued together for mutual support, and taken possession of the window the preceding evening; but that a stronger one attacked them in the morning, and drove them from their position, though not without several heads, arms, and legs, being broken in the affray. It appeared, therefore, that the only chance a peaceable citizen had of obtaining any stock was to hire the greatest bully he could find to fight his battles for him. This scene continued throughout three days; and, besides many severe and dangerous wounds which were inflicted in the contest, one man was killed.† In consequence, however, of this and similar disturbances, meetings of respectable citizens were held, to devise means to prevent a recurrence of them on like occasions; and, as an additional proof that they were ashamed of those proceedings, one of them expressed a hope "that I had not witnessed a sale of bank-stock." Pursuing my way to the rail-road, I overheard a brick-layer call out from his kiln to another at some distance, "I say Jem, Bob 'll have a blow out to-morrow." "Why? how?" "He's gone to buy stock, and he'll work his way amongst them, I know." I had been detained so long, that I did not arrive at the railway until two minutes past nine, and the car had started as the clock struck; so I passed the two hours, until the departure of the next train, by walking out into the country. It was the first time I had well examined any American farming, which, to an Englishman's eye, appears to great disadvantage. To this effect, the substitution of zig-zag, or, as they term them, worm fences of dead wood, instead of the neat quickset hedges of English husbandry, does not a little contribute.

Locomotive engines had not been introduced, and horse cars were substituted until the railway should be completed, a single road only being at present finished; but many hundreds of workmen, principally Irish, were employed in laying an additional one: the castings were imported from England, and the chairs were firmly fastened into blocks of gray granite, the foundation being well secured by a trench of thirty inches filled with Macadamised stones, well rammed down: and where any rails appeared to give way, or start out from each other,

* In another instance a strong man lashed himself to the window-shutter.—Ed.

† We are not sure as to the killing, but the scene described is not otherwise exaggerated, and to the disgrace of our city there were several repetitions. A gentleman of property lost the best part of his ear, which was hacked by a butcher knife; he was one of a party dislodged from the windows which had been taken possession of before daylight. These scenes, it is hoped, will not occur hereafter, as experience has proved the necessity of a sale of the stock of newly incorporated banks at auction.—Ed.

those opposite were connected with them by a rod of iron, and gravel overlaid. The highest embankment on the road was forty perpendicular feet, and the only very heavy work was the blasting a ridge of granite, through which we passed, four miles from the city. The carriage ran remarkably easy, and, though carrying twenty passengers (and calculated to hold forty,) the horse took it the six miles in forty minutes, the road rising thirty-two feet per mile throughout the distance. The usual contrivance of a lever to regulate the speed of the carriages was used, having a brush at the lower end for the purpose of sweeping the rail before the wheel. A busy scene presented itself at the place where the cars stopped, on the edge of a wood, half a mile from Germantown. A large concourse of molasses beer and oyster sellers had established themselves under the trees; several frame houses were erecting for the sale of egg-nog and mint juleps; and land, which had been of little value a twelvemonth before, was now letting at half a dollar per foot. Germantown is a straggling place, three miles in length, and interspersed with gardens and orchards, which give it rather the appearance of a large village. It was here that Washington experienced a repulse in his attack upon an English division, in 1777. I walked through a large stone house, the property of Mr. Chew, which was the principal scene of action, and most gallantly defended by five companies of the 40th regiment, under Colonel Musgrave, against incessant attacks of an American column, under General Sullivan. It stands on a rising ground, about two hundred yards from the main road, and still bears marks of the light artillery, which was brought to bear upon it. I addressed myself to a man who appeared to have been left in charge of the house, by the proprietor; but he answered me so coolly, and appeared so little inclined to give any information, that I turned away, and commenced a conversation with his wife, who volunteered to show me through the building, and pointed out the grave of the English General Agnew, in front of the stables, near which lay also several ornamental statues, which had lost heads or arms during the fight.

We were only thirty minutes returning to Philadelphia, where a great concourse of people had assembled, to witness the arrival of the cars, it being the first road of the description which had been opened near the city.

The Americans, particularly in that portion of the country which gives birth to the Yankees, have acquired a reputation for loquacity and inquisitiveness, which does not extend to the Philadelphians, who appear rather to inherit the Quaker taciturnity; for, during the first three days I was at the hotel, not a single individual addressed a word to me at table. All were too busy to ask questions, or to pay the slightest attention to any one's wants but their own; as they ate, so they departed in silence. At last, fearing I should lose the use of my tongue, I took courage on the fourth day, and made some common-place observation to a dark, stout man who sat next to me, and who always had an English-looking pointer under his chair. Judging of the master by his dog, I immediately decided he must be a countryman; but no! he could speak English but very imperfectly, and as he doled out to me a long story in pitiful accents, about his losing 1500 dollars the preceding day, I knew him to be Monsieur Chabert the fire-king, having read an advertisement in the papers offering 500 dollars reward for the recovery of the stolen property. I went the same evening to the Masonic Hall, a room of noble dimensions, lighted by gas, from private works, to witness his performance; the attendance was very thin, and the audience appeared to take very little interest in his lecture upon the various qualities of poisons, and the impunity with which a large quantity might be taken, provided the antidote followed immediately; for all talked incessantly. They were more attentive when he commenced drinking the poisons, passing red-hot bars of iron over his tongue, swallowing oil heated to 390 degrees, Fahrenheit, and burning a cloak off his back, by entering a temple in which 300 cartridges exploded. Shouts of laughter accompanied the awkward attempts of some few aspirants to perform the same feats.

The historical compositions upon many of the signs displayed over the small inns, in the suburbs near Kensington, were painted in no ordinary style, and numerous groups were introduced in the subjects, in quite an artist-like and classical style, such as in "The Landing of Columbus in the New World;" "Washington crossing the Delaware on the 25th of December 1776;" the "Surrender of Lord Cornwallis," and "Penn's Treaty with the Indians," which was very near the spot where the elm-tree stood under which the treaty was made. The tree, which measured twenty-four feet in circumference, was blown down a few years since, and a small marble obelisk now marks the spot where it stood.

Penn's name is sufficiently immortalised; and had his plan been but rightly adhered to, there would have been none of those mean-looking houses on the water front. By singular good chance, however, his original intention bids fair to be carried into effect. An eccentric, but public-spirited man, Stephen Girard, a wealthy banker, whose sentiments appear to have been in accordance with the founder's, having lately died, bequeathed an immense sum for the express purpose of beautifying the city. The history of this man, who died one of the wealthiest private individuals in the world, is very remarkable. It appears that he was born at Bordeaux, in France, about 1746, and at the age of fourteen sailed for the West Indies, as a cabin-boy. Thence he traded for several years to New York, as mate of a vessel; and soon after settled in Philadelphia, where, at the conclusion of the revolutionary war, he kept a small shop; dealing in old naval stores, such as iron, rigging, &c.; and his small frame house was situated on the same spot that the mansion in which he died now occupies. At times he was engaged as a pedlar, journeying up and down the country to farm-houses, and disposing of groceries, and ready-made clothing, returning to the city when his stock was exhausted; and by degrees amassed such a sum of money, that he ranked as one of the first merchants in the city. At the expiration of the charter of the bank of the United States in 1810, he established a private bank, the capital of which in a few years was augmented to five millions of dollars. From this circumstance, and from taking a loan of five millions during the late war, receiving 100 seven per cent. stock for 70, with a fortunate speculation in the stock of the present bank of the United States, his wealth increased to so vast an extent, that at his death it was estimated at fourteen millions of dollars,* the whole of which, with the exception of a few legacies to his brother, and nieces, amounting to 140,000 dollars, and small annuities to his servants, he bequeathed to different charitable institutions, and for the improvement of Philadelphia, and New Orleans; also for the establishment of a college in the former city, for the residence and accommodation of at least three hundred scholars,†—Philadelphia being the residuary legatee. If the two millions of dollars, appropriated for the erection and support of the college, were insufficient for building it, and maintaining as many orphans as might apply for admission, he left a farther legacy for that purpose. He also bequeathed half a million of dollars, the income of which was to be applied exclusively for laying out a street, to be called Delaware Avenue, along the heads of the docks in front of the city, and for pulling down all buildings between it and the water, within the limits of the city; to remove all wooden buildings, and to prohibit any being built hereafter within the said limits: his intention being to make that part of the city correspond better with the appearance of the interior; and, in case the commonwealth of Pennsylvania failed to pass the laws, with regard to the improvements he required, before the expiration of a year from the time of his death, the whole bequest, excepting that for the college, should revert to the United States for the purposes of internal navigation, "and no other." When I arrived in the city, all the necessary laws had been passed; and a fine of 500 dollars was to be imposed upon any one who built a frame or wooden house within the limits. Preparations had also commenced for building the college, widening the streets near the river, and in every way complying with the testator's will.

The following Sunday I was more fortunate in the weather, and attended divine service at Christ Church, one of the neatest religious edifices in the city. But every thing appeared new and strange to me—there was no clerk, and the congregation read the responses aloud. The service, too, like the interior of the State House, had been modernised, and had been deprived of much of its solemnity, in my opinion, by being rendered into familiar modern English. Emblematic of the country, every thing old was discarded.‡ A gentleman, who sat near me, very deliberately rose, from his seat, and walked across the aisle to the occupant of another pew, with whom he shook hands, sat down, and, after conversing with him for some minutes, resumed his own seat. I ought to state, however, that this was the only instance of such disrespectful conduct which came under my observation: the Americans in general being very attentive to their religious duties, and scrupulously respectful of the devotion of their neighbours.

The markets are excellent; particularly one long range of buildings in High street, up the centre of which it extends for about three-quarters of a mile. They are a perfect patron of neatness, though not to be compared in grandeur or convenience to that at Liverpool, being merely roofs supported on brick pillars, with a single row of stalls on each side of the passage; yet the most delicate lady might walk at any time of day from one to the other end without inconvenience or annoyance. It is considered the best beef market in the Union, and is well supplied with fruit and vegetables of every description, excepting Irish potatoes, a good bushel of which, coming direct from Europe, is considered no mean present. I think that I scarcely ever tasted a good potato any where south of New York. The costume of the butchers (white coats and aprons) is much cleaner looking, and more becoming, than the dirty blue of the English knights of the cleaver and hatchet.

The regularity of the streets much pleased me upon first landing; but, after I had gained some little experience by a week's hard walking, I began to look upon them as rather monotonous, and to wish that there was more than a solitary crooked one. The city occupies the space of ground between Delaware and Schuylkill rivers, which are about two miles apart; all the streets running from the former to the latter, due east and west, are, with the exception of High street, named after various trees.

Though the exterior appearance of the houses exceeds those in English towns, from the bricks being painted red, and not dimmed by the black smoke of coal fires, while the windows are set off by the smart green Venetian shutters, yet the streets are but badly paved and lighted, and worse kept as to cleanliness. I have seen innumerable pigs running about, and rooting, ad libitum, in the most fashionable parts of the town; and have been obliged to turn off the causeway into the road, with danger of being run over by a carriage or an equestrian, because it was blocked up with piles of merchandise and empty chests—as if the storekeeper to whom they belonged was proud of making a display that he was a dealer on a great scale. Day after day would those identical nuisances be in existence, and tolerated by the citizens as a matter of course; because, in fact, to them it was nothing uncommon—quite an every-day sight.

The appearance of the two most fashionable squares is much marred by the position of a prison, which occupies nearly one side of each. But the most unsightly building, and that which is least in accordance with the habits and sentiments of most Americans, as to its interior economy, is that bastille, the penitentiary; the principles of which institution have been so ably described by former travellers. For my own part, I could not view its lofty castellated walls and towers, loop-holed windows, portcullis, and ponderous iron-studded gates, without a shudder at the fate of its wretched inmates. Whoever views the establishment will confess that the Americans have carried punishment for crime beyond even death itself.

It is said that Philadelphia possesses more real and ready capital, and that the merchants' speculations are more confined to the latter, than is the case in any other city in the States. The manufactures are extensive, especially the warping-mills, of which there are upwards of one hundred in the immediate vicinity; and, since wood fuel has become more scarce, a great trade has been carried on, up the Schuylkill and Lehigh rivers, with the coal mines, one hundred miles distant.

Like all American towns, Philadelphia teems with "knowledge for the people;" there being eight daily,* one twice a week, and thirteen weekly newspapers; seven monthly, and four quarterly publications. Of the latter, the American Review is well edited.

Altogether, I have seen but few cities with which it will not bear a comparison; and, in my own poor opinion, it is superior to all on the continent of North America. I could not spare time for more than a ten days' residence there; and, though during that time I did my best to satisfy my curiosity, I regretted to leave it without having seen all I wished.

CHAPTER V.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA—BALTIMORE—WASHINGTON.

At six A. M., on the 13th of June, I embarked in one of the "Citizens' Union Line" steamers, and proceeded down the Delaware at the spanking rate of fifteen knots an hour. A few minutes after I had been on board, seeing a negro ringing a hand-bell up and down the decks, and having my eyes and ears open for every thing new, I walked towards him with the expectation of acquiring some valuable information; when, with the stentorian voice of a town-crier, he sung out, "Gentlemen who wish to take breakfast, please walk to the captain's office, and take tickets—also, pay their fare."‡ There were from 150 to 170 passengers on board; so I in vain strove to penetrate the dense mass collected round the small scutry box office, and therefore commenced inspecting the various groups of people, barbers' shops, washing-rooms, dressing-rooms, and bar-rooms, with which the upper-deck was covered. I had, however, scarcely studied the various groups, or come to any fixed determination who and what the principal orators were, judging only from a physiognomical view of them, when I again heard the black crier and his bell, with a shriller and more decisive tone, screaming out, "Gentlemen a't paid their fare will please walk to the captain's office!" where I found nearly as great a throng as before; but, being more persevering in my efforts to pierce a crowd which reminded me of the stock-selling scene, I at last obtained three scrips (or tickets,)—one for breakfast, to be returned when called for at table; the second to be given on going ashore; and a third, I think, for the railway wagons, or the steam-bus in the Chesapeake.

The American river steamers are noble vessels, and the engines working upon deck, such ample accommodation is afforded, that between two and three hundred passengers can sit down to breakfast in the cabin, which extends from stern to stern, excepting a small portion panelled off in the after part, which is held sacred to the ladies alone, "No admittance for gentlemen" being painted in legible characters over the door. The accustomed shrine of Bacchus, to which the gentlemen pay their repeated and enthusiastic devotions, is exposed to the gaze of all admirers at the fore part of their cabin. No man of course would be so unconscionable as to expect any thing approaching to comfort at the table of a steam-boat; so I should advise him to get rid of his meals as speedily as possible, just as he would of any unpleasant duty which must be performed; and then let him breathe the fresh air again upon deck, where, if the beauties of nature have no charm for him, he can pull out his watch and count what number of revolutions the paddles perform in a minute, or work the calculation of how many knots his vessel cuts through the water per hour. For my own part, I always preferred being on deck on a cold day, though a shower of rain might accompany it, to stare below with 150 passengers; and used often to imagine what a hurry and scuffle there would be in the cabin if the vessel "collapsed its flue" (as the Americans would say,) or, in plain old English, burst its boiler.

Touching at the various towns on the river's bank, to land passengers, delayed us for a few minutes; but we arrived at Newcastle, thirty-five miles from Philadelphia, in two hours and a half. Stepping at that place from the vessel on to the railway, we entered the several horse-cars, according to the numbered tickets we had received on board the steamer, without any trouble about the baggage, which had been placed in small cars previously to our leaving the vessel, and now followed us on common railway wagons.

The country through which we passed was very flat and uninteresting, with scarcely any signs of population, and the soil poor and wet. In two hours we arrived at Frenchtown, containing two or three straggling houses on the banks of the Elk; where again entering a steam-boat, we proceeded down the river, which is so beset with shoals, that stakes and the tops of pine-trees were stuck upon them for the guidance of vessels. The country was still flat and devoid of beauty, until we entered the Chesapeake, and the noble bay into which the Susquehanna pours its tributary waters.

When we quitted the Chesapeake, and entered the Potomac at North Point (where the British army landed, under General Ross, in 1814,) it was so broad, that objects on either bank could be but indistinctly seen. After running a few miles up the latter river, we got the first sight of Baltimore, situated in a series of heights at the head of a circular bay, with a range of low blue hills in rear of it, and presenting a more picturesque appearance than Philadelphia, being interspersed with many domes, towers, and lofty monuments. Numerous pretty country residences, too, on the rising ground in the vicinity, add much to the beauty of the city. In front of it, and about three miles distant, is Fort M'Henry, on a promontory formed by the junction of another branch of the Patuxet. It was bombarded, during the late war, by the British fleet, who received a check there to their farther advance upon Baltimore, by the ship channel being choked up with sunken vessels. As the steamer passed, a small detachment of troops were at drill within the works, which are not in very good repair; but their use is to be superseded by an almost impregnable fortress (according to the description given me), which is erecting upon the Rip Rap shoals, at the mouth of the Chesapeake, and at Fort Munro, on the mainland opposite, upon the construction of which immense sums of money have been expended. We arrived off the pier-head at three o'clock, having been nine hours on the journey from Philadelphia, ninety-five miles distant; and showing a porter, at his request, "the location" of my carpet bag, I walked up to the City Hotel, considered the largest in the United States; which, though containing nearly two hundred apartments, had not one single-bedded room vacant until the following day. Having bargained that I should be transferred to one on the morrow, and that my fellow occupant for the night should be a peaceable man, I walked out to view the lions of the city; the very first being in the centre of a small square in front of the hotel; namely, a white marble monument, sixty feet in height, erected to the memory of those who fell in the defence of the city at the battle of North Point, and bombardment of Fort M'Henry. A double scroll entwines the fluted column, with the names of those who fell inscribed upon it; and in small square compartments at the base or relieves representing the death of General Ross, and the bombardment by the British fleet. Several strange nondescript animals—a kind of half-lion half-eagle, occupy the angles of the pedestal; and on the summit of the monument a female figure, with a wreath elevated in her right hand, represents (as I imagined) Fame crowning the deeds of the slain. The Americans point to the monument as erected in celebration of a victory over the English, to whom they will never allow a particle either of honour or glory; but their representatives, who fell back upon Baltimore so hastily from the battle of North Point, could tell them a far different story. There is another fine monument erected upon the rising ground, a little to the north of the city, to the memory of Washington, the only one for that purpose, I believe, in the northern states. The bas-reliefs and other decorations are not yet finished, for want of the necessary funds. The original intention was, that the summit should be raised 300 hundred feet from the ground, but it only attained the height of 178, including the colossal statue of Washington, 16½ feet high. The whole exterior is of white marble, and has already cost 200,000 dollars. Though the day was yet excessively hot, I determined to ascend the column; and being furnished with a lantern at a small house at the base, there being no loop-holes to admit light, I toiled with aching limbs up the tedious 228 steps, and for some time admired the extensive and fine view of the Chesapeake, and surrounding country.

Being Sinclair's benefit night, I attended the theatre to witness the performance of "Englishmen in India." There was but a thin audience, and they protracted the play in a most wearisome manner, by the frequent encores they demanded of every song. The news of the rejection of the English reform bill had been received two or three days in the city; and also a rumour that there was to be a creation of new peers in order to carry the measure. Advantage was taken of this circumstance by some wag in the play, bearing the unromantic name of Mr. Tape, who received a long and boisterous round of applause for his ready wit: "You must personate a count," said Lady Scraggs; "Oh, aye," said the knight of the thimble; "one of the new batch of peers for the reform bill, I suppose, as Shakespeare says,

'It wants a thorough reform.'

Upon my return to the inn, I entered my apartment most cautiously, lest I should arouse the man of peace from his slumbers; but it was an unnecessary precaution; for, although he had been in bed three hours, he had not closed his eyes. I told him it was a great waste of time, and that he had better have attended the theatre, where he might have heard some excellent singing, upon which he informed me that he was a missionary from St. Kitt's, in the West Indies, and was now upon his travels through the United States for the benefit of his health. He had landed only the preceding week at New York, and gave me a most deplorable account of rough roads, and half dislocated bones, which he had already met with in his journey. As I had every prospect of undergoing the same, I sympathised with him most sincerely; and we passed the time away until near dawn of day, expatiating upon the pleasure of speedy but easy travelling, and comparing the respective merits of the East and West Indies.

The following day I visited the Catholic cathedral, a very gloomy, prison-like piece of architecture, and about which I had the bad taste to see nothing worthy of admiration, excepting the altar, a present from France. The exterior of the building bore such marks of antiquity, and of antique taste, that I imagined it must have been almost coeval with the first settlers; but, upon enquiry, was much surprised to find that it had only been erected eighteen years. The lowness of the dome, in proportion to the rest of the cathedral, and the great want of spacious windows, give it a very heavy appearance. Its extreme length is 190 feet, by 177 in breadth, while the height of the summit of the cross is only 127 feet. There are several paintings in the interior, presented by Cardinal Fesch to the late Archbishop Mar. Guerin, and one, the Descent from the Cross by Paulin Guerin, presented by Louis XVIII., possessing considerably more merit than another presented by Charles X. of France, representing some scene in the time of the Crusades, from the brush of an unknown artist.

A Unitarian church, in something the same style of architecture, is within 200 yards of the cathedral.

The Museum, established by a brother of Peale of Philadelphia, contains but a paltry collection of paintings, with only a moderate one of natural curiosities, which are not arranged with half that taste which distinguishes the one in that city.

While walking through the Arcade, a fine building of two stories, both of which are well occupied by shops, some men were employed in pulling down and cleaning the stove-pipes. One of them went out with a large portion of the flue over his shoulder; following him to the entrance into the street, I stood there looking at a lofty shot tower opposite, and had scarcely determined which road I should next take, when another man as black as Erebus, or the cyclops of old, came up with a fathom of the stove-pipe over his shoulder; and after gazing about for a moment or two, as if at a loss for something, addressed me (in making the necessary turn of his body to get a full view of me, a cloud of soot shot from his burthen, nearly upsetting both me and my gravity,) with, "Which way did that gentleman go, sir?" I bowed most politely, and, giving him the required information, we parted with a mutual "good morning, sir."

The Merchants' Hall built by private subscription, has been a great failure with regard to the value of the stock. It is a noble building and of grand dimensions; the front being 255 feet by a depth of 140, having four stories, including the ground-floor. The great hall, where the merchants daily assemble, is 86 by 53 feet, and lighted from the dome, whose summit is 90 feet from the floor. The sides of the hall are supported by columns of marble; each being a single block. An excellent news-room, custom-house, and other public offices, adjoin. It was only built ten years since, at an expense of 200,000 dollars; but the original subscribers have sunk most of their money, from that part of the building which was constructed for letting out to shopkeepers and lawyers being unoccupied.

The city contains upwards of 70,000 inhabitants, and possesses considerable trade, particularly in flour and cotton; every stream in the vicinity being studded with mills. It is not quite so regularly built, being upon very abrupt ground, as Philadelphia; but contains many excellent streets, and fine market houses. Ample proofs, too, are given of its prosperity on the shores of the harbour, which resound with the clang of workmen's hammers employed in the construction of numerous ships and steam vessels. But I saw nothing more remarkable than the extreme beauty of the females: the appearance of the gentlemen did not strike me as any thing very extraordinary, rather the contrary; for, if I were to give my candid opinion, I should say they were like the merchants' exchange stock—rather below par; but it is possible they might suffer some little from contrast to their fair towns-women. I do not remember, in any part of the globe, seeing amongst the females so much loveliness and beauty, as in Baltimore. It is true, they are rather more dressy than in other towns in the states; but they have good figures to set off; and I should strongly recommend some of the young men from other parts of the Union to attempt transplanting a few of them; for in my after-travels I visited many places which, I am sure, stood much in need of them. I think, however, the American women generally, when young, though not possessing the English freshness of colour, are exceedingly handsome; but ("the fairest still the fleetest," as the song is,) age, or rather the marks of old age, creep upon them sooner than on the natives of more temperate climes.

I left Baltimore in the forenoon of the 15th of June, and travelled, for the first time, in an American coach, which I found to be a very clumsy piece of mechanism, and little calculated for the ease or comfort of passengers. This is, in a great measure, a necessary consequence of the bad state of the roads, which are as yet quite unformed, and more uneven than the bye-lanes in England. The coachman (or "driver," for he would feel quite offended if you hurt his dignity so much as to address him by any other title, in the United States,) very unlike one of the English fraternity of the whip, was dressed in a pair of light-coloured trousers, with shoes and stockings, without coat or waistcoat, but (being a melting summer's day) in his shirt sleeves, and a white straw hat turned up behind, as I have before described. He drove most furiously over every thing, rough and smooth alike. Railways, ravines, and water-courses, which cut up the road in countless numbers, were no impediments; he dashed on at a surprising rate, over rough stones and tottering bridges that would have cracked every spring in an English carriage, and caused its coachman to deliberate some time before he even ventured over them at a foot pace. An American driver allows his horses to take their own time in ascending a hill, so that they only move some little; but, be it ever so steep, not a passenger, for a moment, dreams of relieving them of his weight, by walking. To make up for this loss of time, he descends the hills (to use his own expression,) "with all steam on," which usually terminates in a full gallop at the bottom, and not unfrequently in an upset. He takes the sight of every carriage he meets, contrary to the old English stanza of,

"The rule of the road is a paradox quite,

As the carriages jog it along:

If you go to the left, you are sure to go right,

But, if you go to the right, you go wrong."

There is one recommendation, however, to the "drivers," that they expect no fees from their passengers. Having some consideration for the lives and limbs of travellers, they have no seats upon the roof of their coaches, but the body is so capacious as to afford ample room for three seats, or nine people; the centre seat moving on a hinge in the middle, so as to be pushed back when the door is opened. The body is slung upon two immensely thick leathern springs, running under it from the fore to the after axle-trees; but they give the coach so much play, that, in crossing a water-course, or any slight hollow, it pitches down so heavily, that the driver's footboard strikes the wheel-horses on the back; on which occasions a corresponding movement is made by the passengers within. There were but two besides himself, and they had taken possession of their places before I entered; so I had only the choice of either riding with my back to the horses, or to them; and, wishing to take advantage of their society, I preferred the former. But, although accustomed to the rolling of a ship, I found it utterly impossible to retain possession of my seat; every pitch of the coach sent me with force on the centre one, and sometimes nearly over it into my fellow-travellers' laps, being checked in my course only by the broad leathern belt which crosses the centre of the vehicle for the passengers in that part to lean their backs against. Nor was it until after much manœuvring that I managed to secure myself. After I had travelled a few hundred miles, I became more accustomed to the motion, and discovered that the heavier a coach was laden the easier it went, and that to be wedged in between two fat old ladies, or gentlemen, was a great desideratum in a long and rough journey.

The road passed through a dull, uncultivated country, with not even a straggling village for upwards of twenty miles; and the few houses we passed were mostly miserable-looking log huts, inhabited by negroes, whose chief occupation appeared to consist in threading with a plough between the stumps of trees, to turn up the soil amongst the rows of Indian corn. The coach turned off the road about fifteen miles from Baltimore, and wound its way through the mazes of the forest. Looking out to ascertain the cause of such a detour, I saw the branch of a tree laid across the road, and, a few yards farther, a broken-down wooden bridge, with a solitary black at work repairing it. At the village of Rosburgh the scenery became more varied, hill and dale intervened, and several fine farms began to show themselves. On the left of the road, near Bladensburg, was an English-looking mansion, with lodges at the entrance gate, the grounds laid out with good taste, and every thing, even to the very rail fences of the fields, betokening an opulent and good practical farmer. I was informed it was the property of Mr. Calvert, a descendant of the Lord Baltimore, who received a grant from Charles I. in 1632, of a tract of country on the bay of the Chesapeake, which he named Maryland, in honour of Henrietta Maria, and of which state Baltimore is now the capital. His brother, Leonard Calvert, the following year, being appointed governor of the province, left England with about 200 planters, and settled on the northern bank of the Potomac. This farm comprises nearly 2000 acres, and is in a higher state of cultivation than any I saw. Descending the hill, we entered the small village of Bladensburg, which does not contain more than two brick and but few wooden houses. Here was fought the action which, in 1814, decided the fate of the capital of the United States. The road from Nottingham, by which the British army under General Ross advanced, joins the Baltimore road at the village: by some strange error, the American commander neglected to destroy the bridge, or even to dispute vigorously the passage of the British troops across it; but, after some slight skirmishing, and the discharge of two field-pieces, he awaited their formation and attack upon the rising ground and farm-house on the opposite side of the river. Hence his forces fled with the greatest precipitation; the sailors alone, under Commodore Barney, attempting, by a spirited resistance, to retrieve the errors of the day. This action is a subject of jest amongst the Americans themselves, who facetiously call it the Bladensburg races.

A violent thunder-storm burst upon us soon after leaving Bladensburg, from which we were ill defended by the painted canvass curtains of our vehicle. Wet and weary, we arrived, at eight o'clock in the evening, at the door of Gadsby's hotel, in Washington.

CHAPTER VI.

WASHINGTON.

On the following day (Sunday) I felt so sore and shaken with my rough journey, and the thermometer stood so high (upwards of ninety in the shade), that I kept within doors until evening, when I strolled down the broad Pennsylvania Avenue for an hour before sunset; but immediately after breakfast, the next morning, I set off to feast my eyes and ears upon the grand object of my expedition from Philadelphia: to wit, the Capitol and Congress in full convention. I had rather hurried my journey lest the house should adjourn; and considered myself fortunate in finding, upon my arrival, that the tariff and bank bills were before it, and in all human probability would fully occupy it for the next six weeks.

A few hundred paces from the hotel, up the Pennsylvania Avenue, I crossed a small muddy creek, classically denominated the Tiber, and soon after gained the large iron gates at the entrance of the area within which the Capitol is situated. It is upon a lofty eminence, overlooking the plain upon which the city is built; and several broad flights of steps lead to the principal entrance. The first stone was laid by Washington, during his administration, in September, 1793; but it was not finished to its present state until some time after the conclusion of hostilities in 1815, previously to which the wings only were built of substantial materials, the intermediate space between them, now occupied by the rotunda, being formed of wood. It was consumed in the conflagration of the public buildings which ensued on the entrance of the British into the city, on the evening of the 24th of August, 1814. It is situated nearly in the centre of the area which contains twenty-two and a half acres of ground, and is surrounded by a low wall and strong iron balustrade, a small shrubbery of low trees being planted within the railing. The western front, towards the city, is tastefully laid out in grass terraces and gravel walks; while on the eastern a garden has been fenced off within an iron railing, to which however every one has free access. The eastern front of the building stands upon higher ground than the western; and, to remedy this defect in appearance, an earthen terrace was formed at some distance (probably twenty feet) from the basement story on the latter side, which, in addition to answering the primary object, affords, by being underbuilt, excellent cellars for fuel. The entrance, then, is from this terrace into the rotunda, which is on the second story, and paved with stone, receiving light from the dome, ninety-six feet above the floor. Its diameter is also the same; and the echo of footsteps along the pavement, or the voices of people conversing, almost equals that in the whispering-gallery of St. Pauls. The western side of it is ornamented with four large oil paintings, by Colonel Trumbull, an officer of the American army and aide-de-camp to Washington during the revolutionary war. Retiring from the service in disgust at the irregular promotion of some officers over his head, he cultivated his natural talent for drawing, by studying under his countryman, West, and others of the most eminent artists in Europe. The paintings are placed in niches about ten inches deep in the wall, and are from twenty to twenty-one feet in length, and about thirteen in height. They are all historical subjects, taken from the most important events of the era connected with the Revolution; representing the Declaration of Independence in the State House, Philadelphia, 4th July, 1776; Surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga, 17th October, 1777; that of Cornwallis, at Yorktown, 19th October, 1781; and Washington's Resignation of his Commission into the hands of Congress at Annapolis, 23d December, 1783. All have considerable merit, and their value is enhanced by most of the figures represented on the canvass being from portraits taken for the express purpose by Colonel Trumbull.

There are two entrances into the Rotunda from the area without, and two others from the Senate House in the northern wing, and from the House of Representatives in the southern wing. Over each of them is a large historical piece of sculpture; two are from the chisel of Enrico Causici, of Verona, who studied under Canova; the one representing a combat between Daniel Boone an early settler in the west, and an Indian, in 1773; the other represents the landing of the Puritan settlers at Plymouth in 1620. A third, by A. Capellano, also a pupil of Canova, is the narrow escape of Captain Smith from death (when captured by the Indians in 1606), through the intercession of Pocahontas, the king's daughter, who, in 1609, prevented the entire destruction of the colony at Jamestown, by informing the settlers of her father's design of cutting them off. She was subsequently married to Mr. Rolfe, an English gentleman, with whom she visited his native country. The fourth piece of sculpture is by R. Gevelot, representing the treaty between Penn and the Indians in 1682. On each side of those over the grand entrances are the sculptured heads of Raleigh, Columbus, Cabot and La Salle. The house of representatives, connected with the rotunda by a passage, is of a semicircular form; its greatest length being ninety-five feet, with a painted roof and dome sixty feet in height, supported by about twenty-four columns of highly-polished Potomac marble, or pudding-stone, with capitals of white Italian marble, which, I thought, made a contrast very unpleasant to the eye, reminding one (as a gentleman near me remarked) of a negro with a white turban upon his head. A very large and handsome chandelier is suspended from the centre of the dome, in which there is also a skylight, and small lamps are attached to each column; so that the house is most brilliantly illuminated at night, when the debates continue beyond daylight, which is seldom the case. The speaker's chair is in the centre of the base of the semicircle, and elevated under a canopy of drapery nine steps above the floor of the house; with clerks' desks immediately under, and the newspaper reporters in a low gallery on each side, and in rear of the speaker. The members sit fronting the speaker in amphitheatrical rows, and each is furnished with a chair, desk, writing materials, and last, though not least, a brass spittoon. In rear of them, and between the marble columns, are those persons who, though not members, are yet entitled to a seat upon the floor of the house. The strangers' gallery, of marble, with three rows of cushioned seats and a carpeted floor, is raised about twelve or fourteen feet above the body of the house, and occupies the space between the columns and the wall, the full extent of the semicircle. Over the speaker's chair is a large statue of Liberty, and another (what it was intended to represent I was at a loss to discover for several days) is opposite to it over the entrance door. A full length portrait of Lafayette, with the American standard and a copy of the Declaration of Independence, decorates one side of the house; and it is intended to place one of Washington on that opposite. About one hundred and fifty members were present when I entered, and the coup d'oeil was remarkably imposing and magnificent. I had not formed the slightest conception that I should have witnessed any thing so grand, and it struck me as exceeding in splendour any thing I had ever seen. The subject before the house was either trifling or very uninteresting, to judge from the whispering and talking of some members, and the incessant rustling of letters, books, and newspapers, kept up by others. It was in vain that I strained my powers of hearing to the uttermost; I could not arrive at the pith of a single speech. The building is evidently ill calculated for sound, a speaker's voice being entirely lost in the vast expanse of dome. An attempt was made to rectify this fault, by hanging drapery between the marble columns, but it has been of very little avail in confining the sound; and the only project which is likely to answer would be by having an artificial roof, or a glass dome, which would not detract and from the appearance, suspended a few feet above the level of the strangers' gallery.

I was sitting in the gallery one day, during a discussion as to whether the house should make regret for defraying the expense of printing the debates, not thinking it particularly interesting, opened my sketch-book, and commenced a sketch of the scene before me. I had not been long thus occupied, when a man, placing himself beside me, said, "Can you take it down as fast as they speak?" "Much faster," said I; "I write short-hand exceedingly well." I thought him blessed with a very dull genius, or that my sketch must be a very wretched one; but, nothing daunted by his remark, proceeded with my pencil as far as sketching in the figure which had puzzled me so exceedingly before, from my not being able to gain a front view of it to see what it represented; when by one of those singular pieces of good luck which sometimes occur to travellers the mystery was at once unravelled. Mr. Adams (the late president, who had resumed his seat in the House of Representatives) rising to address the speaker, I took down his speech almost verbatim; and as he had a clear voice, and the house was called thrice to order, I ascertained that it was to the following effect:—"I wished that the resolution now before the house might pass; for he considered it the only parliamentary; rather, he should say, congressional history of the Union; for, in time of profound peace, the record of the proceedings of the two houses of congress is almost in fact the history of the nation. In Great Britain, a recent publication of the parliamentary proceedings formed a work occupying nearly 2000 volumes, each as large as those of the work in question; in Great Britain whose people sometimes were accused of not feeling the same powerful interest in the concerns of their government which the Americans did, so much interest was excited by this publication, that it sustained itself. Surely, if there was any thing in which the example of England should have weight with them, and if there was any thing in the British house of parliament worthy of imitation, it was the spirit with which they appropriated money for the purpose of printing the debates. He sincerely hoped gentlemen would have some regard for their posterity, and furnish the means which should enable them to learn what their forefathers had said and done. He wished to ask the speaker what was the meaning of that beautiful marble statue over the clock at the entrance of the house.—If it was the muse of history in her car, looking down upon the members of the house, and reminding them that, as the hour passed, she was in the attitude of recording whatever they said and did upon the floor—an admonition well worthy of being remembered. The reporters, at the sides and in rear of the speaker's chair, were the scribes of that Muse of History; and the publication now in question before the house was the real, he might even say the living, record of that historic muse; and he concluded by trusting that the same spirit which incited them to make the grant for erecting that statue, would now urge them to pass the one before the house."

I afterwards heard that the statue was designed by an Italian sculptor, who died since in Washington: the Muse of History is represented with a book and pencil in the attitude of writing, and standing in a winged car (the clock forming a wheel) which passes over the surface of the globe.

The Senate House is of the same shape as that of the representatives, but smaller; being only 74 feet in length by 42 in height. Upon entering the light strangers' gallery, which, supported by iron pillars, runs round the circular part of it, the following notice posted on the door met my eye and excited a smile:—

"Gentlemen will be pleased not to place their feet on the board in front of the gallery, as the dirt from them falls upon senators' heads."

The air and demeanour of the senators struck me as rather more aristocratical than that of the members of the other house. During the time the houses are actually sitting, a flag flies upon the summit of the dome over each wing; and, if either adjourns, that flag only is struck.

Adjoining the rotunda on the western front of the Capitol is the Congress Library—a room of about 90 by 35 feet, and calculated to contain upwards of 20,000 volumes. At present it has about 13,000, which have been collected since 1814, when the small library of 3000 was destroyed.

There are two busts of eminent Americans by Persica, and an old portrait of Columbus in it. From the outer balcony there is a fine prospect of the broad Potomac, and the rising ground with Arlington House (the property of Mr. Custis, related to the Washington family) on the opposite bank; the mall, the navy yard, and the towns of Alexandria and Georgetown in the distance. The basement story is occupied by various courts, offices, and bar-rooms. The total cost of the building was 2,536,500 dollars, and it covers one acre and a half of ground, and 1820 square feet; the length of the front being 350, the depth of the wings 121, and the height to the top of the centre dome 120 feet. The exterior, although of white freestone, is painted white; which tasteless proceeding is explained by the following extract from the Travellers' Guide: "Captain Hall, in his Travels, speaking of the Capitol, says, 'By some strange perversity of taste, however, for which I never could learn to whom the public were indebted, this fine building has been covered with a coating of paint.' He should have been told that the painting was to hide the smoke occasioned by the conflagration which succeeded the capture of the city by the British troops in 1814." The editor should have added that British troops would never have been guilty of such excesses, and that this act of severity on their part would not have happened, if the American army which invaded Canada under General Harrison, in 1812, had not wantonly destroyed by fire the Moravian village on the 20th of October; and if General McClure had not, at the end of the following year, burnt the whole town of Newark, sparing no private property, under the pretext of securing the American frontier. The British, on the contrary, respected private property, and destroyed only public buildings, in retaliation for this gross breach of the laws of civilised warfare. Yet the circumstance alone of the British flag of truce having been fired upon as it entered Washington, and the general's horse killed, was sufficient to justify almost any steps, in addition to putting to death every one in the house whence the shot proceeded, as also razing the building to the ground.

At the summit of the steps on the western side is a fine monument erected to the memory of the officers who fell at Tripoli in 1804. There are several allegorical figures round the column, which are described in part of the inscription on the pedestal:—

"The love of glory inspired them—Fame has crowned their deeds—History records the event—The children of Columbia admire—and Commerce laments their fall."

It stood, until very lately, in the navy yard, because (as was said) Congress would not give it so conspicuous a situation at the Capitol as the naval officers expected. I was glad to see that they had shown the good taste, at the time of its removal, to efface the inscription of "Mutilated by the British in 1814," which had occupied a prominent place upon it for so many years. The mutilations, in the first place, were very slight, the head of a figure and a few letters of the inscription being broken off; whereas, had the British troops been bent upon destroying the whole monument, a few blows from the butt end of a musket would have shattered the greater part of it to pieces immediately. The little injury which it sustained arose, no doubt, from the same spirit of mischief which has defaced so many of the statues in Westminster Abbey and the public edifices in England. It must have escaped the notice of the illiberal authors of the inscription that, so long as it remained, it was but a memento that their capital had once been in the possession of foreign troops: whether this, or the knowledge that it was a gross libel upon the British nation, prompted the withdrawal of it, I know not.

During my stay at Washington I frequently attended the debates, and had to pass many a tedious hour in attempting to follow the rhapsodies of some ambitious young lawyer, who had got possession of the floor, and made a speech of almost interminable length, wearing out the patience of every member in the house. He would probably afterwards send it to the press, and distribute it in pamphlets for the edification of his constituents. On my expressing surprise that such a proser was not forthwith coughed down, some one near me said, "Every one is at liberty here to speak as much as he pleases." Since the meeting of the first provincial congress, up to the present period, no session had been so stormy as this one; nor had such acts of personal violence, arising from debates, been committed upon the members, one of whom had been caned in the public streets, and another shot at with a pistol as he was descending the capital steps. A good hearty cough, the cry of "order," or shuffling with the feet upon the floor of the house, would have put down the unruly speaker and prevented both occurrences. The public funeral of Mr. Johnson, a member from Virginia, who was unfortunately drowned in the Potomac by slipping off the pier, at Alexandria, in a dark and stormy night, took place a few days after my arrival, in the burial ground near the capitol; the president and members of both houses attending, and wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

When the city was first planned, it was supposed that it would have been built upon the rising ground, which is a continuation of the capitol hill, as being a healthier and finer situation than the swampy flat between it and the Potomac. Mr. Law, an English gentleman, speculating upon such a result, erected a square of houses to the south of the capitol, and some few were rented in the first instance; but the tide of population turned in a different direction, and settling in the low ground along the Pennsylvania avenue, between the president's house and the capitol, Mr. Law's houses were soon abandoned, and became a heap of ruins. He first settled in the States thirty years since, and married a niece of Washington; he was quite an enthusiast, and lost a large fortune in promoting the growth of the city.

Washington certainly exhibited fewer symptoms of prosperity than any town I visited in the Union. There was none of that bustle which is always attendant upon a thriving place; and the long straight streets, with a few idlers strolling about in them, betokened a place fast falling to decay. At the present rate of increase in buildings, fifteen centuries will scarcely suffice to fill up the original plan, which was on a great and magnificent scale; but the situation, in a mercantile point of view, is decidedly bad; the river is but just navigable for vessels of moderate burthen up to the city, 300 miles distant from the sea; and Baltimore, so close in the vicinity of the city, and of much easier access, engrosses all the trade of the surrounding country. The present population of Washington, including men of colour, is estimated at 20,000, though I should not have judged it at more than two thirds of that number. Nearly all the present buildings are along the Pennsylvania avenue, in which the president's house is situated, and which is the only one in which any trees are planted. One or two days before I left the city, the sergeant at arms absconded with a considerable sum of money he had drawn from various members of the house of representatives, who had been in the habit of allowing him to fill up blank checks with their signatures attached, for their daily allowance of eight dollars; and, in most instances, he had overdrawn the sum due. No money being found in his possession when arrested at Bladensburg, the members determined not to be losers by him, and passed a resolution that the amount he had failed to pay over to them should be made good out of the contingent fund of the house.

Upon the whole, Washington has a desolate appearance, which is increased by the land marked out for its site being entirely destitute of trees, and only here and there (excepting where the present town is situated) are scattered houses, each standing isolated, as if requiring some support on either side. The inhabitants, and Americans generally, fondly flatter themselves that it will some day vie in splendour with ancient Rome. The only comparison it bears at present is with the modern city, in the ruins of the Potomac bridge, and Mr. Law's houses. The scene altogether is described most forcibly by a French lady, who likened it to a town gone out on a visit into the country.

CHAPTER VII.

ALEXANDRIA, MOUNT VERNON, GEORGETOWN, &c.

Early on the morning of the 21st of June, I took the steam-boat, and glided rapidly down the broad "river of Swans" (as the poor Indians term the stream) to Alexandria, in the district of Columbia, seven miles below the city, but on the Virginian side of the Potomac. It contains about 8000 inhabitants, and, like most American towns of moderate size, has a museum, which, however, it is rather difficult for a stranger to find, being placed in the dark upper story of an old brick mansion, where some excellent specimens of natural history are seen to very little advantage. The museums in the states are generally good, but the owners (one and all) possess a strange taste for collecting such a quantity of trash and childish trifles, as pieces of old shells, signal and Congreve rockets, grapeshot, &c., fired from the British squadron, under Captain Gordon, at the White House, a few miles below the town; jackets of volunteers stained with blood, havresacks of sergeants of marines killed in action, &c.—that it is quite a labour to search for what is really worthy of notice. There are several relics of Washington; such as his military canteen, mason's dress, and the red satin robe in which he was christened, preserved with the greatest care; as also two of his original letters, one of which, written a month before his death, was penned in a fine bold hand. The old man in charge of the museum pointed out two colours taken from the British during the revolution; one from the Hessians, at the battle of Trenton, and the other belonging to the 7th Fusiliers, surrendered by Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown. There was a labelled paper on each, the first being "Alpha" the latter "Omega." He said that Washington had presented them thus to the museum, as the fruits of his first and last victory. As the old man was in his own castle, I did not like to question the veracity of his statement; but I think he must have judged from my countenance that I was rather sceptical.

Having hired a horse, I proceeded on my journey to Mount Vernon, the burial-place of Washington. The guide-book told me that "the road to it was uninhabited and difficult to trace;" but setting forth on my pilgrimage, and travelling over a sandy, poor country, I managed tolerably well for the first few miles; until, arriving at the meeting of four roads, I was at a complete non-plus, there being neither sign-post nor living being from whom I might gain further information. Trusting to my horse and good luck, I rode on at a brisk trot for several miles, when, meeting a woman, I discovered that I had taken a wrong road, so struck off at once into the forest; and after losing my temper ten times, and my road twice as often, by an hour after mid-day I arrived at the lodge-gates of Mount Vernon.

I was obliged to adopt this inconvenient method of travelling, as the steam vessels from Alexandria, which pass within 200 yards of the house, are not permitted to land passengers, on the plea that great depredations were committed amongst the trees and gardens. The proprietor certainly does not appear to encourage pilgrims to the tomb; the road through the grounds from the lodge to the house being, if possible, worse than the highway, and running for a considerable distance up a deep ravine, and over the rough stony bed of a winter's torrent.

It was much the fashion, during my stay in America, for the volunteer corps and "Republican Associations of young men," to make a pilgrimage to the tomb in a body; and the middle and southern states, who never allow an opportunity of having a laugh against their Yankee brethren to escape them, say, that the order forbidding steamers to land their passengers arose in consequence of a gentleman cutting so many walking-sticks from the sacred ground that, upon his return to Boston, he made a good round sum of money by retailing them at a dollar each.

The house was originally built by Lawrence Washington, a brother of the general, and received its name out of compliment to Admiral Vernon, in whose expedition he had served. He was succeeded by the general, from whom (having no children) it descended to his nephew Bushrod Washington, the judge, and from him to his nephew John Washington, who died three days prior to my visit; in consequence of which, I did not request admission. I heard that there was nothing interesting within the house, excepting a small fragment of a jug, bearing a likeness of the general, which is considered the most striking ever seen; the most singular part of the story being, that the jug was made in England by a common potter who had never visited America. The house is built of wood, two stories in height, the exterior stuccoed in imitation of stone: a portico, supported by square wooden pillars, extends the full length of the front towards the Potomac, and the roof is surmounted by a light wooden tower. The situation is a very pretty one; but scarcely any thing has been done by art to add to the natural beauty. The grounds are laid out in a tasteless style, and kept in a slovenly manner, high coarse grass growing up to the very door. The Americans possess generally but little taste for ornamental gardening, or at least make no display of it; for I seldom saw a cottage, or even a respectable-looking mansion, with any thing like a flower-garden attached to it.

When the judge possessed the property, it consisted of more than 3000 acres of land; but, the law of primogeniture being abolished, it was divided amongst his nephews; so that there are now but 1200 with the house; and, although the general has been dead only thirty-two years, the estate has passed into the hands of the third generation. The latter proprietor has left two sons and a daughter, so that the estate will be again divided, and must eventually dwindle into nothing. It is much to be regretted that the government do not take some steps either to keep the property entirely in the family, or purchase it for the States in general. Surely if any spot in America deserves protection more than another, it is the tomb of the father of the country. Application was made by congress for permission to remove the body on the centennial celebration of Washington's birth-day (22d of February, 1832), in order to bury it with great pomp in the rotunda of the capitol; but the late proprietor would not accede to it, stating, as his reason, that it had been the dying request of his grand-uncle to be buried at Mount Vernon.

A fine sloping bank descends from the house nearly to the Potomac, when it becomes more abrupt, and is so thickly covered with trees that the river is not visible from the house. On the brow of the abrupt part of the bank is the vault in which the general and other members of the family were originally buried. The coffins were removed a twelvemonth since to another vault two or three hundred yards more inland. Both vaults are of plain brick, and on the original one there was not even any inscription, and but a weak wooden door to close the entrance. It was situated in the midst of a cluster of oak trees, and several red pine and cedar grew on the top of it. The present vault has a small tablet of stone, inscribed "Washington Family;" and underneath, "I am the Resurrection and the Life, saith the Lord; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." That the nation have never erected a monument to the man who was their idol while living, and whose memory is still so revered amongst them, is ever a subject of surprise and reproach among foreigners. The Americans say, in their defence, that the city of Washington, with its public buildings, is alone a sufficient monument; and that the proper testimonial of respect to his name is the affectionate remembrance of the people. It must be remembered, however, that two days after his death congress passed a resolution, unanimously, "that a marble monument be erected by the United States at the city of Washington, that the family of General Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it, and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life;" to which Mrs. Washington consented, saying that, "taught by the great example which I have so long had before me never to oppose my private wishes to the public will, I must consent to the request made by congress." Judge Marshall, in his "Life of Washington," says, that the resolution, although it passed unanimously, had many enemies; that the party which had long constituted the opposition to his administration declared its preference for an equestrian statue, which had been voted by congress at the close of the war, sixteen years previous; that the division between a statue and a monument was so nearly equal, that the session passed away without an appropriation for either; and that those who possessed the ascendancy over the public sentiment employed their influence to draw odium on the men who favoured a monument, and to represent that measure as part of a general system to waste the public money.

When I arrived at the cross roads on my return, I found a gentleman with his servant in the very dilemma in which I had been situated in the morning. He was quietly awaiting the arrival of some one who could give him information, and asked me which was the road to Fredericksburg, about sixty miles distant. I advised him to trust to his horse, as the knights errant of old had done, as I could ill direct him.

The president's house at Washington, containing some finely proportioned rooms, furnished in a republican style of plainness, is situated on a slightly elevated ground, laid out in walks and gardens. The building is of free-stone, painted white, for the same reason as the capitol. Although it would be a large house for a private gentleman, still a more magnificent one might have been erected for the executive of a mighty nation. Many of the country residences of English commoners far excel it in grandeur of appearance. I passed several agreeable hours there in company with General Jackson, the president, Mr. Hayne of South Carolina, who has since so distinguished himself as governor of that state, and some few others of the great politicians of the day. The president is a tall, hardy-looking veteran, apparently sixty-five years of age, with a head of strong bushy hair. His voice is loud, and, when excited, he possesses considerable fluency of speech, rather too much interlarded with strong asseverations. The tariff bill formed the chief topic of conversation; but he was unable to cope with the powerful eloquence of Mr. Hayne, his more youthful antagonist.

At a short distance on either side of the president's house are large buildings occupied by the state and war departments. In the former I was gratified with a sight of the original copy of the famous Declaration of Independence. Some of the signatures, owing to the process of taking off fac-similes, had been so much injured as to be almost illegible. The document is now carefully preserved within a glass case, and no one permitted to touch it. Washington's commission as commander of the American armies, bearing date 19th of June, 1775, as also the various treaties made with foreign powers, are shown with the greatest readiness by the gentlemen who have charge of them. In one of the rooms are the presents which public functionaries, or officers of the navy and army, have received from foreign courts, and which, by law, they are compelled to deliver over to the American government, who retain possession of them for no earthly purpose that I could conceive, except impressing foreigners with the unfavourable idea that the government was suspicious of the integrity of its public servants, and had so mean an opinion of its representatives as to imagine that they could be bribed by a paltry sword or gold snuff-box; for there were no more valuable presents amongst them. The matter would appear in a much better light if the government, following the example of the East India Company, were to compel its servants to return the presents bestowed upon them to those who presented them; and foreigners might then be spared being imbued with what are, probably, erroneous impressions.

Numerous blue and red painted canvass bags, about the size and shape of a pillow, suspended from the ceiling on one side of the office of the secretary of the navy, with "Peacock," "Macedonian," "Boxer," "Frolic," and various other such names upon them, attracting my attention, I had the curiosity to enquire what were the contents of such a singular collection of titled bags, and was informed that they were the colours of British vessels captured during the late war. I shrugged up my shoulders, and thought I had penetrated too far into the sanctum sanctorum of the war department. There is another very interesting collection of strange names and portraits of the Indian chiefs, who to the number of one hundred have been sent at various times as delegates from the tribes in the west. They were painted by Mr. King of Washington; and are, I was informed by a competent judge, faithful likenesses of the red men of the forest, who are so rapidly disappearing before the march of civilisation and encroachment. To a foreigner, they are particularly interesting, as he may travel many hundred miles through the United States without seeing an Indian; or the few he may perchance see, dwelling within the boundaries of civilization, are a degenerate, dissipated race, and held in contempt by such warriors as the "Stabber," "the Sparrow that hunts as he walks," "the Spoon," "Sleepy eye," "the Bear whose screams make the rocks tremble," "Buffalo," and various others, as represented on canvass in the Indian department. The great attention paid to a traveller, and the readiness with which he is shown every thing worthy of notice in these departments, and, in fact, I may say every where else in the States, is truly gratifying; particularly as it arises from a spirit of courtesy, no tax, as is too frequently the case in England, being levied upon the purse.

The arsenal, upon the tongue of the peninsula, is now but a mere depot for ordnance stores, the works having been levelled since the war, when their utility was so fully proved by the British landing from the Patuxent, marching upon and taking Washington from the rear; the American troops being compelled to abandon the works which had been thrown up to dispute the passage of the Potomac alone. It was in disabling the guns on the ramparts that Captain Frazier and many more of the British force were blown up, from a piece of ordnance accidentally falling into a dry well, in which the Americans had placed the contents of their magazine, trusting that it would escape the observation of the invaders. The officer in charge kindly accompanied me through the various store-rooms and armories. They contain models of the French and English field-pieces, with tumbrils, &c., complete—the English being made by request at Woolwich; but the French system had been approved of, and will be adopted in the American service, on account of the uniform size of the ammunition-wagons, and a trifling difference in some other respect. The American field-pieces are of cast iron, the smallest caliber being eight pounds. The few specimens I saw of brass were very faulty, and honeycombed in the casting; the metal also is too expensive, being from 20 to 25 cents per pound. Many of the iron guns were also defective. Thirty-two forty-two-pounders had arrived two days previously from the foundry at Georgetown, and many were very roughly and imperfectly cast: the weight of each was 8624 pounds, and the cost about five cents per pound, which makes the price of a single gun $431,200. They were intended for the fortresses, which were erecting at the mouths of all the harbours, along the extensive line of coast of the United States. As a land war can scarcely ever be expected, the expenditure upon military works is along the sea-board, for which purpose large grants of money are made every session of congress; but, with only the present foundries at work, many years will elapse before a sufficient supply of heavy artillery can be provided for those fortresses already finished. In the armoury there were 40,000 stand of arms; the muskets averaging the great price of 13 dollars each, and the rifles much more. The latter were upon a principle I had never before seen; differing considerably in their construction from the English, which I thought they excelled; the soldier being capable of firing five or six times per minute with them. The use of a ramrod, except for cleaning, is entirely dispensed with, the barrel of the rifle having a patent breech-receiver, about six inches in length, which, by knocking a small trigger under the stock, is opened at its upper end; and the necessary load being placed within the bore, it is immediately closed again by a slight pressure of the hand. In other respects, it is similar to the common English rifle, excepting that the barrel is full as long as that of a musket. The American light troops carry powder and ball flasks suspended across their shoulders in place of a cartridge-box, and the process of going twice through the motions of loading must retard the firing. White were about to give way to black leather bolts, which were to be worn by all descriptions of infantry. The artificers employed in the department were principally citizens engaged for a limited period; and though congress had lately passed a bill for forming an entirely military establishment, great difficulty was experienced in finding men who would enlist, when they could obtain equally high wages by daily labour elsewhere.

The navy-yard, half a mile from the arsenal, is upon the eastern branch of the Potomac, and on a larger scale than that at Philadelphia. It contains various sheds and storerooms, foundry, saw-mill, and two large sheds for ship-building, under one of which a vessel of 48 or 50 guns was in an unfinished state. The channel, as in the Delaware, becomes shallower yearly by the increase of mud; nor is there now sufficient depth of water for the launching of any such vessel as the Columbus, of 74 guns, which was built in this yard a few years since. I saw a schooner at anchor off the pier, constructed upon a principle which has, I believe, been tried, and failed in England; namely, without knees, and entirely of thick planks laid in tiers over one another, each successive tier being placed at a different angle from the preceding one, so as to strengthen each other. This vessel was called the "Experiment," but had failed in realising the expectations of the builders: it carried 12 guns, and had just arrived from Norfolk navy-yard, near the mouth of the Chesapeake; some knees were subsequently added, but the naval officers entirely disapproved of the whole construction.

Georgetown, higher up on the banks of the Potomac, and only divided from Washington by the inconsiderable stream of Rock Creek, was formerly a place of some importance, but of late years has felt the effects of Baltimore on its commerce, which has now dwindled into insignificance. On the margin of the river, scarcely any thing is to be seen but long rows of desolate dwellings and empty warehouses, with their window shutters moaning in the wind, as if over the fallen prosperity of the town. It contains a population of little less than 10,000, and is prettily situated on a series of heights, at a fine bend of the river. Its interior streets are well laid out, and contain some very good private residences. The college, whose members generally profess the catholic religion, is an ancient pile of building, with a large library, and some good paintings. The students were chanting vespers, with rather a sweet-toned organ, as I entered the chancel. Within the distance of half a mile there is a large academy for young ladies, attached to a convent, which however my unhallowed foot was not permitted to profane. The school bears a very high character, upwards of 200 girls attending daily, many of whom are taught gratuitously. There are also nearly 100 boarders, of the most respectable families in the neighbourhood, for whom there is a regular charge.

I proceeded several miles up the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal (which enters the Potomac here by four locks from the rising ground,) on the 23d of June, in one of the packet-boats, which ply daily upon it, and found the travelling most delightful: I was the only passenger, and there was a neat, well-furnished cabin about fifty feet long by fourteen broad.

The proposition of rendering the Potomac navigable, originated from Washington himself, who saw the vast advantages the state would derive from it; and, from continuing a canal to the Ohio, that it would divert the produce of the west, which at present floats so many hundred miles down the Mississippi to New Orleans, into the Atlantic states. When once carried into effect, it will no doubt produce a reaction of trade in favour of Georgetown and Alexandria; by which they will become two of the greatest ports for the exportation of flour in the Union. The course of the canal is through a pretty and romantic country, the banks of the river being bold and well wooded. We arrived at the Great Falls, sixteen miles from Washington, in less than four hours, having passed through twenty locks, the average passage of each being two minutes and a small fraction.

I had heard the distant roaring of the mighty waterfall for some minutes before the boat stopped; and, as soon as it received a temporary check at a lock, I sprang ashore, sketch-book in hand, a young lad, belonging to the packet, crying out, "Shall I show you the way, sir? I always go with gentlemen, sir;" at the same time running to accompany me. "Get away with you," said I, half angry at the intrusion, and alarmed at the very idea of my first view of a cataract being destroyed by a young archin interrupting my reveries and feelings of ecstatic delight, with such sentences as, "There's more water comes over in a fresher, sir!"—"The Virginia side is the best one to see it from, sir." The little fellow was, however, believe, half frightened, for he shrunk back at my blunt refusal of his company, and I saw no more of him at that time. Throwing myself down the steep embankment of the canal, I floundered on through pools of water, tumbled over lumps of rock, regardless of rattle-snakes and other reptiles, scratched my hands and face, and tore my coat amongst the bushes, and, hurrying under an alpine bridge thrown across a ravine from one projecting rock to another, without scarcely deigning a passing glance at it, or any thing else, I rounded a point, and came in full view of the great and grand object which alone occupied my thoughts. From the feelings I experienced at that moment, I could imagine the sensations of awe and delight with which the weary pilgrims first gain sight of the fifty minarets and domes of the prophet's tomb at the holy city of Arabia. In a moment the troubles of the past and care for the future are alike forgotten; the perils and privations undergone in their long and arduous marches over the burning deserts are at last fully compensated. But once in my previous life do I remember experiencing such pleasurable emotions—when, after an absence of some years in a foreign land, the dim blue line of my native country appeared rising from the main. I raised my hands, and uttering some exclamation, stood gazing in silent and indescribable astonishment for some minutes. I found that subsequently I viewed Niagara with less inward feelings of awe and delight. The rush of water was greater, and every thing was upon a more sublimely magnificent scale; but the Potomac had partly prepared me, and I had already formed some indistinct idea in my imagination of what I should see: but of this I had not the slightest conception.

I am but ill at describing scenery, and may, therefore, be excused for merely taking notice in simple terms, of what the Americans would designate as the "location of the falls." The river gradually contracts to a width of 700 or 800 feet for some distance above the rocky bed of the rapids, over which it foams and roars most terrifically; until, gaining the edge of the precipice, it shoots over in a white sheet into the troubled abyss beneath; and rushing furiously along between two narrow perpendicular walls of rock for the distance of a mile, again expands into a broad but rapid channel. The country in the immediate vicinity bears the appearance of having been once convulsed by volcanic eruption; as if the huge rocks had been thrown upon one another by gigantic efforts of nature; every thing seems to have been subjected to some almighty agency. It was now the middle of summer, at which time, I believe, the falls are seen to the best advantage, the water being purer and the rocks in the river not entirely concealed from the view. During the autumnal floods, or the melting of the winter's snow, when the waters rush in one vast sheet of foam over the whole breadth of the chasm, they may present a more terrifically grand and fearful aspect, and be more calculated to inspire awe; but certainly not so beautifully picturesque as during the summer's sunshine, when nature appears in her mildest and serenest form, and the prismatic hues of the rainbow are seen glistening in the white mist which rises from the pure and limpid stream, as it glides over the rocky shelves. After passing two hours in admiration, I returned to the packet, and, as the sun set, arrived at my quarters in the Pennsylvania Avenue.

CHAPTER VIII.

EXCURSION INTO THE INTERIOR OF VIRGINIA, AND BACK TO NEW YORK.

On the 26th of June I again crossed the Potomac to Alexandria, and travelling in the mail over a heavy, sandy, and hilly country, until near sunset, entered the pretty little village of Aldie, situated amongst the hills. We were now in Loudoun county, and at the same time observed an improvement in the soil: the crops were heavier, and the ragged worm fences gave way to substantial stone; but as yet I saw nothing like good farming, or any buildings equal to those in England. In addition to the little disappointments I experienced from this appearance of the country, I had the misfortune to be troubled with a garrulous, fat old German, who had been in the States above half a century, and bored me with long prosing histories of the battle of Brandywine and Yorktown, interspersed with anecdotes of his commander, Lafayette. He was now seventy-eight years of age, and boasted much of his bodily strength: to prove that of his lungs, he produced a bangle-horn from his leather case, and blew a blast both loud and strong, which I was so inconsiderate as to approve of. The old gentleman's vanity being flattered, he insisted upon treating me at the first tavern, where the coach stopped to change horses, with a draught of molasses beer; and when we had resumed our seats, favoured me at intervals with a repetition of the music. All my hints respecting soreness of lips, injury to lungs, headaches, &c., were not only entirely thrown away, but made the matter so much worse, that I was fain to put up with the annoyance until our arrival at the small town of Middleburgh, when I was happily relieved from him. It was late in the evening before we reached our journey's end; so, soon after supper, requesting to be shown to my room, I was, to my infinite surprise, ushered into one containing four beds, three of which were already occupied. Being heartily fatigued, what from the abominable road, and the old man with his bangle-horn—and as the coach was to start again at four o'clock in the morning—I was the less inclined to be very particular; so, as a sailor would say, "turned in," though not without shrewd suspicions that I should not be the sole occupant, having, as I was reconnoitring, caught a glimpse of an enemy retiring under cover of the pillow. Never was poor mortal so tormented! I was fairly driven from my post, and walked down stairs before three o'clock, to await the arrival of the coach, muttering a requiescat in pace as I passed the restless bodies of my companions in misery. The dirty ian at Middleburgh will certainly not soon be crased from my memory.

From Woodville, a few miles farther, where there was the only vineyard I ever saw in the country, to the Blue Ridge, the scenery was delightful. We met many Dutch farmers with their heavily-laden flour wagons, and saw groups of others cooking their victuals under the trees by the road side, all appearing the happiest and most contented beings imaginable. Leaving their farms upon the banks of the Shenandoah, which waters part of the valley of Virginia, they proceed with their load of flour for the Alexandrian market, and, carrying their hatchets and provisions, pass the night in their wagons. Thus avoiding all expenses, excepting the half dollar for tolls, they dispose of their load, and with clear profits forthwith return home. Having breakfasted at the inconsiderable village of Paris, we commenced the ascent of the Blue Ridge, which is easy, and not exceeding a mile. I had accustomed myself some little to the jolting of the vehicle, and had, therefore, taken my seat outside with the coachman, that I might enjoy the prospect to greater advantage. While praising the appearance of the cultivated and highly fertile vale lying between the Ridge and the North mountains to him, he remarked that, "for his part, he preferred the hills, and should like to live upon them for some time; for he was fond of hunting, and intended quitting his present work, so that he might get some hounds, with a good horse, and have some sport; there was also plenty of gunning on the mountains' side."

This low chain of hills, which in England would be considered diminutive, has acquired its name of the Blue Ridge, from presenting a deeper shade of that colour than hills do in general; but, when travelling across them in summer, one would be led to imagine it arose from the vast quantity of blue thistle which flourishes upon them in a most extraordinary manner; patches of many acres in extent were so densely covered with the light blue flower, that the verdure was quite imperceptible. But when I pointed it out to the sporting coachman as a strong symptom of slovenly farming, he endeavoured to convince me that a new era in husbandry had commenced; it having been most satisfactorily ascertained that the thistle, so far from impoverishing, as was generally supposed, improved the soil.

A few miles after our descent, we arrived at the ferries across the Shenandoah; but the water being low, forded the stream, where it was about three feet deep, and a hundred yards wide, into Frederic county. The villages scattered along the banks are far from healthy, owing to the heavy rains swelling the river, and leaving vegetable matter to decompose upon the ground when the water recedes to its summer channel: the inhabitants at this time were suffering much from the scarlet and bilious fevers; the former had carried off thirteen slaves from one gentleman's estate in the course of a few weeks. This, which is however considered the richest tract of land in the vale, is in the hands of great landed proprietors: the extent of the fields varies generally from twenty to thirty acres, and produces fine crops of every description of grain; the term "corn" is applied to Indian corn only. Until aware of this distinction, I had been guilty of some slight mistakes in stating, to farmers' enquiries, that corn grew in England, and was commonly in use. Ten miles farther brought us to the town of Winchester, containing about 2500 inhabitants, and distant seventy-five miles from Washington. Its dirty streets, with stepping-stones for foot-passengers at the crossings, presented no inducement to remain a night; but the coach proceeding no farther upon my route, I was compelled to wait till late the following day, when I again started, and at the small town of Smithfield, where the coach stopped to change horses, met two gentlemen who had just been overturned in their carriage; and, after rolling down a precipice, had most miraculously escaped with their lives. They complained bitterly of the exorbitant demand of five dollars made by the wagoner for carrying the remains of their carriage fifteen miles. Truly, it was no wonder that it was shattered to pieces; for the mail, in which I travelled, could not exceed a foot's pace over the limestone ridges, projecting two feet above the level of the road; and some of the hills were so steep, that it was a matter of great thankfulness we safely gained the summit of them, or that the heavy vehicle in the descent did not crush down the horses. I should much have enjoyed the society of a gentleman with whom I travelled on the Chesapeake and Delaware Railway, who said, that "he did not at all approve of so easy a mode of conveyance—for he required exercise." He would certainly have met it here to his heart's content. After eight hours' hard jolting, we gained the hills above Harper's Ferry, thirty miles from Winchester: the road had for some time continued on their summit; and as we reached the brow, previous to descending, the last gleam of day was just gilding the woody tops of the opposite mountains. The town, as it lay far beneath, could be but indistinctly seen in the shade cast over it by the towering masses of rock with which it was encircled; but which rendered more vivid the bright flashes of a rapid succession of tremendous quarry blasts, as the echo was reverberated amongst the hills and rocks, like the great artillery of heaven. The white lines of the two impetuous streams, the Potomac and Shenandoah, rushing together from nearly opposite directions, like mighty giants struggling for mastery, unite into one channel in front of the town, and thus force their passage through an opening in the hills. A band of music was playing upon Camp Hill at the entrance of the town, where the tents of an itinerant circus were pitched; and the bells beneath us giving notice to the workmen that the labours of the day had ceased altogether, rendered the scene impressively striking.

Having been furnished at Washington with introductory letters to G. Rust, Esq., in charge of the government establishment for the manufacture of arms, he kindly accompanied me through the numerous shops and forges, which give employment to more than 300 men, though the greater part of the work is performed by machinery. The different processes of turning the gun-stock from the rough wood, were performed in less than five minutes, and those of fitting the lock and barrel upon it occupied but two more. The test for the bayonet appeared unnecessarily severe, and so many failing in it, the price of the musket is rendered much greater, than if one, which might be sufficiently satisfactory, was substituted; it consisted in fixing the bayonet on the muzzle, with a twelve pound brass ball attached to the breech of a gun barrel, then placing the bayonet horizontally in two holes just fitting it, and nearly its length apart, where it was left for about two minutes, the entire weight acting upon the bayonet, which, if unbent by this trial, was turned round and put to the same test upon the other sides. The barrels were well finished, and made of iron from the state of Connecticut, a distance of 256 miles; but the brass bands, which fastened the barrel to the stock, gave the musket a heavy, clumsy appearance. Not only was the barrel and other iron work bronzed, but even the bayonet also. In the arsenal, under the charge of an old English sergeant of marines, who had served under Nelson, were a hundred thousand stand of arms, finished and packed for sending to the various arsenals in the states, and for distribution amongst the militia. The present American rifle, which I described as having seen at Washington, as also the machinery in use at the rifle manufactory at Harper's Ferry, were the invention of Mr. Hall, who is the superintendent of the establishment, in which near a hundred workmen are employed. As, in the musket manufactory, much of the work is performed by machinery, one man through the medium of it being able to rifle thirty barrels per day. There is one turn in nine feet, so that each barrel, being longer than that of the English rifle, has about one-third of a turn. Mr. Hall showed me a new invention, a specimen of which he was busily engaged in finishing for inspection at Washington. It consisted in screwing a short but narrow bayonet to the end of a highly tempered steel ramrod, which, when drawn nearly out of its socket, was firmly secured at the muzzle of the rifle by a sliding ring; and thus formed a weapon eight feet in length. I did not at all approve of it, for it appeared too slight a defence against even the parry of a sword, which caused it to bend immediately; but the intelligent inventor was very sanguine in his expectations of its being generally adopted in war. Every thing connected with both establishments was carried on with great exactness and neatness.

The town will soon rise into considerable importance, not only from the attraction of the natural beauty of its scenery, and the large manufactories, but also from the circumstance of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal running by the side of the Potomac, which is crossed by a bridge of 700 hundred feet in length, opposite to the town. I walked for some distance along the line of their operations, and never saw a more laborious undertaking; than the blasting and excavating at the foot of the hills, which are nearly eight hundred feet in perpendicular height. Wherever it was practicable, piers have been formed in the river, so that a considerable extent had been reclaimed from it. A trial came on, during my stay at the town, respecting damages claimed by the proprietor of a small house which occupied the space between the river and rocks, so exactly in the centre of the line of canal, that there was not room for it on either side. The owner did not lay his damages at the intrinsic value of the house (and the lot upon which it was built was but a mass of rock, upon which he could not even form a kitchen garden,) but upon the great loss he should sustain from not possessing such a piece of ground when the canal was completed, and the jury assessed the damages accordingly, and at least at four times the value of the property. Upon the face of the bare rocks, four hundred feet above the bridge, the inhabitants of the town have formed an imaginary likeness of Washington; but it required a greater stretch of fancy than mine to trace any thing like human features upon it.

There being no conveyance in the direction I wished to proceed, I stepped into a large flour-boat about to descend the Potomac, and for some distance darted over the rapids with amazing velocity. The river is rendered particularly dangerous, and almost innavigable during the summer season, by the innumerable reefs of rocks which cross it in every direction, making their appearance some feet above the surface. An experienced pilot is therefore required, who, in the freshets, takes his station at the helm astern; but in low water, in the bow. The river being excessively low, we had a pilot at each end of the boat, so that it threaded the most difficult parts in gallant style, rubbing the keel occasionally a little upon the summits of the rocks beneath the water. The load was only forty barrels when we left the town; but, after passing the most precipitous and narrow rapids, we ran in shore again, and took on board an additional number of thirty from some wagons which had brought them by the road from Harper's Ferry, and again proceeded rapidly down the transparent stream, with romantic scenery on either bank, until we struck with a most violent shock upon a sunken rock, which, taking the boat in its centre, made every plank and barrel quiver with the blow. All hands immediately set to work moving the cargo into the bow; but, being still immovable, the captain of the Mississippi steamer, a passenger on board, recommended the crew to go into the water and attempt to raise it from the rock with levers, stepping out of the boat himself to give them the necessary instructions. No sooner had his feet touched the bottom of the river, and he had quitted his hold of the boat, than the powerful current, washing him fairly off his legs, carried him for a considerable distance down the stream, with his head bobbing up at intervals, like the float of a line when a fish is nibbling at the bait. At every re-appearance of his head above the foaming waters, he "roared him," not as Shakespeare says, "as gently as any sucking dove," but more like a young elephant, and excited shouts of laughter from the crew, who were too much amused with the scene to make any attempt at rescuing him. Being very short-sighted, and his spectacles becoming dim from the water, it was no easy matter for him, after discovering our position, to regain the boat; when his ardour was so cooled that he did not recommend any more experiments.

The application of levers failing, we had recourse to the simple method of placing some loose planks that were fortunately on board across the stream, and holding them firmly between the boat and some of the rocks, so that, acting as a small dam, they raised the water, and the boat once more floated. But, soon after, running a-ground again in the shallows, we had the prospect of passing the night in that situation, until an empty boat, on its way down the stream, took us ashore at the Point of Rocks, nine miles below Harper's Ferry; in performing which distance we had been nine hours, and toiling hard most of the time in an excessively hot sun.

A town rises in America with an almost talismanic rapidity. Immediately some new line of canal or railway is projected, or a clearing commenced on the banks of a navigable stream, a tavern makes its appearance upon a spot where it is imagined the traveller will require a "drink;" this is followed by a saw and grist mill, a store or two, post office, printing press, and a bank. To use their own expression, "every one goes the whole hog;" the freshets probably carry away the mill, or the bank breaks, and the owners "clear out," to commence their speculations afresh elsewhere. Where sixty days since had been a complete wilderness, was now a scene of bustle and confusion: a town was fast rising from amongst the bushes; the streets were marked out, and a tavern, several stores, and upwards of fifty houses, were already inhabited. The fortunate proprietor of the ground had sold every other lot for a trifling sum, and retained the remainder in his possession, letting it upon short building leases; also calling the place after his own unromantic name, and superseding the much prettier one of "Point of Rocks," to which indeed it owed its rise. The Point is the end of a range of rocky hills, which opposes a firm barrier to the advance of the Baltimore railway and Chesapeake canal; which have both the same object in view—that of communicating with the Ohio. By much blasting, and enormous expense, there would be barely room for either of them to pass between the Potomac and the Point; but both arriving at the same spot from different directions, and nearly at the same time, each claimed the right of priority in taking possession of the narrow passage. The canal proprietors made an offer so to compromise the matter that, by each diminishing the respective widths of their lines of communication and making a joint expense of reclaiming some space from the river, there might be a passage for both. The railway proprietors, however, objected to it, and laid an injunction upon the canal to discontinue their works until the case had been tried in a legal court. After a lawsuit of two years, the verdict was given against them, and the canal engineers were now busily engaged in removing the Point of Rocks. Some bores had been worked to the depth of 13 feet, so as to undermine 1000 square yards of rock, which would be blown up by a grand salute on the 4th of July, to the celebration of which it now wanted only three days.

I thought the inns at Harper's Ferry very shabby, both externally and internally, though one was kept by an ex-member of congress, and major of militia; but the one at the Point of Rocks, being in its infancy, was less prepared for the reception of numerous guests than any I had seen. From the accommodation with which I had met since my departure from Washington, I had entertained no expectations of any luxury above a single bed, in probably a crowded room; and a wash in the morning without glass, soap, or towel, at the pump or bare trough in the public yard. Upon enquiring if I could be accommodated with a bed, I was therefore perfectly satisfied with an answer in the affirmative, qualified with a regret "that their mattresses had not yet arrived from Baltimore." I soon became heartily tired of seeking for adventures in these out-of-the-way places, where the arrangements were infinitely worse than in an English pot house. The owners of the taverns were usually so whose sole recommendation consisted in shooting with a rifle, and bearing a commission (something higher than a subaltern's) in the militia. My landlord at Harper's Ferry excelled in invariably striking a quarter of a dollar (which is about the size of an English shilling, with a single ball at thirty paces distant. In justice, however, to the honest innkeeper at the Point of Rocks, I am bound to say, that, in the hurry of my departure, I left a coat hanging up in the bar-room, and, after a journey of 3000 miles, found it neatly packed up and directed to my address at the hotel in New York, where it had been lying for upwards of four months, though I had long despaired of ever seeing it again. After a delightful swim in the clear Potomac, and wearied with the day's hard labour, requested to be shown up stairs, when I was again ushered into a room containing six beds, all of which were to be doubly occupied: the house, too, being built of wood, had become so heated during the day, that the fire-king himself could have scarcely endured the temperature. This was rather too much for a pleasure-seeking traveller, and walking down stairs again, I stepped into a car which I had observed during the day upon the railway, and found my boat companion, the Mississippi captain, had already taken possession of a corner, in search, like myself, of a cooler atmosphere. The railway was continued down to the water's edge close to the Point of Rocks; and we were much disturbed during the night by a man moving the car in that direction. My fellow-occupant, still having I suppose the recollection of the rapids strongly impressed upon his mind, jumped out of the car half awake, up to his knees in a pool of water, and, fancying himself in the Potomac, floundered about in it to my infinite amusement. Some time elapsed before he gained the firm ground again, when, turning round, he checked my laughter at once by saying, "Really I beg you ten thousand pardons, but I was in so great a hurry that I could not find my boots, so I put on your shoes; however, I will have them dried for you again." They were not, however, completely dry again for three days. This incident destroyed my night's rest so thoroughly that at three o'clock I set out, in company with a gentleman whose acquaintance I had formed merely by chance the preceding day, and who had very kindly obtained a horse for me in the neighbourhood. We rode for some miles on the towing path of the canal, close to the placid and mirror like surface of the Potomac, which presented a delightful contrast to the rough turbulence of the many miles of rocky torrent above the Point. We passed by the quarries from which the columns in the capitol at Washington were cut, and for some distance through part of the estate of the fine old patriarch, Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, who at the age of ninety-six, lives in the full enjoyment of his faculties, revered and beloved by his countrymen: being the only survivor of those daring men who, in 1776, risked their lives and properties by affixing their signatures to the Declaration of Independence.*

At the mouth of the Monocacy River, which pours its waters into the Potomac six miles from the Point of Rocks, we arrived at a splendid aqueduct, considered superior to any thing of the kind in the States, thrown over the former river by the canal company. It is built of a hard white granite, and consists of seven segment arches, the span of each being 54 feet, with a rise of 9 feet in the arch, and the entire length, including the wings, 509 feet. The water upon the aqueduct is 6 feet in depth, and the towing path 8 feet broad, with a strong iron railing on the outer side. The entire work will cost 125,000 dollars. The first contractor took it at seven dollars per perch, the second at eleven; and both failed in the performance; the third and present one has it at eleven dollars and fifty cents. Two hundred yards beyond this is a beautiful piece of workmanship, over the Little Monocacy, of a single oblique arch of twisted masonry.

After partaking of a scanty breakfast, upon my return to the Point of Rocks, I proceeded to Baltimore, fifty miles distant by the railway.

Much dissatisfaction was expressed by many of the passengers, who could not obtain any thing stronger than water to quench their thirst at the various places where we stopped to change horses, from either the owners of the houses or the proprietors of the railway being subscribers to the rules of the temperance society.

There was great sameness in the scenery, until we crossed the Blue Ridge, where it became more diversified and picturesque, especially near the flourishing town of Ellicott's Mills, in a most romantic dell on the Patapsco River, whose margin was occupied by numerous extensive cotton mills, scattered over an extent of several miles, giving the country quite an English appearance. The manufactories were prettily situated amongst the trees on the banks of the river, which were ornamented with clean white cottages and gardens, backed by huge masses of dark granite. Several fine bridges have been built across the ravines and streams between this place and Baltimore. One over Gwynn's Falls is a single arch of 80 feet span, and 40 in height; and another across the Patapsco of four arches of 55 feet span each: but, although furnished with such admirable materials, their masonry is much inferior to that used in similar works in Europe. The main object in America appears to be, to finish the job in hand in as short a time and as economically as possible. Several of the principal engineers complained to me frequently of the mistaken economy which they were compelled to pursue, and of the rapidity with which they were obliged to proceed, without being permitted to construct the work in such a manner as to reflect credit upon themselves. The "deep cut" and embankment near the city have been stupendous undertakings, the former being nearly a mile in length, and its greatest depth 70 feet, and the latter of about the same length, with its greatest width 190, and elevation 56 feet; the heaviest and best finished section of the road being from Ellicott's Mills to Baltimore.

I was only eight hours and forty minutes on the journey from Baltimore to Philadelphia, a distance of ninety-seven miles (sixteen of which were performed by horse carriage on the Chesapeake and Delaware railway):

material improvement in the speed of travelling on that to which I had been obliged to submit. Much against the advice of several friends, (the alarming news that the cholera had broken out in New York having just arrived,) I proceeded on my journey the following morning, the 3d of July, wishing to be present at the celebration of the "glorious anniversary," which was, I understood, kept up with more pomp at New York than elsewhere in the Union, imagining that a few scattered ones would not check all festivities. I was rather surprised to find so many passengers on board the steamer in which I embarked to proceed up the Delaware; but, the news having arrived at Philadelphia only late in the evening, it was not generally known. As soon as the report, however, began to spread through the vessel, our numbers diminished considerably at each place where we touched; many being intent upon returning home, and others intending to remain where they landed until the account was corroborated by the arrival of a vessel from the infected city. A Virginian lady, who had two pretty daughters in charge and was on her way to the southern springs, burst into tears and cried most bitterly when the unwelcome information was imparted to her, and left us at the first small village where the steamer touched, fully determined upon returning forthwith to her native state.

The banks of the river are low, and very unhealthy during the "Fall" (as the Americans invariably term the autumn;) but some pretty little villages are scattered upon either bank, more especially those of Burlington and Bristol, nearly opposite to each other, eighteen miles from Philadelphia: I have seldom seen two such tastefully laid out little spots. The houses are very neat and above the common order, with gardens attached to each, extending to the margin of the river, which is ornamented with large and graceful weeping willows, whose branches kiss the watery element. The tower of a summer house, in the domain of Joseph Bonaparte, at Bordentown, where the ex-king of Spain, or, as he is called in the States, the Count de Surville, resides, is seen from the deck of the steamer; and six miles farther on the left bank is Trenton, the capital of the state of New Jersey, containing about 4000 inhabitants, and the termination of the steam navigation, there being a succession of rapids immediately above the town. Upon our arrival at Trenton, nine coaches were drawn up at the pier to receive the passengers from the steamer, and set off in their regular order (I had the misfortune to be in number 6,) and keeping within a few yards of each other over a sandy road, such immense clouds of dust enveloped us, that it was only at intervals I gained a glimpse of the country through which we travelled. The college at Princeton, founded in 1738, is rather a fine old building, and we enjoyed an extensive view over the long flat which extends towards the ocean, during the few minutes we remained to change horses. This part of the country, and the state of New Jersey generally, is celebrated for its cider, and very extensive peach orchards, farmers having accumulated large fortunes by the growth of them. Twenty-six miles from Trenton we arrived at New Brunswick, a town consisting (with probably two or three exceptions) of wooden houses; and we hailed with joy the sight of the smoke of the steamer, which lay in the Raritan River awaiting our arrival. Half suffocated with dust, and parched with thirst, we jumped on board, every one scrambling for a whisk brush, a glass of brandy and water, or a wash-hand basin.

We here added greatly to our numbers, by the accession of 200 Irish labourers from a railway in the vicinity, who were all proceeding to celebrate the Declaration of Independence, and in less than an hour scarcely one of them could boast of retaining his sober senses; when the deck presented a scene which would have done credit to Donnybrook Fair. One poor fellow slipped overboard as we were putting off from the quay at New Brunswick, and lost his passage; for, the steamer not stopping its engines, he was obliged to struggle to the shore in the best manner he could amongst the cheers of his countrymen. Man (with an exception or two, in such people as Leander and Lord Byron,) is always an awkward kind of animal when in the water, but I thought this one, with a large hat over his eyes, and bundle under his arm, of which he in vain attempted to retain possession, and but an ordinary swimmer, a most ludicrous and singular object.

Within twelve hours from our leaving Philadelphia, we landed at New York, a distance of ninety-four miles; and, after undergoing as much annoyance from the officious attentions of hackney coachmen and porters as one would in the streets of London, I at last arrived in safety at the city hotel, in Broadway.

CHAPTER IX.

NEW YORK.

The morning of the 4th of July was ushered in with none of those noisy symptoms which usually proclaim the celebration of some great national festival, processions and festivities of all descriptions having been discouraged by the board of health. The public prints echoed the same directions, and strenuously advised the people not to assemble in crowds, which would rather have a tendency to encourage the advance of the fatal enemy they so much dreaded. The order, therefore, respecting a general parade of the troops was cancelled, and during the day there was but one insignificant civic procession; and a few ill-dressed and worse-drilled volunteer artillery, who were bent upon firing a salute, paraded through the principal streets with a band of music and brigade of guns, carrying their noisy purpose into execution at mid-day, in an open square on the margin of the bay. A crowd of boys of all shades of colour, with a few children of a larger growth intermixed, assembled upon the trottoirs, firing off guns, pistols, and crackers, to the imminent peril of the eyes and limbs of the peaceable citizens of New York. Although this last species of annoyance had been strictly forbidden by the public authorities, it was a law "more honoured in the breach than the observance; and was publicly persevered in throughout the entire day and greater part of the night, without any efforts being made to check it. A few sons of Old Erin, with a negro or two, might also be seen keeping a holiday; and, at the hotel, I overheard a party (of what country I know not) who were taking a glass of wine two hours after the rest of the table d'hôte had dispersed, singing—

"Hicre's a health to the king, God bless him."

In the evening I attended the Park theatre, the Drury of the United States; its front was brilliantly illuminated, and decorated with a large transparent painting of Washington. The bills of the performance were headed in large characters with "Liberty or Death;" and the Glory of Columbia, a drama with miserable dialogue and plot, was performed as an introductory piece to a series of national songs and farces, seasoned, of course, with some hard blows in the shape of abuse at John Bull. We had "Yankee Doodle," and "Sons of Freedom," twice encored; and the orchestra played Washington's March, and General Spicer's March, "Hail Columbia," and "the Star-spangled banner," at least half a dozen times each; every patriotic citizen appearing to think himself in duty bound to attempt keeping time, whether or not he had any ear for music, by stamping upon the floor of the box with his feet, so that let the music be what it would I could scarcely hear a bar.

It is said that seldom a day elapses without a fire in New York. This day there were not fewer than ten. At one which I witnessed, four or five houses were destroyed, and a fireman was killed. Most of these conflagrations, I heard, had their origin from squibs or crackers: and thus ended the 4th of July.

So many Americans had spoken to me of the grandeur and magnificence of Broadway, some even asserting that no street in London was superior to it, that I felt very much disappointed, and think that the same comparison might have been more justly drawn with Liverpool. The shops in it certainly cannot vie with those even in the latter town; but, in the number of equipages, New York excels it, and far outvies London, or any English town, in its hackney coaches, which are so remarkably neat, and even handsome, that a foreigner might be well excused for imagining them to be private carriages. Broadway is throughout the day thronged with gay vehicles and equestrians, and a perpetual stream of that convenient but uncomfortable London carriage, an "omnibus," not the least remarkable thing about those in New York being that (though every man affects to despise titles and rank) they are all named "Lady Clinton," "Lady Washington," "Lady Van Rensselaer," and others as strangely inconsistent. Sometimes, too, servants in half livery may be seen sitting on the box of a carriage, whose door panels are ornamented with a crest. This street is about three miles in length, and eighty feet in width, extending in nearly a straight line from one end of the city to the other. The streets are clean for an American city; but the appearance of the cholera had caused the corporation to exert themselves in attending more closely to the cleanliness of them. Some wag observed, in one of the public prints, that the scavengers had actually dug down to the pavement in one or two places, and that the city was cleansed thoroughly.

Manhattan Island, on which the city stands, and which is formed by the Hudson, the Harlem, and East rivers, with the bay on the south, is fifteen miles in length, and from two to three in breadth. The Old Town, near the bay, much resembles an English one, but the northern part of it is as regularly laid out as Philadelphia or Washington, and numbers about eighty-seven streets. The wharfs are similar to those of Philadelphia, but not quite so ragged, and extend much farther up the East than the Hudson, or North River, as it is generally called, thus depriving the great discoverer of the honour of giving his name to the noble stream. On the south west point of the island, overlooking the bay, is a fine public promenade, of from 500 to 600 yards in length, and 150 in breadth, prettily laid out in walks, and planted with trees. In the evenings it is generally crowded with citizens, who assemble to derive the benefit from a pleasant breeze off the water, or listen to a band that frequently plays in the Castle Garden, which is connected with the walk by a wooden bridge, upon which, and along the whole extent of the public walk, may be seen various cockney anglers, of most persevering dispositions. The former promenade is called the Battery, from having in the olden times of the Dutch settlers, or during the revolutionary war, mounted a few guns; and the Castle Garden in a similar manner possesses no garden, nor could it ever have possessed one, being a modern stone fort, with twenty-eight embrasures, built upon a solid rock, which appeared but a short distance above the water. This being an unprofitable kind of investment of funds has been let by the corporation to a publican, who has converted it to a much more profitable use, charging sixpence sterling for admission, and giving a ticket, so that the visitor may enjoy a stroll upon the upper platform of the fort, admire the view, and then call for a glass of some liquor at the bar, for which he is not charged any thing. The Battery, nevertheless, is the most pleasant promenade in New York, and far exceeds any thing else of the kind in America. Governor's Island, about three quarters of a mile distant in the bay, has a large stone circular fort, with three tiers of embrasures, and is calculated for more than one hundred guns at its western extremity. When I entered it through the small wicket door, I was nearly upset by a quantity of half-starved pigs, which rushed grunting up to me, as if attempting to gain the exterior of the fort, and compelled me to make strenuous use of my walking-stick. The interior was little better than a sty, and in a most unfinished state. In the centre of the island, a small quadrangular fort is connected with the circular one by a covered way, with barracks and military stores in the interior. Vast numbers of workmen were employed in facing the works with granite; and the whole island forcibly reminded me of Washington Irving's happy description, as "resembling a fierce little warrior in a big cocked hat, breathing gunpowder and defiance to the world." Though these works may not enhance the attractions of the scene, they do not, like the numerous poplars on the island, mar the beauty of the noble sheet of water; and, if those who hold dominion over the island possessed any love for the picturesque, they would grub them up root and branch; for certainly, to quote the above ingenious author again, they do look "like so many birch brooms standing on end." On Bedlow's and Ellis's Island, as also at the Narrows (the entrance of the bay from the Atlantic) are most formidable batteries, nearly all of which are at present upon the peace establishment, as I did not see a single gun mounted, and only a few, without carriages, upon the circular fort on Governor's Island.

Of the public buildings, the City Hall, containing the supreme court, mayor's court, and various public offices, situated in the park, a fine and handsome square, is the most remarkable; and being fronted with white marble, has a beautiful effect when seen through the forest trees in the park. The building is upwards of two hundred feet in length, with a dome and tower surmounted by a statue of Justice. A rough stone prison on the right, and a building on the left used as a cholera hospital during my residence, occupy one side of the park; this last appeared, from its large portico in front, and style of architecture, to be a church. The Merchants' Exchange in Wall Street (the Lombard Street of London) is a fine edifice, of the same material as the front of the City Hall. The basement story is occupied by the Post Office, and above it is the Exchange, eighty-five feet in length, fifty-five in width, and forty-five in height to the dome, from which it is lighted. The greater proportion of the other buildings in the street are insurance offices, banks, and exchange offices. With regard to the charitable institutions, I can say nothing, the cholera raging so violently in some of them that it would not have been prudent to have visited them; and strangers were refused admittance into the prisons for fear of imparting the disease to the inmates. In the Academy of Fine Arts there was scarcely any thing which could impress one with a favourable idea of the advances of the pictorial art in New York. The portraits were all stiff, unnatural productions, devoid of all life, and evidently from the brush of very young artists. The architectural designs, too, of which some few were displayed, were but poor and void of taste. Colonel Trumbull, some of whose efforts in the art decorate the Capitol at Washington, and who is the president of the academy, also exhibits his paintings, many of which are historical, in a separate exhibition. They are rendered particularly interesting by containing nearly two hundred and fifty portraits of persons distinguished during the revolution. The rest are miniatures, and copies from celebrated artists, painted by Colonel Trumbull when studying in England. The American engravings show a great harshness and indistinctness of touch, which must ever be the case where so little encouragement is given to the art. One of the principal booksellers in Broadway assured me he found it exceedingly difficult to dispose of a few copies of the annuals which are got up in Boston; the demand being only for the English. Scarcely any of the literary sketches or illustrations in the former are original; the few contributions which can boast of being truly American are such as would not find a place in any British magazine. The only good specimens of lithography I ever saw in the States were by Pendleton of New York.

The Museum in the park contains some excellent specimens of natural history, very well arranged. Although it cannot vie with Philadelphia in displaying such a monstrous skeleton as the mammoth, yet it may be said to have a mammoth turtle,—such indeed as of itself would almost furnish sufficient soup for a lord mayor's feast. It was caught off Sandy Hook, within fifteen miles of the city, by some pilots, and weighed 1000 pounds.

Niblo's Gardens, in imitation of those at Vauxhall, were a great attraction to the citizens, and the arrangements were most admirably conducted. There was an excellent band of music, and a good display of fire-works the night I attended, with a much greater assemblage of people than I should have expected. A panorama was exhibited in one part of the building, where the visitors assembled for hearing the music. It represented the struggle of the Greeks for their liberty, and the battle of Navarino. The owner, or showman, informed us that it had been exhibited at Leicester Square; but I much doubted whether he treated his audience in London with the lecture upon the blessings of liberty with which he thought fit to favour them in New York. He represented to us in the most glowing terms and bombastic language, with the tone of a man who acts in the same capacity in a menagerie, "how the English had no right to enter the bay of Navarino; that they were the first peace-breakers; and, had the officers commanding the batteries at the entrance of the bay been but for a moment aware of such an intention, they would have instantaneously sunk the whole fleet."

At the Bowery Theatre, which holds the second rank in the histrionic world in New York, but which in the external appearance and elegance of its interior excels that in the park, I saw Miss Vincent, a young American actress of great promise, perform in Goldsmith's play of "She Stoops to Conquer," and the "Maid of Milan." Her talents were of a higher order than those of any American actress I saw in the country.

I was much amused with the familiar manner in which an auctioneer, who held sales of books and prints every evening in some rooms in Broadway, spoke of the executive, and men in authority, when he had occasion to make mention of them. I whiled away many an idle hour in listening to his wit, and the quick repartees from some of the assembled crowd. One night, when he had some biographical works to dispose of, the following scene occurred. "Here," said the wag, bringing out the Life of Jackson, "who'll buy old Hickory?"—the name by which the president is generally called, from the hard wood which they say he rivals in toughness. "I'll give a cent for it," said some one; "you shan't," answered the other, "I'll not let it go for twice that; I'd sooner keep it myself;" at last it went for a quarter dollar. The next work he brought out was the Life of Clay; "Come! here, they ought to go together, who'll bid for our next would-be president? he shall go for two cents." "Will-be president!" said a rough voice out of the crowd, "twenty-five cents." "Take him, then, Mr. Cash, he's yours—he's not worth half that—you'll stick in the mud before you have waded half through it."

The churches in New York are handsomer edifices than those in the southern cities I visited, and contain some interesting monuments. St. Paul's, in the park, is one of the finest in the States. In the interior, there is a tablet in the chancel to Sir Robert Temple, baronet, the first consul-general to the United States from England, who died in the city; and one to the wife of the British governor of New Jersey, who died during the revolution from distress of mind, being separated from her husband by the events of the time. In the yard, also, there is a large Egyptian obelisk of a single block of white marble, 32 feet in height, erected to Thomas Emmet, an eminent counsellor at law, and brother of the Irish orator who suffered during the rebellion. When I visited New York again, some months afterwards, one front of it was embellished with an emblematical representation of his fortunes. Though it was in an unfinished state, and the canvases had not been removed from before the scaffolding, I could catch a glimpse of the representation of a hand, with a wreath or bracelet of shamrock round the wrist, clasping one with a similar ornament of stars, and the eagle of America sheltering the unstrung harp of Ireland. Mr. Emmet had emigrated to the States, and settled in New York, where he had acquired considerable reputation many years previous to his death. There is also another monument near it under the portico of the church to General Montgomery, who fell in the unsuccessful attack upon Quebec in 1775. This monument was erected previously to the declaration of independence by the Congress; and in 1818, when his remains were removed from Quebec to New York and interred at St. Paul's, another tablet was added recording the event; though at the time great doubts were entertained whether they actually were the general's remains which were exhumed. The matter was, however, subsequently set at rest beyond a doubt, by the publication of a certificate, drawn up by the person who had actually buried the general in the first instance, and who was then living in Quebec at a very advanced age, being the only survivor of the army which served under Wolfe. There is a very handsome monument near the centre of the church-yard, erected by Kean of Drury Lane Theatre to Cooke the actor. Trinity Church, which is also in Broadway, was the oldest in the city, having been originally built in 1696, but destroyed by fire eighty years afterwards, although from the circumstance of a monument in the church-yard of 1691, it appears it was used as a burial ground some time previously. Though not containing much above an acre of ground, by a moderate calculation, not fewer than 200,000 bodies have been buried in it. Of late years there have been no burials, and weeping willows with various trees have been planted, which in time will make it ornamental to the city. In one corner are the ruins of a monument, erected but sixteen years since to Captain Lawrence, of the American navy, who fell defending his ship, the Chesapeake, against Sir P. Broke, in the Shannon. His body was taken to Halifax in Nova Scotia, and buried there with all the honours of war, the pall being the American ensign supported by six of the senior captains in the royal navy then in the harbour. But the Americans immediately after sent a vessel with a flag of truce to apply for the removal of the body, which being granted, it was reburied in Trinity Church-yard, and the present monument, no lasting memorial of his country's grief, erected upon the spot. It is a most shabby, economical structure, built of brick and faced with white marble. The column, of the Corinthian order, is broken short, with part of the capital lying at the base of the pedestal, emblematic of his premature death. Owing to the summit being exposed to the weather, the rain has gained admittance into the interior of the brick-work, and has given the column a considerable inclination to one side. Some of the marble front also, with two sides of that of the pedestal, have fallen down and exposed the shabby interior. Surely such a man deserved a monument of more durable materials. That the Americans, however, were not unmindful of the respect paid to his remains by the British, appears from the following part of the inscription upon the monument:—

"His bravery in action was only equalled by his modesty in triumph, and his magnanimity to the vanquished. In private life he was a gentleman of the most generous and endearing qualities; and so acknowledged was his public worth that the whole nation mourned his loss, and the enemy contended with his countrymen who most should honour his remains."

There is a monument near it to the memory of General Hamilton, who had served with distinction under Washington, and ranked high as a statesman. He was killed in a duel by Colonel Burr, the Vice-president of the United States, who is yet living in New York. The inscription is as follows:—

"To the memory of Alexander Hamilton the corporation of Trinity Church have erected this monument in testimony of their respect for the patriot of incorruptible integrity, the soldier of approved valour, the statesman of consummate wisdom; whose talents and whose virtues will be admired by a grateful posterity long after this marble shall have mouldered into dust. He died July 2d, 1804, aged 47."

Brooklyn, on the opposite side of East River, and situated upon Long Island, is a place of considerable importance, containing upwards of 12,000 inhabitants. There are many country seats in the immediate vicinity, belonging to New York merchants. In the navy yard on Wall about Bay, at the upper end of the town, were two large frigates upon the stocks; and, as in the other yards at Philadelphia and Washington, considerable additions were making in erecting buildings, piers, &c. The intrenchments thrown up in defence of the town in 1776, when the American army received so terrible a defeat from the British and Hessians under Cornwallis and Clinton, still remain upon the hill in the rear of the navy yard; and the marsh where so many were smothered in the retreat is seen from thence near the bay upon the right. Situated in a similar manner on the opposite side of the city, and across the Hudson, is Hoboken, a particularly pretty spot and great promenade and lounge for the citizens. They assemble here in great numbers, the gardens being tastefully laid out in walks, to stroll about and to enjoy a ride upon a circular rail-road devised by some ingenious person. It is built upon frame work, raised three feet from the ground. The carriages which run upon it are so constructed that those who sit in them, by turning a handle in front of the seat, keep the carriage in motion, when it is once set off by a slight push, and urge it along with great rapidity; being allowed to travel three times round it, three-quarters of a mile, for a shilling. However, it was a pleasure which I thought dearly earned, and very fatiguing to the arms, for those who are ambitious of speedy travelling. There are a double set of rails, and only two carriages, which take contrary directions, so that a sluggish man cannot be run over. Hoboken being in New Jersey, and out of the jurisdiction of the city, affairs of honour are generally settled under a high bank, some distance above the landing-place, where General Hamilton fell. Upon my return one day from this place to this city, I met a procession of several hundreds of African blacks, parading through the streets, with music and banners of their different trades and societies. The majority of them appeared to be true worshippers of Bacchus: the sailors carried some models of small vessels of war, while their band, rolling about in front, attempted to play the "British Grenadiers." All wore a yellow sash across their shoulders, and those at the head of the column, apparently the officers of the Society, were upon horseback, and equipped in frock coats, blue sashes, yellow or blue satin trowsers, making their steeds caper about, and

"Witching the world with noble horsemanship."

Of all dandies, the negroes in America are the most intolerable; a fashion, to come up to their idea of taste, cannot be too outré; let it be ever so ridiculous, they adopt it immediately. When I was in New York, striped trowsers, kid gloves, three or four feet of guard chain for the watch, and gold-headed canes, were the "correct thing;" with two thirds of the sable countenance concealed by the well-starched collar of the shirt. On Sunday afternoon, when the streets in all the cities appeared entirely given up to the African world, it was a high treat to witness the switching of canes and important strut of the one sex, and the affected dangling of parasols and reticules of the other. Familiar nods, or distant bows of recognition were acknowledged with all the air of people who had been rehearsing their parts during the other six days of the week, or taking lessons from the manners of their masters' visitors.

Crossing over to Hoboken, on the 9th of July, I took the coach, and proceeded near the high ground on the right bank of the Hudson to the small village of Aquakink, and thence upon a rail-road which had been lately opened to the flourishing town of Patterson, on the Passaic river, sixteen miles from New York. It wanted an hour to mid-day when I arrived, and the rain pouring in torrents caused the dirty streets to look more miserable and dull than even New York, from which every one was hurrying who could possibly afford means. The driver of an omnibus came across the river in the steam-boat with me, and had his entire family with baggage stowed within and without his carriage, intending to remain in the country until the dreadful pestilence abated. I had also crossed over to Patterson, with the intention of staying there for a few days; then, after making a short tour to the Pennsylvania coal-mines and Wyoming, to return to the city, trusting that the inhabitants would be more settled. But the melancholy-looking day made me wish myself back again, in a place where, whatever other drawback there might be, I could at least lay my hands upon a book to pass away a few dull hours. After listening by the hour to a long dissertation upon the Reform Bill from a stout, one-legged man, I encountered another unconscionably long story, from a little spare person, about hunting and "old Kentuck," in the middle of which all his audience, excepting myself, deserted him, and, betaking themselves to their brandy and water, gradually dropped off one by one to their respective homes. At last even I left my chair, where I had been most patiently sitting in a half-doze, without hearing a single word the Kentuckian had been saying for the last forty minutes, and, yawning, wished him good evening, just as he had got me some half-dozen miles up the Mammoth Cave. Thus, having lost his audience, he rose, and, discovering that his umbrella was gone, said, with an air which appeared almost to console him for the loss, "Well, I guess he must be a mean fellow who would clear off with it; for it was but a mean umbrella, and I don't care one cent about it, only the pole and shove-up are good, that's a fac." As I was on the point of retiring, a man entered the room smiling and looking as if he had some good joke to impart. I therefore determined to wait a few minutes longer; but he only whispered to the story-teller, and both, laughing heartily, left the house together. In a minute or two came another, with the same important countenance, who took away the landlord; and immediately afterwards the bar-keeper disappeared in the same mysterious manner, leaving a little girl in charge of his department. My curiosity was now excited to the utmost; so laying down my candle again, although it was still raining heavily, I followed him out into the dark street, and down it for some distance, until, walking up the steps of a house, he opened the door, and entered. Seeing a crowd of people inside wearing their hats, I also stepped in, and found myself in a small frame room, devoid of all furniture, excepting two rough chairs, and a strong greasy table, with some benches placed against the walls, from which were suspended lists of the Newark and Hoboken coaches, steam-vessels, lotteries, the comic almanac, and other placards. One of the rickety old chairs was occupied by an elderly, sharp-featured man, with long gray hair, brushed up so as to display a high forehead, and with a pair of spectacles fitted on the very tip of his nose, which he took off at intervals of a minute or two, and looked round with great dignity upon the people assembled. Then after taking the circuit, he let his eyes fall upon an ill-dressed man, apparently an artisan, who sat in the other chair opposite, and scrutinised his appearance from head to foot; while he himself, leaning back upon his own seat, and balancing on the hinder legs of it, had his feet crossed on the top of the table, upon which lay a plentifully thumbed and dogs-eared volume, some writing-paper and an inkstand. I was utterly at a loss, for some time, to discover for what purpose so many silent people could have collected together, and was, at last, relieved from my suspense by the elderly man suddenly rousing himself, and saying, with the air of a man just struck by some bright thought, or as if determined upon some great undertaking, "State the charge against the prisoner;" and for the first time I found myself in the presence of an American Justice of the peace. The man who had so coolly taken possession of the other chair was charged with "paying for a quantity of clams (shell-fish), which he had purchased from a little boy, with a counterfeit dollar note." It appeared, upon the evidence of a host of witnesses, that he had been taken from a tavern where he was superintending the cooking of the clams, and that his confederates had made their escape.

The prisoner protested most vehemently against the accusation, asserting his innocence in a long story, which was not at all connected with the charge, and was interrupted momentarily by the observations and witticisms of the by-standers, on the chance of his being lodged, free of expence, in good apartments, at Sing-Sing (the State prison,) and joking upon the loss of his clam supper. The justice appeared to have less to do with the business than any one else; until some one called out, "Let the squire cross-examine him." "Aye do cross-examine him, squire," reiterated fifteen voices; and the squire, accordingly, peering over the top of his spectacles, let fly a volley of "Who are you?" "what's your trade?" "where are you from?" "what brought you to this town?" "where did you get that note?" "what's your name?" and other questions, with such amazing volubility, as if he was resolved to confuse the prisoner with the very weight of them, concluding by saying, "Well, I move that this fellow be committed, and that we make up the dollar for the boy." Silver coins to the amount were immediately thrown upon the table by the by-standers; and the squire, smiling complacently, threw himself back in his chair, with his eyes fixed upon the ceiling, quite overcome with the exertion of the prisoner's cross-examination. One man remarked that "he had better dismiss him, for the dollar would stand the state in 200 dollars to prosecute." The wooden-legged man also took a most prominent and active part in the jokes and gibes upon the prisoner, saying, "You richly deserve three years in Sing-Sing!" "So do you, if every rogue had his deserts," answered the man. "Very likely," said the first; "and, if I go there, I shall make special application to be put in the same cell with you, and I will then give you a good flogging." Soon after another party came in with one of his accomplices, against whom the first turned evidence, and was therefore admitted to bail; but, not being able to furnish it, the squire permitted him to go away on his bare promise that he would return the following day, and the other culprit was delivered over to a guard of citizens, who volunteered their services for the night. Although throughout the scene was ridiculous in the extreme, there were still some traits highly creditable to the justice and by-standers, especially in the spirit with which the collection was made for the boy, and the readiness with which they all proffered to take charge of the prisoner until the morning.

The town already contains nearly 10,000 inhabitants, and is increasing most rapidly; there are at present nearly thirty cotton-mills, iron and brass foundries, in the upper part of it, with gardens so tastefully laid out, and the banks of the river kept so neat, and ornamented with weeping willows, as to compensate for the broken bridges and dirt of the lower part of the town. It is estimated that each new mill brings an increase of 1000 to the population; and two more were building when I visited the place. It will ere long be the Manchester of those parts, and one of the largest manufacturing towns in the Union. They have already the advantage of a rail-road and canal to transport their goods to New York and Philadelphia; and much machinery is made for exportation to the southern markets.

The Passaic river is very romantic in the immediate vicinity of Patterson; but, upon enquiring where what are called the "Grand Falls" were to be seen, I was much disappointed to find that they were actually in sight, and very unimportant, the stream being diverted on three levels for the supply of the mills. There were but about 100 gallons per minute falling over a precipice of 70 feet into a dark and narrow gulf, over which a bridge has been thrown. Some few years since, an American, of the name of Patch, leaped from a spot very near into the chasm beneath, with the intention, as was stated, of committing suicide; but finding himself without injury in the water, he made from that time a trade by taking a similar leap from most of the falls in the States; and at length met his death, in 1829, by striking against some sunken rocks at the falls of the Genesee, in the town of Rochester. The water power which these falls afford is so valuable as to produce an income of 25,000 dollars per annum to the proprietor.

Having ascertained that I could not obtain any other conveyance to Easton, on my route to the coal mines, than a heavy canal boat, which would not arrive in less than three days, although only sixty miles, I returned to New York, notwithstanding the alarming accounts of the increase of cholera, on the 12th of July. The city bore a very different appearance from that which it presented when I had landed ten days previously, or even when I had departed for Patterson. At that time only the timid had fled to the watering places on the sea coast, or the Catskill mountains on the banks of the Hudson. Since then, every one who could afford means appeared to have followed their example. The public gardens and theatres were closed, and in many streets entire rows of houses were deserted, their late occupants having fled from the dreadful pestilence. A steam vessel on the Hudson carried away 700 passengers at one time, and yet refused to take many who were anxious to escape. The gay shops in Broadway were closed by half past eight in the evening; the facetious auctioneer had no audience; and only a solitary individual was at intervals seen hurrying down the street, as if upon some urgent business. The bustle of Wall street had almost ceased, and trades people of every description complained that bankruptcy must certainly come upon them, if the general panic continued. The vast shoals of travellers who had been hurrying towards the north, to escape the more unhealthy climate of the south, were met here by a more dreaded enemy than even the yellow fever, and had all returned to their homes, or betaken themselves to the springs in Virginia. The hotels were comparatively empty. The Earl and Countess Belmore had arrived from Jamaica for the express purpose of travelling through the United States; but after making a stay of four or five days at the hotel, and one short excursion up the Hudson, they proceeded to England by the first packet which sailed. The Americans, I had frequent occasion to observe, are an easily excited people, and even destitute of that moral courage which is so requisite in times of personal or national calamity. The panic and excitement upon this occasion were much augmented by the daily prints, which, not content with merely taking notice of cases in round numbers, mentioned every alarming incident they could possibly collect; and even the names, the streets, the number of the house, and the medical men who attended the patients, were duly inserted. As an instance of the extraordinary dread entertained of the malady, a respectable printer in Philadelphia committed suicide by taking a quantity of laudanum;* and said to those around him, who were attempting to save his life, that all efforts would be fruitless, and, if the physicians prepared an antidote, they could not make him take it; that "he heard the cholera was in Quebec, and, being thoroughly convinced that it would spread over the whole continent of America, he had come to the determination of not suffering an attack of it himself, or seeing his wife and children die before him." Unfortunately, too, a great schism prevailed amongst the medical men, who were either jealous of each other's practice, or disagreed in the views they took of the disease. The board of health refused to publish the reports of cases sent in by an eminent practitioner in the city, who had proceeded to Quebec upon the first appearance of the cholera there, to ascertain the nature of it. This so incensed him that he withdrew his name from amongst the members composing the board; and, others refusing to make any returns, an order was issued by those in power that any medical man who did not make a return of cases should be fined forty dollars. It was hoped, too, that the fear of this penalty would act as a check upon the quack doctors (or steam doctors, as the Americans call them,) who flocked into the city from all quarters, and put in practice the system from which they derive their name—hot baths and cayenne pepper for every complaint, from a cold and sore throat to the yellow fever.

In many parts of the town the streets were watered with chloride of lime, in which, as an antidote, great faith was placed. Upon every subject, the Americans divide themselves into numerous parties, all differing in some trifle from each other; upon this occasion there were contagionists, non-contagionists, contingent contagionists, infectionists, and non-infectionists. There were many who asserted that the disease had its origin in the air, and that if a piece of raw meat were suspended at a certain height it would immediately become putrid. The experiment was actually tried at the mast head of a ship in the harbour; but, upon being brought down again in a few hours, the expectations of the most sanguine upon the subject were much disappointed in finding it in the same state as when put up. Others looked for the origin of the disease from the earth—the water—the comet; and it was even gravely asserted that the sun did not give its customary light. There were some who would not eat meat, and others who would not eat vegetables; some who would not drink any thing except water, and others who would only take "anti-cholera," as they termed brandy and port wine. The temperate soothed their fears, by crying out that only the dissolute and dirty would fall victims to it, and every post and tree in the city was labelled with "Quit dram-drinking if you would not have the cholera." Those who had been in the habit of dram-drinking were at a loss how to proceed: one party told them they were certain to contract the disease, and another assured them that, if they were to abstain suddenly from their former habits, there would be no hope for them; and, at all events, they would be bad subjects for it, when attacked. Some were for clothing warm; but an alarm was immediately given, by the opposite party, that excess in clothing was as injurious as excess in drinking. It was no wonder, then, that nearly 100,000 of the inhabitants fled into the country, and many of them out of the reach of medical assistance fell victims to the disease, which they might probably have otherwise escaped.

The second evening after my return, I walked down to the battery; and although it was a most bewitching scene, as the sun set mildly and beautifully on the opposite side of the bay, and the bright moon rose majestically in the deep blue sky, still only a stranger or two were seen, leaning over the rails at the edge of the pier. At last I caught the general infection of fear myself (though I had often been an eye-witness of the ravages of the disease in other lands, without any such sensation), and the reflection that if I were attacked by it I might be carried off to some public hospital, unknown, and almost uncared for, made me think it would be more prudent to remove to a healthier part of the country. Curiosity alone had brought me to New York, and I had been there a fortnight already without any probability of being gratified with a sight of any thing interesting; two gentlemen, whose acquaintance I was just making, were suddenly carried off by the disease, and my only remaining friend had sailed for England: I therefore determined to continue my tour, and, if possible, return at a busier and gayer time.

CHAPTER X.

MRS. TROLLOPE AND BROTHER JONATHAN.

Mrs. Trollope states, in her "Domestic Manners of the Americans," that much angry feeling was excited throughout the United States by the appearance of Captain Hall's travels in that country; probably but little imagining that she herself as an authoress should give such umbrage to the republicans, and that the gallant captain's works should sink into comparative insignificance before her lashing pen. It was during my residence in New York that her first publication was reprinted, and the commotion it created amongst the good citizens is truly inconceivable. The tariff and bank bill were alike forgotten, and the tug of war was hard, whether the "Domestic Manners," or the cholera, which burst upon them simultaneously, should be the more engrossing topic of conversation. At every corner of the street, at the door of every petty retailer of information for the people, a large placard met the eye with, "For sale here, with plates, Domestic Manners of the Americans, by Mrs. Trollope." At every table d'hôte, on board of every steam boat, in every stage coach, and in all societies, the first question was, "Have you read Mrs. Trollope?" And one half the people would be seen with a red or blue half bound volume in their hand, which you might vouch for being the odious work; and the more it was abused the more rapidly did the printers issue new editions. I never could ascertain the reason why the American edition appeared without the name of its publisher: whether it arose from the fear of subjecting himself to serious consequences for printing a work which spoke so unfavourably of his country, or that he was ashamed of publicly acknowledging the preface, in which he laboured to prove that Mrs. Trollope and Captain "All" (as he was facetiously pleased to write the name, as being the true English pronunciation) were one and the same person,—an opinion which soon gained ground, and I was assured by many intelligent people that there was not the slightest doubt but "that Captain Hall had written every word of it; Mrs. Trollope might probably have furnished notes for it, but certainly nothing more; no one who had read the two works, and observed the great similarity of expression and opinions, could for a moment doubt the author's identity, and every one was well aware that he had been sent out by the Quarterly Review." Never were two poor authors so abused: every newspaper for two months teemed with some violent remarks, and personalities, which were substituted for refutations, thus apparently verifying the justice of the saying, that "Blunt truths more mischief than nice falsehoods do;" nor was this kind of criticism confined merely to editors of daily newspapers; but even people who had some pretensions to literary talent fell into the same error. Mr. Dunlap, in his late history of the American stage, confidently states that Captain Hall was the author of the work in question; and Mr. Paulding, who ranks high as an author amongst his countrymen, in his late novel of "Westward Ho!" exerts himself, as much as possible, to hold up Captain Hall to the ridicule of the Americans, merely because he differs in opinion from them; forgetting that

"Tis with our judgments as our watches, none Go just alike, yet each believes his own."

I sincerely give it as my opinion that neither he nor Mrs. Trollope could with safety make their personal appearance again in the United States. Never was there so extremely sensitive a person as brother Jonathan. He lashes himself into a violent rage, if any one doubts that his own dear land is not the abode of all that is estimable. Mere approval will not do for him; it must be the most unqualified approbation; and he thinks he is in duty bound to consider any national reflection a personal insult, and to resent it accordingly. Thus it has ever been in his wars with England, which were carried on with greater animosity than any of our continental struggles. Thus, also, (to descend to minor affairs,) can alone be explained their conduct towards Kean, Anderson, and others, where the whole nation resented what was only a private quarrel.

Although I should not wish to identify myself with Mrs. Trollope's opinions and sentiments, inasmuch as she evidently is a writer who, in drawing a tolerable likeness, has given a broad caricature of the Americans, and most unjustly impressed those who have not visited the United States with the imagination that no gentlemen are to be met with there, yet I must think her "Domestic Manners" will do good amongst a certain class of people. The effects had even begun to show themselves before I quitted the country; and I record the following anecdote, in order that, if these poor pages ever meet the eye of the witty and much abused authoress, she may congratulate herself on having already worked a partial reform. When Miss Kemble made her first appearance at the Park theatre in New York, the house was crowded to excess: and a gentleman in the boxes, turning round between the acts of the play to speak to some one who sat in the bench behind him, displayed rather more of his back to the pit than was thought quite orthodox. This was no sooner observed than a low murmur arose amongst the insulted part of the audience, which presently burst forth into loud cries of "Trollope! Trollope!" "turn him out," "throw him over," &c., and continued for several minutes, accompanied by the most discordant noises, until the offending person assumed a less objectionable position. I will bear witness that I have frequently seen as much want of decorum in our theatres as I ever did in the American; and think that our bar rooms and ordinaries in country inns, and passengers on a stage coach, might with as much justice be taken as samples by which a foreigner might form his estimate of English gentlemen as the inmates of steam vessels, canal boats, and lodging houses, should be of American gentlemen. That the Americans generally have many unpleasant customs, no sensible man in the country will deny; and if ringing the changes upon tobacco chewing and smoking, dram drinking, and, perpetually in their ears, will be of any service towards working a reformation, no English traveller will spare them; and no man could have more strongly expressed his abhorrence of such filthy habits than I did during my sojourn in the States.

Not an American, let him be yankee or southerner, from the banks of the Hudson or the Mississippi, but flatters himself that he speaks more correct English than we illiterate sons of the mother isle. If you ask a Canadian in what part of the globe the purest French is spoken, he will reply, "upon the shores of the St. Lawrence," and assign as the reason for such being the case that a patois was introduced in the old country when the cannille gained the ascendancy during the revolution of 1792, and that the correct language falling, with the princes and nobles, Canada alone, which has not been subject to any such convulsions, retains the language in its original purity. Incredible as it may appear, I was frequently told by casual acquaintance in the States "Well, I should have imagined you to be an American; you have not got the English brogue, and aspire to letter h, when speaking." And once I was actually told by a fellow passenger in the stage coach from Alexandria to Winchester, "Really I should never have thought you to be from the old country, you pronounce your words so well, and have not got the turn-up-nose." This same "turn-up-nose," somewhat approaching to the pug, is, I find, one of the characteristic marks of an Englishman in American eyes; and they apply the term "Cockney" as indiscriminately to us as we do that of "yankee" to them. Whatever may be their opinion of the manner in which we natives of Great Britain speak the mother tongue, I can affirm that the nasal twang, which Americans of every class possess in some degree, is very grating and disagreeable to the ears of an Englishman.

CHAPTER XI.

LEAVE NEW YORK FOR HARTFORD.

Taking advantage of a bright morning sun, so that I might enjoy a view of surrounding objects, I embarked on board the Superior steam-vessel, on East River, for Newhaven in Connecticut. I departed from New York rather sooner than even the unhealthy state of the place would have urged, being fearful that if I remained there many days longer an opportunity would not occur of leaving the city, as many steam-vessels had discontinued making their usual trips, from the long quarantine imposed upon them in some ports, and from the decrease in the number of passengers. The most conspicuous objects on the banks of the East River are the two large stone buildings of the Almshouse at Belle-Vue, which contain from 1200 to 1500 inmates. Amongst them the cholera was making most frightful ravages, principally owing to the impaired constitution of the patients; and at this time upwards of thirty were dying daily.

A short distance further a penitentiary is erecting upon an island, for the confinement of prisoners under sentence of two years or a less period. It is a very narrow, long, tasteless piece of architecture, with two wings, so closely studded with innumerable windows (no broader than the loop-holes of an old castle) as to give it a most ungraceful appearance. Its future occupants were busily employed in its construction; and were closely watched by an overseer, who was pacing to and fro, upon a lofty wooden platform, lest any one should attempt to escape into the bushes. Opposite to the upper end of the island are some handsome country residences on the mainland; and also the entrance to Hell-Gate, or, as in this age of refinement it is called, Hurl-Gate. It being ebb tide, the water was rushing with great violence over the Hog's Back and Gridiron, and boiling and tossing about in a furious trouble in the Pot and Frying Pan. These eddies have been most aptly named, and were to be distinguished at a great distance: they act in part as a guard against the entrance of vessels into the harbour, and batteries were also erected some few years since on the points of land which form the gate, to make the pass more secure. The depth of water is ample, as two French ships of war, when blockaded by the British off New York in 1810, made their escape through the gate into the Sound. It is a dangerous and intricate navigation for sailing craft at all times of tide, and part of a small vessel was visible above the water when we ran through, and was lying on some huge masses of rock in the centre of the gate. It is in contemplation to excavate a canal across the peninsula, from Pot to Hallet's Cove, of sufficient depth to admit line-of-battle ships; the estimated expense being about 150,000 dollars for a canal of twenty-eight feet in depth and one hundred and thirty-seven in breadth at the top.

After running thirty miles amongst innumerable islands, and keeping along the continental shore, the Sound became so broad that Long Island was but indistinctly seen. Having touched at several small towns, we arrived at Newhaven, eighty-six miles from New York, in six hours and a half. The town, having some high bluff rocks rising at the back of it, is situated at the head of a bay of considerable extent, which affords an excellent shelter from the sea, and a small battery, dignified by the appellation of Fort Hale, occupies a point about two miles up the bay. When within half a mile of the pier, the steamer was boarded by a health officer, who expressed himself satisfied with the captain's word that there were no cholera cases on board; so, being permitted to land, I proceeded to a hotel in a large square called the Green, about three quarters of a mile in circumference. It has three churches in a line near the centre of it, and at a short distance in another line a state house (which is almost a fac simile of the Philadelphia bank) and a methodist chapel; while the opposite side of the square is occupied by the large brick buildings of the Yale College. The square, as also the streets of the town (which contains 11,000 inhabitants) are planted with fine elm trees, which keep them, however, exceedingly wet and dirty. The college has four houses for the lodging of the students, two chapels, and a lyceum, (in which are the recitation rooms,) and possesses an excellent library. It was commenced in 1700, by the recommendation of eleven of the principal ministers of neighbouring towns, who had been appointed to adopt such measures as they should deem fit for the regulation of the college. Its first commencement was held at Saybrook in 1702, and removed to Newhaven in 1717. The Hon. Elihu Yale, Governor of the East India Company, being its principal benefactor, his name was bestowed upon it. It is considered one of the best colleges in the States, and from four to five hundred young men study at it.

The Green was used as a burial ground from the settlement of the town in 1638 until the year 1796, when a cemetery was marked out in the northwestern suburbs, and the grave stones were removed there in 1821. It contains about twelve acres of ground, and is planted thickly with poplars and weeping willows, which well accord with the numerous obelisks and columns of black and white marble that distinguish the graves.

Between two and three miles from the town, there is a rustet manufactory, established by Mr. Eli Whitney, a government contractor, on the banks of a small stream which empties itself into the Dragon, a fine winding river with low banks and rich salt meadows on its margin; and rather nearer the town is a pretty mansion, the residence of Mr. Hillhouse. The frame-houses on the outskirts of Newhaven are distinguished for neatness, and, on the whole, it may be considered one of the handsomest towns in the States.

Leaving Newhaven in one of four coaches, filled with passengers who had made their escape from New York, we travelled rapidly over a tolerably good road to the pretty little town of Meriden, which has several block-tim manufactories in its vicinity; and thence to Berlin, a long straggling town, seven miles farther: we were but fifty minutes—quite an era in American driving. It was very evident, from the coachman's nonchalance, that we were now in the genuine Yankee country. One of the gentlemen, an inside passenger, told him to mount his box and move on, as he was loitering at a tavern door, smoking a cigar, and conversing quietly with a brother whip, but was answered with an air of the most perfect indifference, as follows:—"Don't be in such a hurry; we take it easy in this part of the world, I guess; and, I declare, it ain't four o'clock yet—that's a fac." But I acquit the man of intentional rudeness, as I sat on the box with him, and found him both civil and obliging, pointing out every object of interest as we went along; and, during my travels afterwards of many hundreds of miles by the coaches, I never found them otherwise. Upon first landing in the country, such roughness of manner is mistaken for insolence.

In England we are apt to designate all Americans as Yankees, whether they are born under the burning sun of Louisiana, or frozen up five months in the year on the shores of the Lake of the Woods. The name, correctly speaking, is applicable only to the natives of the New England states, a very small portion of the Union. The southern states call all their countrymen who reside north of the Potomac Yankees. The middle states, including New York, Maryland, Pennsylvania, &c., push the odious appellation off their shoulders on to their more northern brethren, the natives of that part of the country lying to the east of the river Hudson; while they, not being able to put it upon the New Brunswickers, who have their own proper by-name, make a virtue of necessity, and wear the title with a good grace, frequently prefacing the conversation with "We Yankees are a curious 'quisitive set, ain't we?" And (that being granted) make a dead point at all your secrets. Knickerbocker tells us that "the name of Yankees, which in the Mais-Tchusacg (or Massachusetts language) signifies silent men," was a waggish appellation bestowed by the aborigines of the land upon the first settlers, who kept up such a joyful clamour, for the space of one whole year after their arrival in America, "that they frightened every bird and beast out of the neighbourhood, and so completely dumb-founded certain fish, which abound on their coast, that they have been called dumb-fish ever since." Other authorities say, it is a corruption of the word "English." The Yankees differ much in personal appearance and disposition from the southerners: the latter, like their climate, are fiery, warm-hearted, and generous, and display a greater respect for the customs of the mother country than the former, who are cool speculators, intent upon gain alone. But little good-will exists between these two portions of the Union, their interests in mercantile matters so directly clashing, and what (like the tariff) is a safeguard to the manufacturers of the north is little better than ruin to the south. I thought that the southerner had generally a fresher colour, and was of a stouter habit of body, than the Yankee, who is well described in the words of his own national melody:—

"A Yankee boy is trim and tall,
And never over fat, sir,
* * * * *
He's always out on training-day,
Commencement, or election;
At truck and trade he knows the way
Of thriving to perfection.
Yankee doodle dandy," &c.

Having gained an eminence four miles from Hartford, we had a magnificent view of the town with its numerous domes, the passing sails upon the Connecticut river, and the light yellow corn-fields covering the whole extent of the valley to a range of forest-crowned hills, twenty miles distant. Passing the Insane Asylum, a plain but neat building on the outskirts of the town, we drove up to the City Hotel, situated in a small square opposite the State House, and kept by a most attentive landlord.

I had but just stepped off the coach, and seen my baggage fairly housed, when hearing drums at a distance, I walked to the corner of the street, and saw the students of the college, between sixty and seventy in number, equipped as archers, with light green frocks, white trousers, green bonnets, and ostrich feathers, marching down it; their officers distinguished by wearing a sword and sash. The whole body had a very neat and striking appearance; each archer carried a long bow in his hand, and a quiver of arrows at his back. I could have almost fancied myself in the forest of Arden, or Merry Sherwood, instead of in one of the largest cities in the United States, where the very last sight I should have expected would have been a company of archers in Lincoln green.

During the night an alarm of fire was given, which immediately set every bell in church and chapel ringing, and a night-capped head was protruded from every window in the street, vociferating "fire! fire!" so loudly that I at first conceived it must be in the hotel, and, but half awake, sprang out of bed in double-quick time, whereas it was quite at the other extremity of the town. The engines rolled and thundered over the rough pavement in quick succession, and, instead of being drawn by horses, men and boys, who volunteered their services for the mere sake, I believe, of increasing the uproar, were yoked to them; while the superintendents, who continued shouting through their long tin trumpets to urge them on, produced a most hideous noise, a "clangor tubarum," which would have broken the charm of the Seven Sleepers themselves, or aroused the giants from any enchanted castle in Christendom. Thanks, however, to my scaling the hills at Newhaven, I was soon again in a sound slumber.

The following day being Sunday, I attended service at the protestant episcopal church, which was the finest specimen of solid architecture I had seen. Being built of a dark coloured stone in imitation of the Gothic style, it already possessed a venerable and antique air, which the brick churches and white painted wooden towers will not acquire in less than a century. The tower was not finished, but, when carried to the height intended, it will become a great ornament to the town, and a monument of the spirit of the congregation, who erected it entirely by private subscription. Most of the American churches have their towers at the eastern end, which is a great deduction to their interior beauty, from not having the large, light, chancel window, which is found in all English religious edifices; and none of them possesses that air of solidity without, or solemn grandeur within, which distinguishes the ecclesiastical buildings of the old world. The inhabitants of Hartford appear strictly attentive to their religious observances. There are nine or ten churches to 8500 inhabitants; and, on walking out in the afternoon, there was literally not one person to be seen in the streets. Feeling rather ashamed at being apparently the only absentee from divine service, I proceeded a short distance out of the town to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, which was the first establishment of the kind in the States, and is partly conducted by a gentleman who has the misfortune to be afflicted himself in the same manner. The building is a very extensive one, situated on an eminence overlooking the town, and generally contains from sixty to seventy inmates. It was a lovely afternoon, and as I sat upon the grass, gazing upon the town and river beneath, whence neither the hum of voices nor the sound of any one stirring arose, and not a living being was even to be seen crossing the long straight streets, or standing at a door or window, I thought I had never before seen a day so truly set apart as a day of rest, nor one, I would believe, so strictly kept.

In October, 1687, Sir Edmund Andross, Governor of the New England states (who committed so many arbitrary acts during his administration,) proceeded to Hartford with a detachment of troops, and, entering the house of assembly when in session, demanded the charter of Connecticut, declaring the colonial government to be deposed; the assembly protracted the debates till evening, when the charter was laid upon the table, and, at a preconcerted signal, the lights being extinguished, a Captain Wadsworth, seizing the charter, sprang out of the window, and, under cover of the dark night, secreted it in the hollow of an oak, where it lay concealed for several years, until the accession of William, Prince of Orange, to the throne of Great Britain, when the colonists resumed their charter, which continued in force until 1818, when they adopted a new constitution. The old house of assembly is still pointed out in rear of the episcopal church, and the charter oak retains its fine broad-spreading branches in front of the pleasure-grounds of Mr. Wyllis, at the southern outskirts of the town. The Connecticut river, on whose right bank the town stands, is about three hundred yards broad, and connected with the large manufacturing village of East Hartford, one mile distant, by a bridge of seven arches, at which the sloop navigation ceases. The town would be a very handsome one, if a little more attention were paid to the cleanliness of the streets; but, like most American towns, the dirt was six inches deep in them. Grass, rank docks, and other weeds, were growing on every side of the State House and one half the square, which was cut up in every direction, after a heavy shower of rain, by deep ruts and innumerable water-courses.

CHAPTER XII.

LEAVE HARTFORD—PROVIDENCE—BOSTON.

Proceeding in the coach from Hartford across the Connecticut river, we passed over an undulating country to Mansfield, twenty-four miles distant, where a silk factory has been lately established. Much silk is grown in the vicinity of the village, the worms being kept in long sheds neatly arranged with shelves; and the mulberry-trees in every direction were laden with the young guardians of the insects picking the leaves. From this place we entered a more hilly country, the face of which was densely covered with rocks and large stones. Where fields had been cleared, they were not more than three or four acres in extent, enclosed with stone fences, and for forty miles the scenery much resembled many parts of the Peak of Derbyshire. Manufactories of various kinds were scattered thickly upon every stream; and, at the pretty little village of Scituate, a very extensive comb establishment, employing upwards of one hundred workmen, had been lately opened with every prospect of success. The state of Connecticut, though possessing a soil generally fertile, increases in the number of its inhabitants more slowly than any other in the Union, thirty years only giving an addition of 38,000 people. This has arisen from so many of the young men migrating to the western regions, it being said that this state and the neighbouring one of Massachusetts send a greater proportion across the Alleghany mountains than any other. After a tedious journey of fifteen hours, we arrived at Providence, pleasantly situated on both sides of the river of the same name. On the eastern bank, it is built at the foot of a range of heights which run parallel with the stream, and upon the summit of them are the two large tasteless buildings of the Brown University. An Englishman's ideas of a college are associated with cloisters, antique piles, and black-lettered volumes, and he would fix the seat of the genius of learning in some venerable pile of building which possessed an air of grandeur. He could scarce reconcile to himself a four-storied, red-painted brick house as her abode; and would pardon her for taking alarm and fleeing from such a spot, where too her votaries are distinguished by no classical garb. I believe it is rather the case with this college, which does not bear so high a name as that at Hartford or Newhaven, or Cambridge; but, of all the public buildings in America, I thought the colleges were the most tasteless.

Steam-vessels and sloops navigate the river up to the bridges which connect the two towns; where the stream is considerably contracted by the piers which have been thrown out, but immediately above them it expands again into a fine cove or bay of half a mile in width, with neat houses encircling it. The town, containing between 16,000 and 17,000 inhabitants, is a manufacturing place of considerable importance, and printed calicoes of very durable colours are struck off. In the cotton works many very young children are employed; but there were propositions (as in England, by Mr. Sadler) to limit the number of working hours. At Pawtucket, four miles from the town on the Seekhonk river, there are twelve cotton, and a variety of other mills. I walked there over the most passable road I had as yet seen, and saw many wagons laden with the raw material, which had been landed at Providence, on their way to the flourishing manufactories. A large new almshouse is situated upon the same range of hills as the college, built by the bequest of Mr. Dexter, a second Mr. Girard, who also bequeathed an extensive farm in the vicinity of the town for some other charitable purpose, and a fine plot of land to be used as a public parade ground. The town is the most extensive one in the state of Rhode Island, and was first settled in 1636, by Roger Williams, a minister of Salem in Massachusetts, from which colony he had been banished on account of heretical opinions; the person who was appointed to dispute with him before the general court, being unable to convince him, he was sentenced to depart out of the jurisdiction within six weeks, and removed with his family to Moosawick, where he commenced a plantation, and called it Providence. Visiting England eight years afterwards, he obtained a free charter of incorporation for Providence and Rhode Island plantations, the latter having been commenced by William Coddington in 1638; and in 1663 a royal charter was granted to them by Charles II., which governs the state to this day, there being no written constitution as in the other states of the Union. The election for governor was taking place during the time I was in the state, and the voting was visa voce. The streets of the town are kept very clean, and the private dwellings are generally remarkably neat and elegant. The Arcade is also a handsome structure, nearly 250 feet in length, with two fronts supported by six massive columns of granite, the shaft of each being a single block from twenty-two to twenty-four feet high. The interior consists of three tiers of shops, and the balconies are protected by a highly ornamented iron balustrade.

During my stay in Providence, a steamer arrived from New York with passengers, who had not been allowed to land at Newport on the sea-coast, nor would the authorities permit them to enter Providence, unless they performed quarantine three days; but gave them full permission at the same time to land elsewhere on the river's banks, on condition that they did not enter the town in less than ten days, which if they set aside, they would be subject to a heavy penalty, whereas I had entered by land without any questions being asked, or any one appearing to trouble himself about the stage-coach passengers.

The road from Providence to Bristol, at the head of the Narraganset bay, is through a pleasing open country; but the crops every where appeared exceedingly poor: many indeed were scarcely worth gathering, and would apparently not yield more than six bushels per acre. The principal produce of the land in the immediate vicinity of Bristol was onions, which are shipped off in vast quantities to New York and other large ports in the States. Though the day I travelled between the towns was a fine hay-making day, yet the road was thronged with the farmers who were riding in to vote for the governor's election. It was one in which great interest was taken, there being three candidates for the office (one of whom was supported by the anti-masons;) and it being requisite that the successful one should have a majority of the whole number of votes, the two former elections had failed, and I saw afterwards by the public prints that even the third, and, I believe, the fourth, had also been unsuccessful in appointing one.

The island is hilly, but all the ground is in a state of cultivation, and there are many large and excellent farms scattered on the sides of the road. The one which had attained the highest state of cultivation was the property of an English gentleman, who had been settled there only a few years, and had chosen a pretty retired spot, near the water's edge, for his house and gardens. Twelve miles from the ferry, we arrived within sight of Newport, on the opposite side of the island; it is situated on the side of an eminence rising gradually from the head of a circular bay, which affords a most capacious and excellent harbour. Just as we arrived at some old-fashioned and dirty, but picturesque, windmills at the entrance to the town, a rope stretched across the road, with a sentry box at one end of it, and two citizens on guard with large pine sticks in their hands, brought us to a halt, and one of them began to cross-examine me (being the only passenger) with the air of a man as to where I came from; and, upon hearing I had quitted New York six days previously, he informed me that I could not enter Newport until I had been ten days absent from that city. All my remonstrances that I had travelled through two entire states, and visited the principal towns in them since I had left it, without any objections being raised, were of no avail. He proffered me a Testament, saying, he should have no objection to pass me in, if I would take an oath that I had been absent the length of time required; which begging to decline doing, I had no alternative but to jump off the coach, which immediately proceeded into the town. The citizen sentry then produced a dirty scrap of paper on which he requested me to write my name and place of abode. I then sounded him, to discover whether he would allow me to walk through the town for the purpose of seeing it, promising that I would return again in three hours; but the law of parole was quite unintelligible to him: he was obstinate and faithful to his trust, saying that, for his own part, "he did not fear me: he would as soon sleep with me as not; but the inhabitants—old and young, men and women, were tarnationly frightened." I thanked him for his good will, and began to reconnoitre the outskirts of the place over a stone wall which flanked the road: but I suppose he imagined I had some intention of skulking in during the night; for he hinted slightly that there was a penalty of 100 dollars if any one was discovered entering the town privily. A crowd of men and boys had begun to collect by this time, and, thinking it more than probable that they might hunt me down as they would a mad dog, I began to retrace my steps towards Bristol. After proceeding a mile upon the road, I turned across the fields to an old redoubt on the summit of a hill, which overlooked the bay, and sat down to admire the scene, the beauty of which might probably have been heightened from the circumstance of my not being allowed to take a closer survey of it. It had been a kind of promised land to me from the time I had quitted New York; and I had thought with pleasure of treading over the spots which had been the scenes of so much real as well as fictitious life. The town appeared calculated for 6000 or 7000 inhabitants, and built round a circular bay, fronting the southwest, the houses rising in amphitheatrical form from the water up to the summit of a range of heights, which skirted the bay at a quarter of a mile distance, while, on the various points and headlands, the lofty white columns of the light-houses roared themselves on high, and every commanding position was covered with dark frowning batteries and forts. The distant hills on the opposite side of the bay were dimmed with that light haze so peculiar to southerly winds in a warm climate, and, over and above them, might be seen the dark blue waves fading away in the distance, until both sea and sky were blended into one. The very redoubt upon which I had taken my station had been in turn possessed by contending armies; and every foot of ground, as far as the eye could reach, had been severely contested. It was here that the British army, under General Pigot, might have been captured, but for the want of energy on the part of the French Admiral D'Estaing, who failed to operate in the attack of the American General Sullivan in August 1778. The same bay, too, had been the principal scene in the "Red Rover," one of Cooper's most interesting novels; and now there were two vessels lying at anchor in it, which, though probably not possessing so much attraction as the Rover's ship and the Bristol merchantman, were by no means devoid of interest. One of them was a packet ship which had sailed from New York only a few days previously, bound for Europe, with a cargo of cotton, and many passengers; but had taken fire at sea, and put into Newport for assistance. Arriving there after the cargo had been on fire twenty hours, the inhabitants with the same feeling of humanity which induced them to arrest travellers in their progress by land, would not allow a single passenger to come ashore, though there had not been any symptoms whatever of disease on board, but solely because they had not been ten days absent from New York. They had, however, I must do them the justice to say, sufficient good feeling still remaining to attempt extinguishing the fire, and several engines being put on board lighters, six feet of water was thrown into the hold, the passengers being rescued from the suffocating heat by a brig which received them on board. A few days after, a steamer arrived from New York for the purpose of towing the injured vessel back again to port; and, her fuel being exhausted, the crew were not allowed to land at Newport for a fresh supply. To this conduct, that at Newhaven may serve as a set-off, where the gates were open to every one, and the ladies, with that charitable feeling for which American females are so distinguished, sent upwards of 1200 suits of clothes, in addition to a sum of money, for the use of the poor people at Montreal, in Lower Canada, upon the first breaking out of the disease in that city.

"Drest in a little brief authority,"

The surrounding country is rather devoid of trees, a complaint which a traveller will not often have to make in America, but so many are rising up round the pretty residences in the vicinity of the town that in a few years it will be a most attractive place. After making one or two almost ineffectual attempts at taking a sketch of the town, against which I believe there was neither pain nor penalty attached, I again rose, having rested myself for two hours in gazing upon the scene, and, regaining the road, proceeded on my journey, almost wicked enough to wish that the cholera might pay the inhabitants of Newport a visit, in return for their inhospitable conduct to travellers, and those who were seeking a place of refuge. After a hot walk of six miles, I arrived towards sunset at a small tavern on the road-side, where I could obtain a supper and a bed.

The following morning, the 19th of July, I took the coach and proceeded through the village of Portsmouth (where some coal mines had been worked, the preceding year, but which were closed again, the produce being only a sort of anthracite or worst description of coal) to the N. E. extremity of the island. Keeping along a narrow neck of land, which is overflowed at spring-tides, we crossed the Seaconnet to the mainland, by a pier of

* A confirmed punster might pretend to think our line-tenant called anthracite the "worst description of coal," because, it will not "Coke."

600 yards in length, with a drawbridge in the centre for the navigation of vessels into Mount Hope Bay. To guard the pass, a small block-house and breastwork have been thrown up at the Rhode Island end of the pier; and the heights above the small village, at the opposite side, are covered with old revolutionary redoubts. After ascending these heights, a splendid view presents itself of Mount Hope, the numerous creeks and rivulets of Narraganset Bay, the town of Bristol, with many villages and white cottages interspersed amongst the trees, the country for a distance of fifty miles being varied with every kind of landscape. From the Seaconnet, we passed through a broken and uninteresting country, to the small town of Tiverton, where are manufactories of printed calicoes; and a few miles farther to Fall River, another manufacturing place of flourishing appearance. By the time we had arrived there, the heat of the sun was so oppressive that I sought shelter from its rays within the coach, and though there were nine inside passengers, having secured a seat near the window, renewed my examination of the surrounding country, or watched the dark rolling clouds of a gathering thunder-storm. The road we travelled was certainly excellent, and no wonder, as the whole country was covered more or less with stone, and the walls of the inclosure made immoderately thick (from four to five feet) for the purpose of ridding the ground. There was, indeed, a sufficient quantity of rock upon the land to justify a piece of wit by a Yankee who, some few days afterwards, was a chance traveller with me over the same description of country. After gazing for a length of time in apparent astonishment at the thick walls and the mass of hard materials which covered every acre, he said, with an air of well-feigned simplicity, "Well, I wonder where they could have got all the stones to build such thick walls." "Why, from the fields to be sure," said a surly old farmer. "La! did they indeed?" answered the other; "really I should never have missed them." To me this was something new; but judging from the faces of my fellow travellers, and the Yankee's failure in attempting to create a general laugh, it was not original. The country was woody and undulating, increasing in picturesque beauty and population as we approached Boston, where we arrived at half past seven: and I considered myself especially fortunate, as so many people had fled from New York to this city, in obtaining room at the Tremont House, the finest and best conducted hotel in the United States. The building itself is not inferior in beauty to any in Boston, and the reading-room is well supplied with not only the principal American and Canadian newspapers, but also European and American publications, of which I could never get a sight in any other hotel in America.

CHAPTER XIII.

BOSTON, HARVARD—MOUNT HOLYOKE.

The city of Boston is built upon a peninsula, which is joined to the mainland by a very narrow neck on the southern side; it contains about 70,000 inhabitants, and vies with any of its southern neighbours in the situation and beauty of its public and private dwellings. In 1630, at its foundation, the Indian name was Shawmut, which was changed to Trimountain, from the three hills upon which it is now built; subsequently it received its present name, in honour of a minister who emigrated from Boston in Lincolnshire. Upon the other sides of the peninsula, communication is kept up with the mainland by several strong wooden bridges, varying in length from 1500 to 3500 feet, and on its western side by a pier of solid materials one mile and a half in length, and above 80 feet in width. The bay is a most magnificent one, and equals that of New York, but in a different style of beauty. The Boston bay is on a much more grand and extensive scale, containing seventy-five square miles, and studded with more than one hundred islands and rocks, the only ship channel being between Forts Warren and Independence on Governor's and Castle islands. The land which almost encircles the bay is high and cultivated, and numerous towns and villages are scattered over it. When entering the harbour from sea, I think it much more beautiful than New York. The city rises in a much prettier and more showy form upon its three hills, and the whole is surmounted by the lofty dome of the State House. But then there is no view from any part of Boston to be compared with the bewitching one from the battery in New York on a still summer's evening.

As to literary character, it is the Athens of the western world; the number of its literary publications is very great, being six newspapers daily, four three times a week, eight twice a week, and sixteen weekly; two weekly magazines, two semi-monthly, eleven monthly (principally religious,) four every two months, five quarterly, and one semi-annually; and four new-year annuals;—in addition to which the British Quarterly Review is reprinted, as also the Edinburgh. As an historical spot it ranks far above all others in the west, having been the birth-place of American Independence; and, the city having arrived to maturity before that event took place, it more resembles an English one than any other in the states. I had become rather weary of straight streets, which, though in some respects convenient, are tiresomely monotonous to a stranger, and was glad to be once again walking in those of a description I had been most accustomed to. The environs are more pleasing also than those of Philadelphia and New York; the country being intersected with delightful rides, every one of which affords some fine view.

The "common" in which the State House is situated is an open park, containing seventy-five acres of broken and abrupt ground, with a promenade and double row of fine trees round it. It was reserved in perpetuum by the first settlers for a parade ground, or other public purposes, and is surrounded upon three sides by elegant private dwellings and several churches, the fourth side being open to a wide bay. There is a fine drooping old elm in the centre of it, near a serpentine sheet of water, which the inhabitants are taking every possible pains to preserve, by binding the large, broad, spreading branches, and connecting them with each other by strong belts and bars of iron. The State House, at one corner of the common, is on elevated ground, thirty feet higher than the street, from which a broad flight of steps leads to the great hall of fifty feet in length and breadth, and twenty high, which, with the treasurer, adjutant, and quartermaster general's offices, occupies the lower story. In a building attached to the basement story is a marble statue of Washington, executed by Chantrey, at a cost of 15,000 dollars, and considered, by those who knew the original at the time of life it is intended to represent, a most striking and admirable likeness. The figure is concealed by the Roman toga, supported over the breast by the left hand; while the right, pendent at the side, holds a scroll; it is placed upon a high pedestal, which (proh pudor!) is surrounded on every side by the stains of squirted tobacco juice. It is well that a strong iron railing prevents visitors from approaching within less than seven feet, or the statue itself would be barely sacred from such a filthy pollution. The second story contains the fine and spacious representatives' room, and senate chamber; from the dome, which is two hundred and thirty feet above the level of the sea, a most extensive view presents itself of the beautiful harbour and surrounding country. The exterior of the building, at a distance, is a striking object; but, upon closer inspection, it is found to be constructed merely of the common brick, painted white. The entrance being through an arched front, which supports a colonnade of Corinthian columns, extending ninety-four feet, the full length of the centre of the building has a handsome appearance, but the two wings, forty feet each in length, look extremely bare, and might be much improved in architectural beauty. The Masons' Hall, on the opposite side of the common, is a fine granite building, with Gothic windows and towers; and the Park church near it has a highly ornamental and light spire.

The New England Museum, which I had heard was the best in the States, contained a very poor collection; every thing in it appeared mere trash, excepting a Venus by Canova, two paintings by Vernet, and one by Opie. The Americans have a singular taste for wax figures in their museums; I had seen them exhibited at New York, but should have given the Boston people credit for possessing better taste. In this museum they were most wretched compositions, and some of them disgusting subjects. One represented a man (who had been lately executed for the crime) in the act of murdering another as he slept in bed. Others were "Queen Caroline of England, the Princess Charlotte, Siamese twins," &c.; and another was absurdly ridiculous: it represented the Goddess of America weeping over the tomb of Washington, upon which was an inscription, telling every reader, "whether an American or not, to behold with reverence and regret the tomb which contained the remains of the truest patriot, the best relative, and the kindest friend." The tomb was no more a model of the one at Mount Vernon than it was of the mausoleum of Hyder Ali at Seringapatam; and the goddess had such a rueful dirty countenance, from the damp which had caused the dust to collect in long streaks upon it, like the stripes of a zebra, that it was next to an impossibility to look at a figure without bursting into a fit of laughter. This same goddess, too, appears a great favourite in the museum, as there was a large daub of a painting in one of the rooms, representing a female in the attitude of holding a cup to an eagle which was hovering over her head, with the following inscription: "The goddess of America giving nourishment to the bald eagle, trampling the key of the Bastille under foot, and the British fleet leaving Boston," about which the lightning is playing, and shivering the topsails of the men of war in a most terrific manner.

The Faneuil Hall is an interesting old building, from the circumstance of its being the place where Hancock, Adams, and other revolutionary orators, addressed the populace and excited them to take up arms, after a small party of British soldiers had fired in their own defence upon some citizens, who (to quote the words of the American biographer) "had assailed the troops with balls of snow and other weapons." The original building, commenced in 1740, was the gift of a gentleman of the name of Faneuil to the city of Boston, but was partially destroyed by fire twenty years afterwards, and repaired in 1763. The lower story is now occupied by shops, but the hall is still in use for public meetings. Between it and the bay is the Faneuil Hall market, 530 feet in length, and 50 in width, built entirely of granite, upon ground reclaimed from the sea. The interior is divided into 128 stalls of most capacious dimensions, each furnished with a large sash window, and kept remarkably neat and clean, some even had smartly framed prints and other decorations in them. They are also divided according to the following order:—14 for mutton, lamb, veal, and poultry; 45 for beef; 19 for pork, lamb, mutton, and poultry; 4 for butter and cheese; 19 for vegetables; 2 for poultry and venison, and 26 for fish. The cellar story is occupied for stores and provisions, and the second ground story for two great halls, the centre of the building being surmounted by a dome. On each side of the market house, at 65 and 100 feet distant, are two fine rows of excellent shops, uniformly built of granite, and, being of the same length as the market, they present a remarkably handsome appearance. In rear of the Athenæum, which contains a well-selected library of 27,000 volumes and a collection of medals amounting to about 15,000, is the Gallery of Fine Arts; the lower story of the building is occupied by the Medical Society's Library, and the philosophical apparatus of the Mechanic's Institution; the upper by the exhibition of paintings, in which there are two very fine venerable heads of Washington and his wife, by Stuart, the only original portraits of them by that artist in America; they are upon plain canvass, and considered striking likenesses, but the pictures are in a very unfinished state, the figures not being even traced out.

In the navy yard, which is at Charleston (built on another peninsula, connected with Boston by bridges, and containing 7000 inhabitants), a most excellent dry dock is constructing. It is the only one in the country, and is formed of hewn granite upwards of 300 feet in length and 80 in width; the chamber intended for line-of-battle ships to lie in is 200 feet in length, by 18 or 20 in depth. It has double gates, an outer one being required to break the motion of the sea. Two line-of-battle ships and a large frigate were drawn up under cover of the sheds, and three other vessels of war lay alongside the pier. The vessels on the stocks were in the same state of forwardness as those at the other navy yards, and could be prepared for sea in a few weeks. Not a workman was employed about any of the three line-of-battle ships and four frigates which I saw on the stocks at Washington, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Charlestown, though much work was in progress connected with other branches of the navy. Within a short distance of the navy yard is Breed's Hill, upon which the memorable battle of the 17th of June, 1775, was fought; and generally known by the name of Bunker's Hill, which lies half a mile to the northwest, at the entrance of the narrow neck of the peninsula. Being sixty feet higher than Breed's Hill, it was the intention of the American general to defend it; but the officer entrusted with the charge of the troops, through some mistake, led them to the one on the point of the peninsula, within range of the British batteries upon Copp's Hill in Boston. The redoubt which they threw up during the night, being attacked the following day by the royal troops under the command of Generals Howe and Pigot, was carried with great slaughter, after a most determined resistance on the part of the revolutionists. In the redoubt, on the summit of the hill, and on the spot where General Warren fell, a monument was commenced on the 17th of June, 1825; the corner stone was laid by Lafayette, but was subsequently taken up and relaid, the foundation not being deep enough to resist the action of the frost. For the last three or four years no farther progress has been made, though the entire side of the hill is covered with the requisite materials; want of funds is the reason advanced for not finishing it; but a stranger would imagine that such a city as Boston might in itself contribute more than the requisite sum: at present it is but a monument of the inhabitants' want of spirit. The design is upon a grand scale; an obelisk of granite, 50 feet in diameter at the base, and 220 feet in height. No one would wish to deprive the Americans of the honour of their victories; but I never met one yet who did not claim Bunker's Hill as a splendid triumph over the British arms. In arguing the matter, I always referred them to their own histories of the war, which have the candour to acknowledge that the provincialists retired from the position, after making a resistance even longer than prudence admitted. The works of the Americans to this day prove how ably they blockaded the town, and a series of strong redoubts and entrenchments may be easily traced for a distance of fifteen miles, from Dorchester Heights on the margin of the bay to Winter Hill on the Mystic River.

Two miles from Charlestown is Harvard college, which was founded in 1637, and took its name from its first great benefactor, a minister, who bequeathed nearly 800*l.* to it. The general court of Massachusetts had appropriated the sum of 400*l.* towards its commencement in 1630, and the small but pretty town in which it is situated was called Cambridge, from many of the colonists having been educated at that university in England. It is more richly endowed than any other in the States, and, having property to the amount of about 600,000 dollars (125,000*l.*), is considered the most efficient for its purpose. A considerable income is derived from the bridges leading into the city, the proprietors of some of them being bound by their charters to pay a certain annuity to the college for the loss of the income derived from the ferries, which were its property. The halls, six in number, stand within an enclosure of eight or ten acres, thickly planted with trees. The university is a fine granite building, and of more modern date than the rest, which are of brick, and have rather an air of antiquity, arising from the thick wooden window sashes small square panes of glass, the numerous attics, and roof surmounted by a wooden balcony, or platform and railing.

The mill dam across Charles's River Bay is one of the most interesting objects near Boston; it is a continuation of Beacon street, which forms one side of the common, and connects the city with Brookline. The pier is of solid materials, and one mile and a half in length, cutting off upwards of 600 acres of land over which the tide formerly flowed, and by which means a great water power has been obtained. A second dam has been thrown at right angles from it to a point of land in Roxbury, dividing the 600 acres into two reservoirs of rather unequal proportions; and several mills have been erected upon this second dam whose wheels are kept in motion by sluice-ways from the upper reservoir. The long pier in the upper reservoir is furnished with six pair of floodgates, which, moving upon easy pivots, are opened at high water by the force of the tide, and close again at the ebb. The lower reservoir is also furnished with similar floodgates, which open at low and close at high water. Thus the mills have a fall of 14 feet from the upper reservoir (which is replenished every tide) into the lower one, which lets off the waste water at the lowest ebb. Charles River, also, flows into the upper reservoir, and supplies it so abundantly that when I was at the floodgates about half-ebb a vast quantity of superfluous water was rushing over them. The cost of the pier was 350,000 dollars (73,000*l.*) but does not appear to be very profitable stock, there not being more than twelve or fourteen mills, although there is space for one hundred upon it, and it has been finished eleven years.

The Tremont theatre, immediately opposite the hotel, and a very ornamental building, had closed for the season when I arrived; but, the fanaticism for which the New Englanders were formerly so barbarously notorious having softened down to true religious principles, the town now supports two or three theatres, though the first was built only thirty-six years since.

One afternoon seeing a funeral enter the Granary burial ground, adjoining the Tremont hotel, so called from the public bread store having formerly stood there, I followed it, and, walking up to a lofty granite obelisk surrounded by trees, discovered it was to the memory of Dr. Franklin's parents; it bore the following inscription:—

FRANKLIN.

"JOSIAH FRANKLIN, and ABIAH his wife, lie here interred. They lived lovingly together in wedlock 55 years, and without an estate, or any gainful employment, by constant labour and honest industry, maintained a large family comfortably, and brought up thirteen children and seven grand-children respectably; so, from this instance, reader, be encouraged to diligence in thy calling, and distrust not Providence.

He was a pious and prudent man.

She a discreet and virtuous woman.

Their youngest son, in filial regard to their memories, places this stone.

J. F. born 1655, died 1744, Æ. 89.

A. F. — 1667, — 1752, — 85.

The original inscription having been nearly obliterated, a number of citizens erected this monument as a mark of respect for the illustrious author.

MDCCCLXXVII."

Turning round, immediately after I had copied the above, which could not have occupied me five minutes, to my great surprise the funeral party had disappeared, and the gates were again locked; so I had no alternative but to climb the wall, and leap down some six or seven feet into the street, my sudden appearance in it astonishing some of the passers by.

The materials for building at Boston are excellent, there being almost inexhaustible quarries of granite at the small town of Quincy (the birth place of two of the presidents of the United States,) about nine miles from the city. The day I left the city, a melancholy accident occurred to a party of four gentlemen from the Tremont hotel, upon the inclined railway connected with the quarries, by the chain to which the car was attached suddenly breaking when it had arrived within a short distance of the summit; the carriage descended with amazing velocity until it struck some obstacle at the bottom, by which they were all thrown out with such violence that one was killed upon the spot, and the limbs of the other three were severely fractured.

Brattle street church, where I attended service, was occupied as a barrack during the siege, and Governor Hancock's name, who was one of its benefactors, is inscribed upon two of the corner stones of the tower, with the date of 27th July, 1772. One of the inscriptions bears the marks of having been nearly erased by the bayonets of the British; and a nine-pounder shot still remains in the tower where it struck, close to one of the windows. It was fired from the American lines the evening before the city was evacuated, and evidently intended for General Gage's quarters, which were in a house opposite the church.

Boston is often called "the paradise of clergymen," and never did a place possess such a proportion of churches; including Charlestown, it has not fewer than sixty; their style of architecture is generally neat. Trinity church, which has not been long built, is a handsome and substantial edifice, and king's chapel (or the stone church, as some of the republicans call it,) in which the British governor's pew still remains, more closely approach the English style of places for sacred worship than any others I saw. The hospitals and charitable societies are very numerous.

Leaving Boston on the 25th July through Brighton and Newton Lower-Falls, and to Westborough, over a fine sheet of water by means of a floating bridge, I arrived at the pretty town of Worcester late in the evening. The road ran through a country of rather improved fertility, and every stream was taken advantage of by some manufactory. Engineers were also busy along the whole line of it in surveying and marking out a railway which was projected from Boston to Albany, 160 miles, and thus a connected line of communication would be opened between Lake Erie and the Atlantic at Boston. From Worcester to Northampton the road passes through a fine bold country, but rocky and difficult of cultivation; the high lands and sides of the hills being set apart for pasture, and the valleys and along the banks of the rivulets, where the soil was of a more fertile quality, for the growth of grain. This state, with Connecticut and Pennsylvania, has the reputation of being better farmed than any other; the average produce being from 25 to 30 bushels of Indian corn, and from 18 to 20 of wheat. It struck me that the schools were much more numerous than in the other states I had visited, every district and village possessing one, which generally occupied a spot on the road side; the children were also remarkable for their decorum of manners, bowing and making curtsies to the passengers as the coach passed. I observed the same respect paid to well dressed people in most parts of the New England states, and also in the western part of the state of New York. In the first code which was passed by Connecticut in 1639, six years after the first settlement of the colony, it was ordered that every village of fifty families should maintain a good school for reading and writing; and the same law is also established in Massachusetts.

We had a charming view of the fine country, with Amherst college upon an eminence, from the summit of a hill a few miles before arriving at the village of Hadley, where the regicide judges lived after their retreat had been discovered at Newhaven. It is related that when the village was attacked, during Philip's bloody war of 1675, it would have probably shared the fate of Brookfield and other towns through which we passed on the road from Boston, but for the timely appearance of a venerable stranger, who by his skill in military tactics and encouragement to the troops repulsed the Indians. His immediate disappearance after the retreat of the enemy induced the superstitious inhabitants to consider that he was their guardian angel, and had been expressly sent to their assistance. It was Colonel Goff, who, in the emergency of the case, had ventured to leave his place of concealment in the cellar of the minister's house.

Between the village and the Connecticut river, two miles distant, are rich and beautiful meadows, unconfined by fences, but well planted with fruit trees, and being overflowed by the spring freshets, which leave a deposit, the land is as productive as any in the state. A wooden bridge, half a mile in length, crosses the river into the prettiest of American towns, Northampton. Northerly did I see such beautiful villages as in New England, of which Concord in New Hampshire, Worcester, and Northampton, rank pre-eminent. The situation of this is a charming one, in a rich country, upon a noble river, and steam navigation to the ocean. The streets are like any thing English. Frame houses possess neatness and cleanliness of appearance which it is impossible to impart to our heavy town abodes; and, as the forms of which they are built can be moulded into more elegant forms, the American houses are generally ornamented with light balconies and porticos, supported by columns of the Doric or Corinthian order. I thought Northampton the most delightful and enviable place I had ever seen: it is the very realisation of a "rus in urbe," the streets being so thickly planted with trees of a primeval growth that their boughs are almost interwoven across the road, and the neat private dwellings and shops beneath them appear like a series of cottages and gardens. The town has been settled nearly 180 years, and contains about 2000 inhabitants. On the opposite side of the river, which is crossed at South Hadley by a horse ferry, two miles distant, is Mount Holyoke, 1070 feet above the level of the river, and a favourite resort of travellers for parties of pleasure. Seven carriages, filled principally with ladies, arrived at the foot of the mountain at the same time as myself. The road winds along the side of, through a dense forest of trees, until within 400 feet of the summit, where it is necessary to dismount and clamber over rough loose stones and logs of wood for the remaining distance. But the scene which bursts upon the spectator's view, as he steps upon the bare black rock at the summit—a scene of sublime beauty, of which but an inadequate description could be conveyed—amply repays him for his trouble and fatigue. A more charming city could not have been desired: it was one of those clear American atmospheres which are unknown in our own hazy clime, with just sufficient light floating clouds to throw a momentary shadow over parts of the rich vale, which lay spread out beneath in all the various hues of a quickly ripening harvest. Innumerable white houses, and pines of churches, were seen scattered among the trees and along the banks of the smooth but rapid Connecticut, (up which a solitary steamer was slowly ascending,) which river in its fantastic and capricious windings returned within a few yards of the same spot, after covering two or three miles of the vale—or, after being concealed at intervals by the hills and woods, would again appear with its silvery surface glistening amidst the dark foliage at the distance of many miles. These objects, and, above all, the high and rocky mountains, contrasted with the smiling valleys, altogether formed one of the most magnificent panoramas in the world. Places 100 miles apart from each other were distinctly visible. I soon recognised the bluff rocks near Newhaven, at eight miles distance, though only 400 feet in height, and could easily trace their rugged and bold outline upon the distant horizon.

I had carried my pencils and sketch book up with me; but did not even presume to take them from my pocket. So, after having feasted my eyes for the space of an hour, I went into the small frame house which is on the summit, for something more substantial. The occupants or rather tenant, as he pays a rent of 100 dollars per annum for the spot of ground, might be an old sailor, from the extravagant price he charges for refreshments; but, in my opinion, his money is well earned, as he ascends the mountain daily from the village at its foot. The table in the room was covered with a number of books, misnamed albums, in which every visitor, who has been either in a sentimental, witty or meditative mood, has thought proper to record the workings of his mind, which were generally bombastic descriptions of the view, winding up with a mortal lecture. I sympathised deeply with one poor poet, who had departed from the usual line, with

"O great Olympus, fair Northampton's pride,
How hot it is to travel up thy side!
Hail mighty mount, grand beacon of our sphere!
I wonder how the d—l I got here!"

But many Smiths and Thompsons, more ambitious of transmitting their names to remotest posterity, had with laudable zeal engraven their names upon the hard rock. The descent is even more difficult than the ascent, being so precipitous.

Proceeding west, the road passes through a mountainous and only partially cleared country, with fine groves of noble hemlock, which appeared to be fast diminishing in number from the bark being used for tanning leather. We were five hours and a half upon the road from Northampton to Worthington, though only nineteen miles. From Pittsfield (where an agricultural show has been established upwards of twenty years, and takes place annually in October,) the road ascends a hill of considerable height. Being formed on the side of the hill, the foundation on the outer edge is made with trees laid close together, covered with earth, and no protection for a carriage against falling over the side, but some weak rails, generally composed of small trees laid horizontally in the fork of others fixed upright in the ground, forming a very inefficient fence against the precipice close to which the coach passes. I congratulated myself upon arriving safely at the summit with a fine view of the Catskill Mountains in the distance, and the village in the valley of Lebanon, two miles beneath us. The road was, however, even more steep than on the side we ascended; and having a heavy load on the coach, and as usual in America no slipper on the wheel, we descended the hill with such frightful speed that, whirling round a sharp turn (where the road too had an inclination outwards,) the vehicle lost its equilibrium, the passengers screamed out, and over it went. I would not at the moment have given half a dollar to insure all our lives. I saw the tops of the trees far below, and thought nothing could save us from perching amongst their branches. The rails gave way with a crash, when I was surprised by a sudden and violent shock, occasioned by the coach falling on the friendly stump of a tree which reeked us in our course. The vehicle in part overhung the precipice, carpet bags and mail bags, trunks and hat boxes, were to be seen rolling down the hill to a depth of 150 feet. Regulus of old could not have had so much uncomfortable descent in his barrel than we had, if the coach had been two or three feet higher on either side of the stump. There were eight passengers of no light weight inside, and I was one of the who were undermost. A strong voice called out to me, "Never mind, there's no one hurt." "Thank you," said a smothered tone, "but there a'int 'casion to ask for me, I guess." As soon as I could extricate myself from the confused mass of arms and legs, and amble out of one of the windows, I began to shake myself to discover what broken limbs I had; but finding a sprained thumb, ditto leg, and one or two contusions on the ribs, and that none of my companions were much more injured, I began to search for my baggage. We had just raised the shattered coach again, when the people who had seen it upset from the Lebanon ridge galloped up, expecting to find half the passengers killed; in an hour more I was in the Columbia hall tel.

CHAPTER XIV.

LEBANON SPRINGS—SHAKERS—ERIE CANAL—FALLS OF THE MOHAWK.

At Manchester, in England, this burning truth began, when Christ made his appearance in blessed Mother Ann. A few at first received it, and did their duty for him, and soon their testimony brought on a mighty shake.

For her safe protection, good angels flew before, provided a land of promise, Columbia's happy shore; the victorious Gospel, and that auspicious day when Mother safely in North America!

Memorial to Mother Ann.

In company at the Lebanon springs during the season is made up of the same kind of people as at Cheltenham, or any of our fashionable watering places. Some come to get rid of their daughters; others to get rid of their complaints; others, again, to avoid the sickness of the south; and the rest are composed of travellers, fortune-hunters, pleasure-seekers, and the odds and ends of society. The Shaker's village, two miles distant, proves a great attraction. On the 29th of July, I attended their Sunday meeting, which was held in a large building by the road-side, containing a finely proportioned room of eighty by sixty feet, with arched ceiling, well calculated for sound, and a beautifully white floor, with scarcely a knot upon its surface. There were two doors in the front of the room, the gentlemen visitors entering at the one and the ladies at the other, while the members of the society made their appearance separately also, the men by a door at the south and the women by one at the north end of the building. Elevated seats for the visitors occupied one side of the room, a rail dividing the two sexes. I sat very impatiently for three quarters of an hour before the society assembled, when they occupied two rows of benches facing each other, a slight opening between two boards in the floor forming the boundary line. The men were dressed in drab coats, quaker fashion, but with a rolling collar, old-fashioned dark waistcoats reaching as low as the hips, and gray trousers of striped cotton or linen, the hair cut short in front and allowed to grow a considerable length at the back of the head; the women in white gowns, with large muslin caps which concealed their profile, and high heeled shoes. Both sexes entered with a singular kind of springing step, as if walking upon the toes. The total number of members including two people of colour, might have been 250, of which 130 were males. Amongst them were 30 or 40 children from ten to fifteen years of age; the rest were from thirty to seventy; but I scarcely observed any who appeared between those two periods. Most of them entered without their coats, and, the day being warm, all had their waistcoats unbuttoned, so as to display a clean long white neckcloth and shirt, with a narrow piece of green riband encircling the arm above the elbow. The service commenced by the whole society rising and removing the benches to the side of the room. Both sexes then advanced towards the line of demarcation in a close column, showing a front of 16 by 8 deep, but in oblique lines, so that the feet of the two people on the inner flank were within a few inches of the boundary line, while those on the outer were six paces apart. An elder, stepping out, addressed them in a few words, standing with his back to the wall, his feet upon the line, and fronting the open space between the two parties. He spoke in so low a tone of voice that I could scarcely catch the import of his words, but understood him to say that "they had assembled there to pray," and recommending "suitable exercise;" when, resuming his place, the members sang a hymn, moving their feet in time with the air, which was a strange composition, equally unintelligible and monotonous as an Indian chant at the feast of the Mohorum, or a Burman boat song as I have heard it on the Irawaddi, to which it bore no slight resemblance. When it was concluded, they knelt in silence for a few minutes, and, after rising, another elder addressed us, saying, "He trusted we should behave with propriety and decency, as decent people ought, and recollect that we were in a house of worship, though we were not believers of the same faith;" an address, indeed, that was much required: for I could not divest myself of the idea that we were in a theatre, and, had any one set the example, I have but little doubt there would have been a boisterous round of applause. In truth we were but mere spectators; none took any part in the service, but remained as immovable and attentive to the proceedings before them as they would if viewing any novelty in a place of public amusement. The rest of the men now divested themselves of their coats, hanging them upon pegs in the wall, and each of the women laid the white handkerchief she had held in her hand upon the benches; indications that they were about to set to in good earnest. Two rows of about forty persons stood with their backs to the wall, the remainder forming a column fronting them at some distance. The former party struck up a lively air with some words attached to it (all that I could distinguish were, "I will be truly good," frequently repeated,) and the latter commenced dancing in correct time, advancing three steps; then balancing three and retiring again, advanced as before, turning round at intervals in the tune in a style which a quadrille dancer might even be proud of. The singers throughout the time kept their arms close to their bodies, with the lower part of them projecting out, and moving their hands up and down (I hope I shall be excused for making an absurd but striking simile) like so many kangaroos standing upon their hind legs. Upon the whole, it was a most singular scene: old and young were dancing away without their coats, as if it had been a matter of life and death; while the room, containing not fewer than six or seven hundred people, was hot to suffocation. Though the women exerted themselves most laboriously, they were (owing to their dress, I presume) as pale and ghastly as so many shrouded bodies or living corpses,—an appearance they wished to assume, I should imagine, as not being very inviting to the eyes of "the world's people," as they term us old-fashioned folks. I overheard one of a party of young men sitting in rear of me, who could not at all contain themselves, say, "he had seen an Egyptian mummy look handsomer than any of them." I could not, however, agree with him upon that score; for there were two or three pair of very pretty dark eyes, with some finely-formed features. One young girl, in particular, about eighteen or twenty years of age, who paid much more attention to the spectators than to her devotions, would doubtless have been well pleased to regain her former place in the world. She was in the last row of females, so that no one could overlook her motions; and all the young people were similarly disposed of. Those who formed the first row, and who were confronted face to face with the men, were the oldest and ugliest of the party: a dangerous post like this was not assigned to young people, with such eyes as interpreters, an elopement having occasionally taken place, much to the dismay of the elders. A respectable, middle-aged man, who had received the visitors and shown them to their seats with great civility, took no part in the performance of the above ceremonies, but passed his time in observing the effect such a singular show had upon the audience. After the society had finished their first dance and song, he came up directly in front of me, and said "he had seen two or three young men talking and laughing, as if they were in a theatre or ball room." All eyes were turned instantly in my direction; but, fortunately for my credit, the speaker particularised them, and I discovered they were the "Egyptian mummy" party. He continued his lecture by telling them, "if they wished to laugh, to walk out upon the floor, and allow every one to see them; if they had any thing to say, let every one hear what it was; that the rest of the visitors had behaved respectfully and with propriety, and had his thanks for so doing; but, that for these young men, they conducted themselves worse than heathens, who have some respect for the religion of others; that they deserved reprimanding, and that he reprimanded them accordingly." The young men looked much abashed, and took an early opportunity of retiring. The society afterwards formed a column of five in front, with fourteen members in the centre of the room, who sang some words to a tune like "Yankee doodle," the column stepping off at quick time, and marching round the room as correctly as any well-drilled battalion, changing step when necessary, and, if any one fell out in front, his place was immediately occupied by some one from the rear. They beat time by moving their hands up and down as before described, clapping them in certain parts of the tune. After thus marching round several times, they halted, and, the inner files of two facing about, a brisk air was struck up, and they moved off again in different directions, circling round the room, halting and singing in the slow parts of the air; then quickening their pace almost to a run at the more lively parts. Altogether I scarcely ever saw so difficult or so well-performed a field-day. They had been evidently well drilled, or they could not have acquired such skill in manœuvring; for there was such a series of marching and countermarching, slow step, quick step, and double-quick step, advancing and retiring, forming open column and close column, perpendicular lines and oblique lines, that it was sufficient to puzzle and confound the clearest head of the lookers on.

After a hard hour's work, the first speaker, who had requested us "to behave with decency," again came forward and spoke to the following effect: "Friends, I wish to say a few words to you. No doubt what you have seen to-day appears vastly strange—a mode of worshipping the Almighty altogether new to you; and I am not surprised that it should appear strange. 'The way of the Lord is foolishness with man.' I asked your attention and good conduct before we commenced; some few have not behaved well—far from it indeed, but I am not even surprised at that. They probably despised us and laughed at us in scorn and derision. We, however, are satisfied; we well know that we are in the right path, that the Lord is pleased and is reconciled with us. Works speak for themselves, and the tree is known by its fruit; we therefore fear not the taunts of men. There are, however, so many sects, so many various forms of religion, so many crying out 'this is the right way,' and 'this is the right way,' that those seeking the truth scarcely know which way to turn; but if you wish to be saved, if any of you feel you have need of salvation (and 'the physician is only required by the sick') it is here only to be found—this is the only true path; amongst these only, these the true disciples of Christ, who follow his glorious example in taking up a daily cross, and denying themselves the things of this world. I have no doubt some of you despise us, and that all of you profess to be religious, and all nearly determine upon repenting of your sins, and leading a new life; but day after day is this hour of reformation put off. It is delayed time after time until some more convenient opportunity. We desire your happiness, we pray for your good, but we cannot flatter you—not one of you will be saved, unless you abstain from the lust of the flesh, all sin and worldly desires, and shun the eye, the pride of life—the eye, the pride of life."—The speaker here became quite violent, stamping with his feet, and holding out his clenched hand while he repeated the last sentence, looking hard at the lady spectators. "Whence arises all sin, all deadly and barbarous wars?—whence this sickness which now desolates the land? Let those, then, who wish to be saved, forsake those things which separate the soul from God. Cease to do evil, and you will learn to do good; imitate us in taking Christ for a pattern, and you will then assuredly find salvation."

His address lasted about twenty minutes, and was delivered with great energy; but he was an illiterate man, and could scarcely speak correct English—evidently labouring, too, under great difficulty from want of words to express himself, and his whole discourse abounded with tautology. I was rather alarmed lest he should observe me taking notes of his lecture; for, had he only cast eyes upon me, I should have received no gentle reprimand. After another song, the meeting broke up, having lasted an hour and an half.

I had some conversation immediately afterwards with one of the elders, who appeared a sensible well-informed man. He stated that the society at this village consisted of 600 people, but that not more than a third ever attended service together, excepting once a year, when all assembled. In answer to my enquiries, he said that they had received an addition of 100 members within the last two years, many of whom were English. I had observed two very stout, ruddy faced, farmer-looking men, who, he said, had only just arrived from my native country. One was the very prototype of Friar Tuck, and it would be a considerable time before he exchanged his fat cheeks for the long demure face of the rest of the society. The other danced round the room, swinging his hands about, and bellowing at the full extent of his voice, as if he was still tripping it at some English village wake. 'Tis said "there is nothing new under the sun;" but it seems strange that such fanaticism should exist with so much zeal and good religious feeling.

The village is remarkable for the neatness and cleanliness of the houses. The school is well conducted, and the children educated in it generally possess a superior education to those elsewhere. After acquiring the age of maturity, they are under no obligation to remain with the society, but are free to return to the world; nor are they allowed rashly to enlist under the banners of "the believers," but must seriously take the matter into consideration, and even undergo a novitiate of some months, when, if still of the same opinion, they are admitted and enjoy the same privileges as the other members. At any time indeed they may withdraw, but cannot claim any compensation for the time they may have worked upon the lands of the society, nor should they have thrown property into the common stock, can they reclaim it, though none that have as yet withdrawn have gone away empty-handed. The principal rules of the society are celibacy, non-interference with politics, peace with all mankind, and paying to every man his due; nor will they be answerable for the debts of any of the society, or admit any one as a member who has not honestly discharged all his pecuniary debts. No one, except in case of sickness or infirmity, is allowed to become a burthen on the society; but all must work, and all property is in common, the fruits of their labour being thrown into a general fund. The women are employed in knitting gloves, making fancy ornaments, and spinning, while the men follow various trades, the goods being exposed for sale at the trustee's office: every article is of the best quality, but the price is exceedingly high. The women who sold me what few things I bought used as many persuasives as the most experienced shopkeeper in England, with the true "will you look at this, sir?—this is an excellent article," and "these gloves wear remarkably well; you had better take a pair, sir." They possess about three thousand acres of well cultivated land adjoining the village, and extensive gardens for rearing seeds, which produce a considerable income, being in great demand throughout the States. The society is governed by two elders of each sex, elected by the members. Their duty is to give information to candid enquirers, and to admit those who desire to unite themselves to the society; also occasionally to preach the gospel. The entire body is divided into families from 80 to 100 members each, who again appoint two elders as their head, whose duty it is to manage the temporal concerns of the family. Their houses are large, commodious, and substantial brick buildings, four stories in height.

The society is also divided into three classes: 1st, those who do not assent to the rule of celibacy, but reside at a distance from the village with their own families, attending worship, and otherwise conforming to the rules. 2dly, Those who are members, but can return to the world's people whenever they think fit; and 3dly, those who, vowing to remain members in perpetuum, have entirely given themselves up as followers of the faith. They all live in a remarkably comfortable manner, even well, in the sense of the world, with whose people, whoever, they will not eat in company; but, when some of them rode up to the springs in a car, they showed that they possessed a taste for the good things of this life, as well as the rest of mankind, by sitting down, taking a glass of brandy and water, smoking, and conversing cheerfully. Two or three backslidings have occurred amongst the young members, who have eloped, proving they were not invulnerable to the shafts of that little urchin Cupid; and I shrewdly suspect that many others would not be at all backward in following the same example, did but an opportunity occur. The sect, however, gains ground considerably, and there are not fewer than 5000 Shakers in the United States, though it is but fifty-nine years since Mrs. Lee, or "Mother Ann," as she is called, emigrated from England. She was a native of Manchester, and married to a blacksmith in that town, and is considered the founder of that sect, though several people had formed themselves into a society following the same mode of worship as early as 1747. She was an illiterate woman, unable either to read or write. The cruel persecutions she suffered in England, on account of her religious opinions, induced her to embark, with her husband and others of the same persuasion, for America, in 1774, where she established herself, near Albany, twenty-five miles from Lebanon, removing to the latter place some few years after, and dying in 1784, in her forty-eighth year. Lebanon is now the head of the Shaking church. That such a sect is not well calculated for a young and thinly-inhabited country is self-evident; for though, by their sobriety, good faith, honest and upright conduct, they set an example to the rest of mankind worthy of imitation, and most of their regulations are founded upon highly moral and admirable principles, yet others are fallacious, and the argument upon which they rest is altogether untenable. They hold that the millennium has commenced, and that all the human race is to be extinct by conforming to their first great precept of celibacy. Without such a fundamental rule, indeed, such a society could not long exist. Professing to be close imitators of Christ, they are far from it. The Saviour of the world went about doing good, exposing himself to the ingratitude of those he served, and at last, for their sakes, suffering an ignominious and painful death; while they, who pretend to take him as a pattern, lead an easy and comfortable life, and seem chiefly occupied in adding to their worldly riches, while their charity is bounded by the chain of hills which encircle their settlement. That such a society should exist for a day, in the present intellectual state of the world, is truly astonishing; but "nil admirari" appears to be the motto of common sense. The society is composed chiefly of ignorant and illiterate people, and of many who have been disappointed in life, and have thus withdrawn themselves from the rest of mankind, unable to bear up and strive against the adversities of their lot as true Christians.

The temperature of the water at the wells is 73° Fahrenheit; it is pleasant to the taste, and, being devoid of almost every medicinal quality or saline taste, is used as common beverage. From chemical analysis, two quarts are said to contain—Muriate of lime, 1.00 gra. Muriate of soda 0.75; Sulphate of lime 1.50; Carbonate of lime 0.57.

It boils up in the gardens of the hotel in sufficient quantity to supply the requisite baths, and is afterwards used for setting in motion the wheels of three manufactories. I was much amused by seeing a large party of ladies and gentlemen, fresh arrivals, assemble round the spring one evening, tasting the water and passing their opinion upon its merits, some even refusing to put the glass to their lips, fearing the effects of a draught, when they had been taking plentiful potions of the same at the dinner table.

The evenings were usually passed in dancing except on Saturday, the Sabbath commencing with music of the New Englanders at sunset on the preceding day. The band consisted of two negroes playing on violins, and a third upon a bass. The leader of the stable trio (a barber, by the by, composing part of the establishment of the house) acted as a kind of maitre du ballet, crying out "Balanciey!"—"tan your partners!"—"La's eben!" and other jargon, utterly unintelligible even to those who were acquainted with the figure of every quadrille. The ladies' dancing was a composition of walking, running, and shuffling; the gentlemen acquiesced themselves as well as gentlemen generally do. I overheard one who prided himself a good deal on his manner of waltzing round the room, say that he had "the best waltzing master in Paris, last winter."

Amongst other resources for killing time at the springs, nine-pins bore a prominent part. I accompanied some gentlemen to the alley one day for the purpose of playing, when, our number on each side being equal, one of the party (a young collegian from Lehigh) invited a gentlemanly-looking man to join us in a rubber; he consented to play a single game, but some hesitation, and came off winner. At dinner I heard a voice familiar to my ear say, from behind my chair, "What will you take, sir?" and turning round saw our friend of the morning acting in capacity of waiter; he certainly possessed a more intellectual reticence than two thirds of the people at table.

Feeling myself sufficiently recovered to undergo the dislocating motion of the road, and all my acquaintances at the springs taking their departure, I also stepped into the coach on the morning of the 1st of August, and, being the only passenger, imagined I should have a quiet easy journey, but soon found myself egregiously mistaken. There not being sufficient weight to steady the vehicle on its clumsy springs, it was tossed to and fro like a ship in a gale of wind. We passed through the small manufacturing towns of Nassau and Altia. Some singular signs in the latter attracted my attention; especially, of "Miss Simms, Tailoress," emblazoned in large characters upon a board against the house—this struck me as a novel mode of a lady earning a livelihood.

The entrance to the city of Troy, twenty-five miles from Lebanon, through an excavated rock, which forms part of the classically named Mount Ida, is exceedingly pretty. The city, containing about 1200 inhabitants, occupies an alluvial plain of some extent between the mountain and the Hudson River. Having some spare time, I walked through several of the streets, and visited the Episcopal Church, which has a very tasteful Gothic tower: one of the prettiest specimens of architecture I saw in the United States; but the body of the church, not being built in unison with it, gives the entire the air of a piece of patch-work. An elegant new apartment-house was completed, with the exception of its portico, in a street adjoining the church; but it bore too strong a resemblance to the United States Bank at Philadelphia, of which I had since seen so many imitations, to have many charms for me. The temple was entirely of white marble, and modelled after the temple of Theseus at Athens. The gallant "Trojan" as the inhabitants call themselves, were partially the cause of the New York panic, and leaving the city in a state of account of a few cases of cholera being reported.

The river, which is about a quarter of a mile wide, is crossed by a horse-ferry to the village of Watertown, where "Mother Ann" originally established herself; and a few miles farther the road passes the houses of some married Shakers, belonging to the Niskayuna settlement, three miles to the southwest. From this point to Schenectady the country is dull, uninteresting in its scenery, and devoid of habitations; but now, having gained the banks of the Mohawk River, a rich and soil presents itself. There is but little worthy of notice in the town, excepting Union College, on an eminence near the road from Troy. Only two large buildings, forming part of what is intended, are at present erected; but several more are to be immediately added, and, the adjoining grounds being spacious, it promises to become a pretty spot. The college has been very liberally endowed by the state to the amount of 300,000 dollars, and the number of students at this time is about 200. Dr. Nott, the president, is not only a good classical scholar, but an excellent and persevering mechanic. Some of his inventions have even gained a considerable name in England, amongst which is an improvement in hot air stoves for heating cathedrals and large buildings. He has expended also large sums of money in experiments upon steam-vessels; several of which are constructing upon his plan of having twenty small boilers, instead of two or four large ones, and are considered safer than those generally in use, and equally swift. After passing two hours in Schenectady, I entered the packet boat on the Erie Canal, and proceeded at the rate of four miles an hour, on a line parallel with the Mohawk. This immense work, which connects the waters of the Hudson with those of Lake Erie, was commenced in 1817, at the suggestion of De Witt Clinton, at that time governor of the state of New York. The packet boats, as on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, are large and well furnished with excellent sleeping berths, and the charge very reasonable, being only three cents per mile, breakfast and dinner being provided on equally moderate terms; so that the travelling is rendered more agreeable and almost as speedy as upon the rough turnpikes.

I varied my mode of travelling by leaving the boat sometimes at the locks, and walking on, being able at a moderate pace to keep a-head of it. Upon arriving at the first lock, we found more than twenty boats waiting for their turn to pass through; but all were obliged to give way to our vessel, which, paying a higher toll, claimed priority of passage. The legality of this preference did not, however, appear to be at all comprehended by the passengers in the other boats, nor did they submit to it without murmuring, thinking (as they said) that all boats "were alike free and equal." We had only ten passengers, although there was ample accommodation for forty. We experienced an hour's delay during the night, from the horses of a vessel a-head of us breaking loose, and galloping down upon our train, which, throwing their driver head foremost into the canal, followed the example of the others by breaking the tow rope and scampering off, leaving the man rolling about, half stunned, in the water.

In the morning we had a dense fog, not uncommon on the banks of the Mohawk, and which, as is frequently the case elsewhere, was the forerunner of a very hot day. The country through which we passed was pretty well diversified with hills and rich meadows of Indian corn on the banks of the stream, and the farmers were every where employed in reaping or cradling the grain on the uplands. As the canal approaches the little falls of the Mohawk, fifty miles from Schenectady, the scenery improves, and has some claims to picturesque. I had heard so much in praise of it that I stepped out of the boat at the first lock, half a mile from the village, not only for the purpose of viewing but of sketching some of this far-famed scenery, and walked past it all, momentarily expecting to come upon something excessively grand and sublime, so much had I been deceived by exaggerated description! Although very pretty, no part of it can vie with Matlock in Derbyshire. There is one bend in the canal which winds round the rocky mount, and under some dark bleak, impending crags, with the noisy torrent of the Mohawk washing its base, and the spires of the village churches with a fine aqueduct visible through the excavation, which would form a pretty sketch, but nothing to warrant the overdrawn descriptions given me. Having to pass through five locks in succession, we had time to cross the aqueduct to the village on the opposite side of the river, which is becoming a manufacturing town of some importance, from the great water-power afforded by the falls. Its progress and prosperity have been considerably retarded for some years, owing to the most valuable and useful ground being the property of a gentleman in England, who did not dispose of it until last year, when it was purchased by a company, who are proceeding rapidly in the construction of numerous manufactories. Large pieces of rock in the river here present a singular appearance, from being worn perfectly hollow and round like a caldron, the shell or rim, as it were, being reduced in many parts to a few inches in thickness. Other rocks are bored through in circles with a smooth surface as if they had been chiseled or worked out with an auger. These effects are supposed to have been produced by small pebbles having lodged in an orifice in the rock, and been agitated by the eddies and force of the current, until they increased the opening sufficiently to admit larger stones, which, in process of time, formed these singular excavations.

From the Little Falls, the canal passes through Herkimer or German Flats, a fine rich tract of country, with farms varying from one hundred and fifty to two hundred acres, at about one hundred dollars per acre, yielding from twenty-five to thirty bushels of wheat, or from sixty to one hundred bushels of Indian corn. At Frankfort, a few miles further, it does not exceed from twenty to fifty dollars, the soil appearing rich and fertile, but in a poor state of cultivation. The farming of the Dutch on the flats forms a striking contrast to that of their slovenly neighbours. At this last village, "the long level" commences, the canal running a distance of sixty-nine miles to the town of Syracuse, without a single intervening lock.

At five o'clock in the afternoon we entered Utica, eighty miles from Schenectady, having been twenty-two hours on our journey, and stepped from the canal into the United States Hotel, where we were accommodated with excellent rooms.

CHAPTER XV.

FALLS OF TRENTON—MAIL BAGS—NAMES.

Having hired one of the four-wheeled carriages known at Philadelphia as a "dearborn," in the eastern states as a "carryall," and in Utica as a "wagon," a friend (Mr. B.) and myself started at eight o'clock on the 3d of August upon an excursion to the Trenton Falls. The road being rough and mountainous, and the day excessively hot, we pulled up at a small tavern, eight miles from the town, to give the horse some water. While I was holding the bucket, mine host came out, and, after looking on quietly for some time without tendering his assistance, he observed that we "had better let the beast stand in the shade a minute or two until it became cool, and then it would proceed more cleverly on the journey." I understood him immediately, and determining to accept the challenge, led the horse into the shade of the house, when the following conversation ensued, much to the amusement of my companion, who did not at first comprehend our host's manœuvre.

Landlord. "You are from the southward, I guess."

Myself. "No—from Utica."

"Aye, but you don't keep there, I reckon."

"No, in the southward."

"Aye, I guessed so; but whereabouts?"

"Oh! south of Washington."

"Ah! pretty sickly there now?"

"No, pretty smart."

"But there's tarnation little travelling now; last fall this here road was quite unpassable, but now I have been fixing it myself, expecting company, and no one comes."

"You will have them all here when the cholera panic has subsided a little."

"I don't know that; I heard a gentleman, who had been in the south, say the other day that there was very little money there now; the southerners wouldn't care a fig for the cholera, they'd clear out tarnation soon if they had plenty of money to spare; ain't it so?"

I had now put one foot on the step of our vehicle, but mine host was not yet satisfied, so he followed me up with—"But you are going to the west, I expect?"

"Perhaps we may."

"Aye, you came down the canal."

"Yes."

"That's fine travelling; that's what I like; you push along so slick, there's no chance of getting one's neck broke as there is aboard those stages on the rough turnpikes; if the boat sinks, one's only up to one's knees in water. You'll see the falls?"

"We are going there now; which is the way?" So, receiving the necessary directions, we wished this true specimen of an American pot-house keeper good morning, and drove on, subsequently finding his parting words prophetic. Though the Yankees are so notoriously inquisitive, yet there is nothing disrespectful in their manner; nor did I ever feel annoyed by their asking such prying questions, generally leading them "considerably on the wrong trail," as they would say, or else, having satisfied them, commencing a cross-examination, to which they always submitted with good grace.

After a pleasant ride of fourteen miles, we arrived at the hotel, a short distance from the village of Trenton, and proceeded immediately to view the falls, which commence within two hundred yards of the house, though entirely concealed from it by a thick intervening forest. To see them to advantage, it is necessary to descend a rocky precipice nearly one hundred feet perpendicular, into the ravine along which the dark stream winds its course. Scarcely any thing can be conceived more grand or picturesque than the first view of the surrounding objects after the visiter has gained the rocky, and, at this season, dry bed of the winter's torrent. I have seen many falls, but none possessing such a variety of scenery or differing so much in the formation of the cataract as these; and of their sublimity but a very faint idea can be conveyed from description. The impetuous rush of water during successive ages has worked a bed for itself through a ridge of lime-stone rocks, which extends from the Mohawk to the northward as far as the St. Lawrence; but in several places it appears to have encountered a roof of harder materials, which has been able to withstand the force of the torrent. There are several of these ledges, occupying an extent of about two miles, over which the stream is precipitated. Of these the High Falls are the finest, being one hundred and nine feet in height, including a small intervening slope, which breaks the perpendicular fall, and, dividing it into two cataracts, renders it more picturesque than if falling in one unbroken sheet.

The Americans possess a most singular taste for marvelling the beauty of every place which can boast of any thing like scenery, by introducing a bar-room into the most romantic and conspicuous spot. Consequently there is a little white, painted wooden shanty perched upon the very brow of the High Fall, from which all kinds of liquors are distributed to the Yankee admirers of nature, after they have undergone the overpowering fatigue of walking four hundred yards from the hotel. It proved an insurmountable barrier to the further progress of a large party, who had flocked round me, passing the most candid and unconcerned opinions possible upon my efforts at delineating the scenery. Numerous fossil organic remains are visible in the lofty banks which bound the ravine; and the formation of the singular holes on the rocks, similar to those at the Little Falls of the Mohawk, is here seen actually in process. Many are formed by the backwater of the rapids. One, called the "Rocky Heart," from its striking resemblance to the common representation of the seat of life, has been made by two of these oddies. The water rushing over a slight fall proceeds on its course for fifteen or twenty feet, when arriving at a narrow pass, the bottom or point of the heart as it were, it separates in the centre, returning back to the full on each side of the river's bed, and has thus washed away the rock into a circular chasm. Adjoining is a natural well, called "Jacob's Kettle," about six feet deep, and three in diameter. The bottom is covered to some depth with round pebbles, which have been deposited there during the floods, and been employed in forming the kettle.

The width of the ravine, through which the stream takes its course, varies from one to three hundred yards. At the lower end, where the bed is formed of a smooth level rock, walking is as safe and agreeable as upon any well laid pavement: but at the upper it contracts to a narrow pass, and the rocks rising in a smooth perpendicular mass, the passage is rendered rather dangerous; and few people attempt to pass the Rocky Heart, the path not exceeding six inches in width, the water being of a pitchy blackness, forty feet deep.

Having passed some very agreeable hours at this enchanting spot, we again stepped into our dearborn, carry-all, or wagon, and, turning our backs upon Trenton and its delightful scenery, arrived at the summit of a long hill five miles from Utica, without any adventures, or incident, worth recording. Upon gaining this height, the sun was drawing nigh to the horizon, and casting a mellow tint over the extensive landscape, which was beautifully interspersed with all the requisites to form an attractive scene. I was about expressing my admiration, when seeing the long steep descent down which I, as whip, was to guide our vehicle, my thoughts were immediately diverted elsewhere, and I observed (having the upset at Lebanon uppermost in my imagination) that "I should not like to descend such a hill in a heavy coach." My companion answering, that "the Americans despised drag-chains and slippers," I was about to exemplify the truth of his remark by giving him a full and true account of my misfortunes the preceding week, when I felt the carriage pressed too much upon the horse, and attempted to check it, but in vain; for owing to some accident or mistake at the hotel, a strap upon the collar of the harness had given way, so that the horse, unable to keep the carriage off his legs, became frightened and set off at full gallop, kicking most violently, to the imminent danger of our legs. Mr. B. lifted his upon the seat in the first instance, and then, wisely thinking "discretion the better part of valour," lifted his whole body out behind (knocking my hat over my eyes in the hurry of his movements,) but, not being able to relinquish his hold of the vehicle immediately, he cut up the rough road, with his knees, like a plough, for a considerable distance; or, as he afterwards more classically compared it, like Hector dragged by the car of Achilles round the walls of Troy. When freed from his additional weight, I was carried along with the rapidity of a whirlwind; the foot-board splintering in all directions from the incessant battering of the horse's heels. A broad deep ditch ran upon either side of the road, so, perceiving if I attempted to overturn myself in either direction, I should be dashed with great violence upon the ground, and remembering the cautious advice Pheton received from the old gentleman, his father, when he drove the fiery car, "medio tutissimè ibis," I kept in the middle of the road, pulling hard upon the reins to prevent the horse falling down. I knew that a serious obstacle opposed me at the foot of the hill, in the shape of a narrow bridge over a deep and broad ravine, with a deep stream, where I might even meet with the fate of the above worthy himself; so I dashed the horse at a high rail and fence at a turn of the road, where a temporary bridge crossed the ditch. He seemed to comprehend me; for over we went, after a vast heaving and rolling, a kind of tottering doubt whether we should capsize or not, which would have ejected any thorough landman from his seat. The strong wall brought us to a sudden check. I was from my seat in an instant, at the head of the horse, who was striving to scramble over it; but he soon desisted, having, like myself, had quite enough of such work in the last half mile. Mr. B. was still far away, peering through the clouds of dust, to see what had become of me, fearing the result of my rapid descent. He was much cut and bruised, as was the horse from kicking the wagon, and vice versa. I alone escaped uninjured, being but a sufferer in the purse, from the compensation we were obliged to make the owner of the steed and vehicle, for injuries received. In my case the names of the two places "Lebanon Shakers," and "Trenton Falls," are incongruous; they should be the "Trenton Shakers," and "Lebanon Falls;" as such I shall ever remember them, and with them the recollection of my shaking in the wagon, and upsetting in the coach, will always be associated.

The above accident detained us a few days at Utica, Mr. B. being too unwell to proceed on his journey; but the cause could scarcely be regretted, since we had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of an eminent barrister residing in the town, who had been one of our fellow-passengers from Schenectady, and from whom we received much kind attention.

The town or city of Utica, as I believe it is now called, occupies a gentle slope, rising to the west, from the banks of the Mohawk, and until the commencement of the canal was an inconsiderable place, with a population of about 3000. Since the completion of that work, it has augmented to 10,000 souls, and is daily on the increase. The line of canal, which eight years since was on the outskirts, now passes directly through the centre of the city, giving it a pleasing appearance, to which the innumerable wooden bridges with their light open railing greatly contribute. The inhabitants are well aware of its rising importance, predicting already that the state government will be removed from Albany, and that the future laws will emanate from their capitol, whose site they have marked out in a square at the upper end of the city, on a rising eminence, whence its dome will be seen by the surrounding country for forty miles. The streets are also laid out in a style befitting the capital of the most populous state in the Union. As a central situation it is more convenient than Albany, which is on the very confines of the state, and three hundred miles from the inhabitants of the western parts of it. A stranger, seeing no manufactories or large mercantile establishments in Utica, finds it difficult to account for its rapid increase, until he discovers that every stream from the neighbouring hills is covered with such speculations, and the margin of every creek is peopled. The goods being transported from the town, it derives all the benefit, without any of the inconvenience, arising from numerous manufactories.

At Whitesborough, in the vicinity of the city, is the singular but laudable "Oneida Institution of Science and Industry," which, similar to some institutions in Switzerland, combines learning with manual labour. It was first established by a clergyman in bad health, who, opening a small school ten years since, discovered that, by the pupils' working for a few hours daily, they earned sufficient money to defray the expense of their education. Since that time it has been much encouraged and had several benefactors. There is a farm, containing upwards of one hundred acres, attached to it, upon which the students may be seen working for three or four hours daily; and two years' produce will pay their board for that time. This mode of obtaining an education has been found entirely practicable, and it is principally intended for those designed for the church, but some are also educated for other professions. The merit of the institution, independently of that derived from the system, is, that young men of talent may obtain an education here who cannot afford to go to more expensive establishments. Upon the whole, from the prevalence of mercantile pursuits, there are but few places for classical education in the States, compared with England.

On Sunday, the 5th of August, we attended divine service at the Dutch Reformed Protestant Church, the minister of which, Mr. Bethune, a Scottish gentleman, is in high repute as an eloquent and a powerful preacher. We were much pleased with his manner, which was that of the majority of American ecclesiastics, and preferred it to that of the English. The sermon being delivered in a more familiar and colloquial style, and with great earnestness of manner, was well calculated to rivet the attention of the congregation. In America the compact is between the congregation and minister, as between master and servant, or tradesman and customer, so long as they agree and suit each other. The clergyman's salary in small towns is generally 1000 dollars per annum, which is sufficient for people who are expected to debar themselves the active pursuits of the rest of mankind. But in cities and populous places, where the duty is more severe, it varies from 1500 to 2500, which is raised by a tax upon the congregation, or (as in New York) from grants of land made prior to the revolution. In a presbyterian church, which we attended in the afternoon, the pews were originally sold at two hundred and eighty each, and the annual tax was nineteen dollars and fifty cents, the organist and leader of the orchestra alone receiving small salaries, in addition to the minister. The floor of this church was on an inclined plane, so that each pew was more elevated than the one in front, the pulpit being under the organ-loft at the lower end of the building. After service, we visited the Sunday school on the ground-floor under the church, where, from the minister having made frequent allusions to "Samuel James Mills, the founder of Sabbath schools," we expected to see one of a superior order, but were disappointed. There seemed great room for improvement. The school consisted of about one hundred and eighty boys, and a voluntary teacher to each class of six or eight boys. Before we departed, the superintendent (an editor of a newspaper) requested us to address the children, but appeared satisfied with an answer, that "our qualifications were not in that line." For my own part, I was rather at a loss to comprehend his meaning, until he rose and delivered a long extempore prayer for the prosperity of the school.

The state of New York has a permanent school-fund, of the enormous amount of a million and a half of dollars, which originally arose from the sale of land; and the proceeds, being laid out to interest, in time accumulated to so large a sum that the annual distribution is now 120,000 dollars, and as much more is raised in the state by contributions; so that nearly a quarter of a million is yearly expended by this one state in promoting knowledge amongst the people, very few of whom have not received a useful education. Connecticut is the only state in the Union which possesses the same powerful means: its fund arose from a vague charter granted by the King of England, soon after the establishment of the American colonies, to Lord Say and Sele and Lord Brook in 1631, by which the state of Connecticut was bounded, east by the Naraganset river, south by Long Island sound, north by Massachusetts, and extended west to the Pacific Ocean. By this document it claimed the right of extending its rule over tracts of land which were unexplored at the time the charter was granted, and which included a considerable portion of Pennsylvania and New York. These two states resisted the claim, but compromised the matter after the revolution, by obtaining for Connecticut the grant of certain lands in Ohio, which, being sold, produced the sum of 1,200,000 dollars. This sum was, in the first instance, to be appropriated for the propagation of the gospel, but subsequently was formed into a school-fund; and thus one of the smallest states in the Union distributes an annual sum amongst the several districts, for the support of education, considerably exceeding the state tax on the inhabitants; and the most singular instance is presented of a government, after all its expenses have been defrayed, returning to the citizens more than the amount they have been taxed. In those districts which receive assistance from this fund, it is required that the same amount should be raised by contribution. New York imitated Connecticut in adopting the same system, and ordaining that the proceeds of all unsold or unappropriated lands should be added to the school-fund, which will increase it at least to the amount of another million of dollars. In Massachusetts much attention is paid to education, and numerous schools are established throughout all the New England states, the necessary funds being annually raised in districts.

On the 6th of August we proceeded on our journey through New Hartford, a small village four miles from Utica, and two or three from Hamilton college, incorporated in 1821, and so called after the unfortunate general. We obtained a good view of its white buildings pleasantly situated on a rising ground above the village of Clinton. We arrived at the manufacturing village of Manchester, nine miles from Utica, in an hour and a half, being at the quickest rate we had yet reached upon American turnpikes, and accordingly anticipated a continuation of such rapid progress; but were soon deceived, for the innkeeper, not expecting the mail soon, had made no preparations for breakfast, and the quarters of an hour elapsed before the breakfast and coffee made their appearance upon the table. At the village of Oneida Castle we obtained the first sight of some Tuscarora Indians, who were standing by the road-side, wrapped up in their blankets, though a burning sun was shining, looking composedly, and apparently without curiosity, at the coach as it whirled along. There was an extensive settlement of log huts, with an episcopal church belonging to the tribe, on a plain half a mile from the turnpike; and a circular grove of trees where their council was formerly held, and where they now receive their annual allowance from the state, to which all land they wish to dispose of must be sold, not having the power to grant a title-deed to individuals. During the last year, fifty of the tribe, with their episcopalian pastor, a man of liberal education, having sold their lands, migrated to Green Bay on Lake Michigan. In the summer season their time is employed in tilling the ground in the Reservation, or in cutting fuel from the extensive forests in rear of their village. In winter many of them proceed to the hunting grounds three or four hundred miles in the west, where they collect an abundance of skins, from the sale of which they might realise a considerable sum of money; but like all savages, or semi-barbarians, they are much addicted to drink, and barter their hardly-gained spoils for a small quantity of spirituous liquors. Twenty-five miles further, at Onondaga Hollow, where there is a tribe of that name, some women came up to the coach, offering small articles of their own manufacture for sale; they could speak English very fluently, as can most of the Indians in the tribes which have much intercourse with the "pale faces." The frontier war, which had but lately broken out, was much deprecated by most Americans, who asserted that their government was the aggressor. To a foreigner the American policy towards the Indians appears most cruel and inhuman, every possible advantage being taken to dispossess the rightful owners of the soil of their property. The Indian character is noble and generous, when well treated; but, when goaded, as they have been to desperation, it is no wonder that their treatment of the white prisoners who fall into their hands should be barbarous. Americans have been found to retaliate such cruelties; and the public prints at this time were filled with late accounts of another "glorious victory," in which some volunteers or militia men had brought three scalps into camp!

The town of Onondaga Hollow, and Onondaga Hill, were of some importance during the late war, and rival in growth and prosperity, being situated in a grain country.

try, and the great deposits of corn and other requisites for the army on the frontier. But, alas! their day has gone by; the sunshine of their greatness and prosperity is for ever overclouded. The houses are almost tenantless, and of the arsenal nothing is left but the name; the canal, running within three miles, gave them the coup de grace. The sooner the road is diverted from the present route the more secure will the lives of all travellers become; for of all hills to ascend or descend, the one near Onondaga Hollow is the most frightful. The extensive and fine view of Syracuse, Salina with its salt vats, Onondaga lake, the town of Liverpool, with the thickly wooded country between it and Oneida lake in the extreme distance, scarcely compensate for the risk of ascending it in a heavy coach.

Our progress was much delayed by the delivery of the mail bag at every small hamlet on the road. The letters in America, instead of being put into separate bags for each town, as in England, are carried in one huge leather case, which the postmaster is allowed to detain ten minutes, so that he may pick his letters out of the general mass. The coachman (there being no guard) drives up to the office, sometimes a small tavern, and throws the bag, about the size of a flour sack, upon the hard pavement, or muddy road, as most convenient; it is then trailed along into the house, and being unlocked, the lower end is elevated, and out tumble all the letters, newspapers, and pamphlets, in a heap upon the floor. At the little village of Lenox, I had the curiosity to look into the bar for the purpose of seeing the mode of sorting letters, and witnessed a scene which could never answer in any other country. The sorters consisted of an old grey-headed man, at least seventy-five years of age, an old woman, with "spectacles on nose," the old gentleman's equal in point of years, and a great, fat, ruddy-faced dame of twenty-five, backed by half a dozen dirty little barefooted urchins, who were all down upon their knees on the floor, overhauling the huge pile before them, flinging those letters which were for their office into a distant corner of the room, amongst sundry wet mops, brushes, molasses barrels, &c., and those which were for other towns on our route were again bagged in the same gentle style, part having to undergo the same process every fifth mile of our day's journey, excepting at the office at Onondaga Hill, where the postmaster, being an attorney at law, managed to detain us only two minutes. Many of these offices, costing the government an annual sum of 200 or 300 dollars for the postmaster's salary, do not receive half that amount in letters. One man assured me that sometimes his month's receipts did not exceed six dollars. No revenue being required from the post-office establishment, the offices in large towns furnish funds for extending the mail line of communication. The surplus funds of that at New York are enormous; but, for the last three years, the expenditure upon the mails has much exceeded the receipts throughout the States. In 1790, there were only seventy-five post-offices; at this time, there are 9000, and 115,000 miles of mail communication; and the postage on letters from Boston to Baltimore, a distance little under 400 miles, is only 9d. sterling.

At Marcellus the coach stopped at an inn, of which the landlord seemed quite an original. He was sitting in the bar, without his coat and neckcloth, reading a newspaper, and his feet stretched half across the top of the table, round which several of his guests were enjoying "a drink" and a mouthful of the Virginia weed. Hearing one of the passengers address him by the title of "Doctor," I observed "he was an elegant specimen of a medical man." "Ah, but," said my fellow-traveller, "he's one of the smartest physicians in the state, I'll assure you;" certainly not a literal description, according to the English acceptance of the word; for he was one of the shabbiest-looking men I ever cast eyes on. At sunset, we reached the beautiful little village of Skaneateles, situated at the head of a romantic lake, sixteen miles long and nearly two wide, of the same name. While delayed here for some time to "shift horses," and for the mail to undergo another examination, the passengers stood on the margin of the lake, admiring its clear and unruffled surface, save here and there where a slight ripple was caused by the slow movement of one or two small scullers, as they changed their fishing berth for some spot which would appear more favourable for their diversion. Gardens and cultivated fields extended to the water's edge, and numerous neat white houses scattered about upon the range of low hills ornamented either bank. While gazing on its beauties, a thunder-storm suddenly burst over us, with a heavy squall of wind; and ere we could regain the coach the whole scene was changed. The lake was now perfectly black, and its disturbed surface with a small and troubled ripple, occasioned by the violent gust, formed a strong and somewhat unpleasant contrast to its late placid and mild appearance.

At half-past eight we arrived at the American hotel in Auburn, rejoiced that the fatigues of the day were over, having had scarcely 200 yards of level ground during the last twenty miles. We had passed, too, through the strangest medley of named towns imaginable. It appeared almost as if the founders had collected them from all quarters of the globe indifferently, discarding many of the fine sounding, significant, old Indian names, and substituting some gleaned from ancient Greece or Italy, interspersed with one from Cockney land, or perhaps a genuine Yankeeism.

CHAPTER XVI.

AUBURN PRISON, &c. JOURNEY OF DISASTERS.

Hearing that the board of health had issued an order that no visitors should be admitted into the prison until the cholera had subsided, a precaution taken in consequence of its having broken out in the Sing-Sing prison on the Hudson, we much feared that we should be disappointed in not attaining the object for which we had visited Auburn; fortunately, however, Mr. B. had introductory letters to Dr. Richards, president of the Theological Seminary, through whose interest we obtained an order for admittance at mid-day on the 7th of August.

The prison is situated on the outskirts of the village, surrounded by a wall 2000 feet in extent, varying in height from 20 to 35 feet, according to the situation of the shops in which the convicts are employed. The cells where they are confined during the night have a singular appearance (something like a large pigeon box, or honey-comb), being in five stories, with galleries, and the windows in an outer wall at the distance of five or six feet from them, so that no convict can attempt effecting his escape through their medium. It is, in fact, a house within a house. Each prisoner has a separate cell 7 feet in length, 7 in height, by 3½ in width, with a small shelf for holding his bible, and a canvas cot, which, in the day time, is reared up against the wall, and, when lowered down at night, rests upon a small ledge, and covers the whole extent of the cell. A strong grated door admits a free circulation of air, and the works of the lock are so contrived as to be two feet from the door, and entirely out of a convict's reach, if he even succeeded in breaking one of the iron bars so as to admit a passage for his arm. A keeper always patrolling the galleries during the night with cloth shoes acts as a check upon the prisoners holding any discourse. The building was perfectly clean, and free from that tainted atmosphere which generally pervades a prison, the cells being white-washed once a fortnight, as a preventive against the cholera, though when there is no necessity for such a precaution they are thus cleansed only from five to six times during the warm season.

From the cells we proceeded into an open square, formed by the keeper's house, prisoners' apartments, and work-shops, where a part of the convicts were employed in stone-cutting, and making an addition to the building of another five-story row of cells, to be erected in the place of a wing constructed upon the old principle of confining a certain number of prisoners in one large room, by which means they had free intercourse with one another, a system found very injurious to their reformation. It was almost impossible to imagine ourselves in a prison amongst a set of hardened desperadoes, when walking through the shops where they were working with an alacrity and attention to their business which were truly surprising. Every trade has its own particular shop, with one keeper as a superintendent; and here the good effects of discipline are seen. In the blacksmiths' shops, for instance, were forty or fifty athletic men wielding their sledge hammers with the power of the Cyclops of old, and all armed with weapons which, in one minute, would shiver the strongest barrier to atoms; yet only one superintendent was with them, sitting at his ease upon a chair; and not any instance is upon record of an attempt at making a forcible escape. The prisoners are not allowed, upon any pretence, to speak to one another, and only on business to a turnkey, who can easily observe if any conversation takes place, as they are generally placed with their faces in the same direction. The weavers were the most numerous body, there being nearly one hundred sitting at their looms in a row; and forty tailors, whose occupation is considered the most unhealthy, from the position requisite for the performance of their work. They are not permitted to look at any stranger who enters the room; but I observed several squinting at us out of the corners of their eyes when the keeper's back was turned. The most superior specimens of workmanship, of every description, are turned out of these shops, and are contracted for by merchants and store-keepers residing in Auburn; a system most injurious to the industrious mechanic, who cannot make a livelihood in the vicinity of the prison, being underworked by the convicts, whose labour is contracted for at various sums from 25 to 50 cents (one to two shillings) per diem, the tailors at the former sum; those trades which derive assistance from a saw-mill, turning-machine, &c. which are worked by water (introduced from a stream that washes the southern wall of the prison) at 30, tool-makers at 40, and blacksmiths at 50 cents a day. A few invalids and convalescent convicts are employed in winding at 15 cents. There were only two stocking makers, who were employed solely in working for the convicts.

The contractors are not even permitted to give any orders to the workmen, and any instructions they wish to give are through the mechanic turnkey who superintends each shop. In any instance where the latter may not be acquainted with the trade, the contractor may give the necessary directions in his presence. The looms, jennies, tools, &c. appeared throughout the prison in the highest order, and business was carried on in each shop in a more workmanlike style than without the walls. The morning work commences at six o'clock in summer, breakfast between seven and eight, dinner at twelve (half an hour being allowed for each), and the labours of the day cease at six in the evening. The prisoners, being formed into as many companies as there are galleries of cells, are marched to them with the lock-step in the most orderly manner, each man inclining his face towards the keepers who accompany them, so that he may be observed, if he attempts to speak. As he passes through the mess-room, adjoining the kitchen, he stoops slightly, and taking up his supper, without breaking the line of march, enters his cell for the night, being locked in by the turnkey of the gallery. The mess-room was particularly clean, with platters and tin cans neatly arranged on wooden tables, so narrow that the convicts sit only on one side of them, with their faces in the same direction. They are waited upon by some of their fellow-prisoners; and, in case any one has more food than he requires, he raises his right hand, when a portion is taken from his plate and given to some one who elevates his left hand in token he has insufficient. The rations are ample, being, 10 oz. of wheat, 10 oz. of Indian meal, 14 oz. of beef or 12 of pork; with 2½ bushels of potatoes to every hundred rations, and half a gill of molasses per man, which is added to the mush, a kind of hasty pudding made of Indian meal, and boiled in coppers. The cooks were employed at this article of food when we visited the kitchen. I tasted some, and should imagine it to be very wholesome and nutritious. The bread was heavy and sad, but it had a good flavour. If a convict is unruly, or discovered speaking, he receives summary punishment, by having a certain number of stripes with a cane on his back. Such a measure is, however, but seldom required. A false wall or passage round each room, with slits at intervals, through which a keeper may look unperceived, and where he stations himself if he suspects a convict, acts as an excellent check upon any conversation. I peeped through them into various shops; and the prisoners were busily employed in dead silence, when the keeper was at a distance of 100 feet.

The work appears to conduce much to their health, there being only six in the hospital, out of 667 prisoners; and a few days previously there had not been a single patient. Visitors are not admitted either into the hospital, which is in an upper story of the prison, or into the women's apartment, who are all confined together and work but little, as no compulsion could be used towards them, and, as to talking, all the art of man could avail nothing for its prevention. Altogether the prison is a most interesting sight, and should be visited by all travellers. A considerable revenue now arises from it to the state, so that convicts, instead of being an expense as formerly, are here a profit. Many who enter without any trade are taught one, by which, when released, they may gain an honest and ample livelihood; and numbers who have been sent into the world again have thoroughly reformed their former vicious habits. We saw one poor man, a sailor, who had become deranged since his imprisonment, and after a partial recovery was allowed to do what he pleased with regard to work. He had made several large models of ships, which stood in the square completely rigged; and another man, who had the use of one hand only, employed his time in carving rude figures of the most grotesque kind, afterwards gilding or painting them. No one, in short, was allowed to be completely idle. The government frequently pardons those who appear to have been misled, and by their conduct show an inclination to become good citizens; and only for very serious offences are any sentenced to imprisonment for life, the majority being for periods of five and seven years. The entire establishment is superintended by a governor, called "Agent and Keeper," with a salary of 1000 dollars, a deputy keeper at 600, and the other keepers 350 each; about forty officers are employed as keepers, turnkeys, guards, &c. When the prison is open for the admission of visitors (which was the case always until the appearance of the cholera in the state,) 25 cents (one shilling) is charged for each person. The keeper said that the convicts felt deeply the loss of their chewing tobacco, which is not permitted within the walls of the prison, and to which excellent regulation much of the cleanliness is owing. From the inspector's report it appears that "the frequency of pardons has arisen principally from the want of room in the prison, by the rapid accumulation of convicts;" and it is much to be regretted that ten or twelve acres were not enclosed within the wall in place of three or four, so that the building might be increased to any extent.

I think the steady and excellent behaviour of the prisoners may rise, in a great measure, from so many of them being confined for a short space of time, two thirds being sentenced to a period not exceeding seven years. There is a Sunday school, which those only attend who wish it; and they are instructed gratuitously by the young men of the town and the Theological Seminary. The chaplain takes opportunities of visiting them in their cells after divine service on that day, also in the hospital, and whenever time will allow, to afford them religious instruction, and give advice with regard to their future conduct. One of the main objects to be gained is to wean them from intemperance, a habit which the prison discipline has entirely eradicated from most determined drunkards, who have thus been restored to the world as sober and industrious men.

By comparing the returns from the Auburn prison with those furnished by other penitentiaries and jails in the Union, the salutary effects of the system above detailed over that practised where solitary confinement night and day is enforced without work, and over any other mode of punishment as yet devised, have been most satisfactorily proved. If I might venture to propose any amendment in the system, it would be to make a larger pecuniary allowance than the present one (two dollars, I think) to the liberated prisoners; as instances are on record of men having been guilty of theft, a few days after their dismissal, from actual want.

The village of Auburn itself is tastefully built, within two miles of the Owaseo Lake, whose outlet washes the prison wall. Its rapid rise is somewhat retarded by the quantity of work turned out by the convicts; yet at the same time a large sum of money is necessarily in circulation amongst the contractors for furnishing rations (which are at the rate of about 21 dollars per annum, each prisoner,) and for payment of the articles received from the prison, which are retailed at a great per centage.

Proceeding to the village of Cayuga, situated near the northern extremity of a lake of the same name, we embarked in a steamer which plies upon the lake, and crossed to the opposite side, touching for some more passengers at a village connected with Cayuga by a bridge exceeding a mile in length, over which the western road passes. The extreme length of the lake is 40 miles by two at its greatest breadth. The scenery is tame and uninteresting, until towards the southern end, when it assumes a more pleasing appearance, the banks becoming high and craggy in some places, and in others cultivated to the water's edge. But throughout there is an overpowering quantity of dense forest, with an intervening space of eight or ten miles between villages. For the last few miles, the face of the country presented a singular appearance, being broken every hundred yards, or thereabouts, with narrow and deep ravines, formed by the heavy rush of water from the hills in the spring of the year. In some, the rock was rugged and bare; in others the grass had sprung up again, or, where the ground more easily yielded to the force of the torrent, there were long and heavy undulations, like the swelling of the sea.

At the head of the lake, entering a coach again, after a drive of two miles across a plain which had once formed part of the lake, we arrived at the pretty town of Ithaca, containing 3300 inhabitants, surrounded on three sides by hills varying from 600 to 800 feet in height, with their slopes and summits partially cleared and cultivated. The plain between the town and the lake is so densely covered with forest that the water is not visible from the former; and in many places it is so boggy and unsound that no houses can be built upon it. Two adjoining squares in the town, encircled with a wooden railing and a grove of trees, are quite occupied by churches, there not being fewer than seven of them. The Clinton House, in the vicinity of those squares, at which we put up, is one of the handsomest buildings of the kind in the States, but its bar-room is one of the dirtiest.

There are many factories and mills in and about Ithaca, on the small streams which pour their waters into the lake. A rivulet within a mile of the town forms two of the prettiest falls imaginable. The lower one, about 80 feet in height, falling over a series of small rocky ledges, appears like so many flakes of snow upon the dark masses of stones; and, where the sun strikes upon the foam, it glitters like the sparkling frost on a December's morn, after the preceding day's thaw. The other fall, 200 yards higher up the hill, exhibits more water; but the fall is not quite so high, nearly one third of the stream being diverted through a tunnel 90 yards long in the solid rock, above the lower fall, for the purpose of turning several mill-wheels; and in course of time the latter cataract will be reduced to a few gallons per minute, like the Passaic at Paterson. In our land of small rivers, the cascade formed by the quantity of water conveyed to the mills would be considered of some magnitude, and an object of no small interest. These Falls certainly vie with those at Trenton in point of beauty, though so very dissimilar in their formation; the latter are almost subterranean, while the former rush over the brow of a hill, between large impending crags, crowned with thick dark foliage, with scarcely a passage worn down the rocky ledge for their foaming waters. Like Trenton, too, they have acquired a melancholy interest from similar causes; a highly accomplished young lady being drowned at each place within these few years, when visiting the Falls in company with their friends and relatives.

Not wishing to return up Cayuga Lake, and in fact having made a point of never returning by the same road when it could be avoided, we hired a carriage with two excellent horses, and a quarter to three in the afternoon, on the 9th of August, departed from Ithaca, ascending a steep and long hill for two or three miles. While enjoying a most extensive and charming prospect from the summit, we encountered one of the heaviest storms of wind and rain I ever experienced. After struggling against it for a quarter of an hour, we succeeded in gaining an open shed by the road side, already filled with half-drowned pedestrians and equestrians, who were seeking shelter from the pitiless peltings of the storm. Such an arrival as ours, with a carriage loaded with heavy trunks, a pile of carpet bags and hat-boxes, with umbrellas, water-proof cloaks, and great coats innumerable, would have attracted the curiosity of less inquisitive people than thorough-bred Yankees. Five or six inmates of the shed busied themselves with examining the ivory Chinese handle of Mr. B.'s umbrella; and a person, whom they designated as "Doctor," dressed in a thread-bare, shabby-genteel, frock coat, of blue cloth, with a collar originally black velvet, but which, by wear and tear of weather, had been transformed into a nondescript colour, observed that "they carved cleverly in New York." The patent leather hat-box soon fixed their attention, and my answer not satisfying them that it was not made of wood, they took it out of the carriage and minutely inspected it both within and without. The patent boxes of the carriage wheels next became subjects for their conjectures and guesses; they had evidently seen none before. At this time we were joined by a most consequential person,—the landlord of an adjoining tavern, whose curiosity had been excited by the crowd in his shed. Some one asked him whether he had ever seen such "mortal curious things in a carriage before;" he answered, "Yes;" and just glanced at one of the fore wheels, "but those are those poor Yankee things; I have been a teaming these fifteen years, and would never wear one of them;" then turning to a hind wheel, "why here, this box is clear gone, the wheel will come off the first heavy lurch you have, and you'll be cast adrift." For once, curiosity proved of service, it being very evident that the first heavy jolt would throw the wheel from the carriage. Another by-stander, a blacksmith, an old weather-beaten man of sixty, whom the inn-keeper addressed as "Uncle Jack," said he would render it secure in five minutes, and carried the box away to his forge, which was "but a few rods up the road." The rain had now subsided, though we were still threatened by thick dark clouds. The doctor and a companion, one of the steam-brethren also, took their departure on their poor and sorry animals, with their small black saddle bags stowed with phish and cayenne pepper. The pedestrians commenced their wet and floundering journey anew through mud and mire; the landlord returned to his bar, and we alone were left to await "Uncle Jack's" pleasure, who spun out his five minutes to three quarters of an hour; and then, having reported all right, we also once more pursued our route towards the setting sun, over a road where there was no road, over bridges where it would be much safer to ford the stream, and through a country rich only in stones and stumps; where land would be no bargain at half a dollar per acre. Half an hour before sunset, when we gained the summit of a long, dreary hill, the great orb of day burst through the clouds in all his setting glory, and the thin vapours were seen rising from the woods and valleys beneath us, and floating gradually away before the fast subsiding gale. The road, too, at the same moment improved, running over a firm earthen track; the drive cracked his whip, and, smiling, observed that "we should be in by an hour after sun-down yet." The horses trotted merrily along; we threw aside our wet cloaks and coats; while every thing to us wore a different appearance, and we now saw some beauty in the vast and endless forests which encircled us on every side, save here and there a solitary patch of cleared land, the effects of the industry of some hardy settler, who, one would almost imagine, had quarreled with the whole world by seeking so secluded a spot; but we were now in a humor to be pleased with every thing.

Our gleam of sunshine and good fortune was very transitory; for in a few minutes we again dived into the dark, thick pine forest, whose ragged branches and tall straight trunks had but a few minutes before formed so fine a contrast against the lighter foliage of some other natives of the grove. Ascending higher ground, too, we were once more enveloped in the heavy damp clouds, and as night set in, the road became worse, and the habitations of men and all signs of cultivation disappeared. Neither the coachman nor ourselves had ever travelled in the direction we were moving; so alike uncertain whither we were going, but trusting to chance and good fortune, we renewed our journey, grumbling against America and its miserable roads, and arriving at the following conclusion—that to move out of the common coach route, to leave the turnpike road which was passable, and to attempt exploring new and undescribed scenery by striking out a line of road for ourselves, would never answer any end, and was in itself almost impracticable,—that, for the future, we must be content with the old well-worn track of former tourists, and visit no places but those notified in the "Stranger's Guide," or "Northern Traveller." Tourists, however, are always in search for some incident which may be rather out of the common way, and which may vary some little the dull pages of their diary; and we too should have been satisfied had the fair and dainty moon shone brightly on us, laying open to our view some of the dark recesses of the dense forest, or the dreary depths of the vast ravines beneath us. But we had not a speck of the true romantic spirit in us; we preferred a warm supper and a good dry mattress, in a comfortable inn, to weathering it out in an unknown country, where we might be half-drowned ere golden Phoebus again walked forth from his chamber in the east. At nine o'clock, from the cold breeze which swept past us, and from the streak of light along the horizon, as if the clouds, having nothing to cling to, were compelled to rise from earth, we knew that some large sheet of water was nigh, and shortly afterwards saw Seneca Lake, like a narrow strait lying far beneath us. We were doomed, however, still farther disappointments; nor was it until an hour past midnight, after having trudged about eight miles on foot through deep and muddy pools, that we reached a small inn, at the head of the lake, wet, weary, famished, and consequently out of humour.

After much knocking at doors, and shaking of windows, we succeeded in rousing the landlord from his lair. In half an hour's time, he spread out before us a "roast indigestaque moles" of apple-pie, new cheese, sour beer, heavy Indian bread, and port wine, which savoured strongly of logwood and brandy; but our appetites had been well sharpened by our wanderings, and we were in no humour to find fault. Sitting by the cheerful wood fire, we already began to laugh at the misfortunes and slow progress of our journey, having been more than nine hours performing a distance of twenty-one miles. Excellent beds being provided, in a few minutes the troubles of the past, fears and anticipations of the future, were alike forgotten.

CHAPTER XVII.

SENECA LAKE—JEMIMA WILKINSON—LOCKPORT—BUFFALO.

On the morning of the 10th of August, embarking on board a steamer, we left Watkins, Jeffersonville, Seneca Head, or Savoy, as we heard the small village, where we had passed part of the night, severally called. Though commanding a much finer situation than Ithaca in every respect, with a canal running past it which connects the waters of Lake Erie and Seneca with the Susquehanna river by the Chemung canal, yet there are not above twenty frame houses in the settlement, arising from the mistaken policy of the proprietor of the land, who will scarcely sell a rood under a New York price; whereas, if he gave away every other lot for building upon, the increased value of the remaining lots would make him more than an adequate return. The head of Seneca Lake, like that of Cayuga, is black marsh overgrown with bulrushes and reeds. Several large streams with fine water-falls enter it a few miles from the village, of which the Hector, 150 feet in height, and those at the big stream Point 136, are the most worthy of observation.

We considered ourselves fortunate in meeting with a gentlemanly, well-informed person, in Captain Rumney, an Englishman, the proprietor of the "Seneca Chief," the only steamer which plies upon the lake. He purchased the right of steam upon these waters for a mere trifle, from ex-governor Lewis, to whom it had been sold by Fulton, who possessed originally the exclusive right of steam navigation on those inland waters of the state of New York which did not interfere with the interests of neighbouring states, as the Hudson does with the communication to Vermont and Lower Canada. This charter was granted to Fulton for a term of thirty years, six of which have not yet expired; before the lapse of that time the present possessor may expect to realise a considerable fortune. The profits arise principally from towing the Erie canal boats to the different ports in the lake, the traffic on which will be much increased by the Chemung and Crooked Lake canals, now nearly completed. The charge for towing vessels from one to the other extreme of the lake, a distance of forty miles, is six dollars, and is performed in a few hours.

At Rapley's ferry, a few miles down the lake on the western bank, are the remains of a pier from which the celebrated Jemima Wilkinson proved the faith of her followers. She had collected them for the purpose of seeing her walk across the lake, and addressing them, while one foot touched the water, enquired if they had faith in her, and believed she could reach the opposite shore in safety; for, if they had not faith, the attempt would be vain. Upon receiving the most earnest assurances of their belief that she could pass over, she replied "that there was no occasion then to make a display of her power, as they believed in it;" and, turning round, re-entered her carriage, and drove off, to the chagrin of thousands of idle spectators, and to the astonishment of her numerous disciples. Captain Rumney, who was acquainted with her during her lifetime, described her as a tall, stately, and handsome woman; but of rather a masculine appearance. In her costume she much resembled a clergyman, having her hair brushed back, wearing a surplice and bands, with a quaker's hat. She was a native of Rhode Island, and during the revolutionary war formed an attachment with a British officer, who subsequently deserted her. In consequence of this mercenary treatment, she suffered a violent attack of fever, and for some days lay in a deep trance, though the medical men affirmed she might have easily roused herself from it had she only the wish to do so. It is supposed that at this time she was engaged in laying the deep plot which was so successfully carried into execution on her recovery, by stating that, Jemima Wilkinson having died, the angels in heaven had disputed who should enter her body, and visit the earth as the universal friend of mankind,—as the Saviour of the world; that she (now calling herself an angel in Jemima's body) had been appointed to fill the body of the deceased, and was come upon earth to preach salvation to all. Many believed in her, and, a sect being soon formed, she quitted Rhode Island, and settled near Crooked lake, a few miles to the west of Seneca, where her followers, some of whom were men of independent fortune, purchased a large tract of land for her; the deeds of her farm being drawn up in the name of Rachel Mellon, a relative who inherited the estate after Jemima's death, six years since. Upon all her plate, carriage, &c., the letters U. F. (universal friend) were inscribed. She observed the Jewish Sabbath, but preached on Sundays to the numerous visitors who were attracted to her house by mere curiosity. She was well versed in the Scriptures, and possessed a remarkably retentive memory; but, in other respects, was an illiterate woman. The creed of her sect is the metempsychosis; but since her departure the number of believers has considerably diminished, the present head of the society, Esther Plant, not having sufficient tact to keep them united. In Jemima's lifetime, so jealous were her disciples of due respect being paid to her, that no answer would be returned to enquiries after "Jemima," but only if designated as the "Friend."

All the points of land in the lake (save one, which has a singular bush formed by the hand of nature into the exact representation of an elephant) are occupied by small villages, which possess excellent harbours, during heavy gales up or down the lake, and have about 20 fathoms of water within 30 feet of the shore. This one exception is the property of Esther, who will not part with it upon any terms. The entrance of the Crooked lake canal is at the village of Dresden, a German settlement, eight miles west of which is Jemima's house. On the opposite shore in Seneca county is Ovid, situated on a pretty eminence, overlooking the water; also Lodi, Brutus, and various other classically named places. These names, it appears, were bestowed by the government on townships, distributed among the revolutionary soldiers, and which extended originally over a large tract, from the borders of the lake, almost as far east as Utica. The veterans were soon, however, overreached, and induced to dispose of their lands to some scheming and designing speculators, who resold them most advantageously to the present possessors, persons of respectability; and the same land which would not then bring a dollar in the market will now produce 25 to 40 and even 50 per acre. The soil is a strong loam, and well adapted for wheat. Seneca is, however, an Indian name, although it might naturally be supposed to have the same origin, in imitation of antiquity, as the neighbouring towns of Marathon, Pharsalia, Homer, Virgil, and Cassius. The scenery upon the lake closely resembles that of Cayuga, being unvaried and uninteresting; the water is, however, beautifully clear, the pebbly bottom being visible in a calm day at the depth of 30 feet. Being principally supplied by springs, the ice upon it never becomes so thick as to impede the navigation; during the severe frost of 1831, a thin sheet formed on some parts, but was broken up by the first light breeze which ruffled the water.

The town of Geneva possesses a beautiful situation upon a rising bank at the northern extremity of the lake, with terraced gardens approaching to the water's edge, and many pretty villas scattered around. About a mile from the town, on the borders of the water, are some extensive glass works, which however have not been worked during the last year, the owner having failed to a great amount, through mismanagement in his farming speculations. When the works were first established, they occupied a narrow space in the midst of a forest where fuel was plentiful; but the ground is now so well cleared about the town, that a cord of wood, measuring four feet in height and eight in length, costs a dollar and a quarter. An opinion prevails, from an appearance of the strata at the head of the lake, that coal may be found, when required. Geneva is altogether a pretty spot, and contains one particularly fine street, in which is the college, a dull heavy looking building, with castellated walls and other tasteless appendages. But the private residences equal any in the state.

Proceeding on our journey at midday, on the 11th, we passed through a fine rich country, chequered with heavy crops of every grain. The apples appeared perfectly ripe, and the peach trees were every where loaded with fruit. The soil evidently increased in richness the farther we proceeded to the west.

The ground in the vicinity of Canandaigua, fifteen miles from Geneva, was kept in a state of cultivation by the Indians, prior to General Sullivan's march through the country fifty years since, when the whole western part of the state of New York was in possession of the Six Nations, of whom now scarcely a vestige remains. The town is at the outlet of the Canandaigua lake, and in an unhealthy situation, owing to the water being dammed up near the outlet for the purpose of supplying a mill wheel, thus forming a large wet marsh, which produces a deadly fever in the autumnal months. Endcavours have been made by actions at law to compel the mill proprietor to lower his dam, or to surround it with a bank to prevent the water overflowing the country, but hitherto to no purpose. The town consists of one principal street, two miles in length and about 150 feet in breadth, with gardens and locust trees in front of the houses. It is generally considered the handsomest place in the state, though, in my opinion, not equal to Skaneateles.

From Canandaigua, we travelled over a hilly and sandy road, running parallel with the canal, and under its great embankment over the Irondequoit creek. This immense work, for a distance of two miles, averages a height of seventy feet above the plain across which it is carried. The banks being chiefly of sand, great caution is necessary in watching and puddling any small crvices which may appear. Two years since, the water forced its way through the embankment, and, rushing down upon the road and plain beneath, swept away every thing which opposed the fury of its course. The lesser sand hills at this time present evident marks of the furious torrent which passed over them.

At sunset, descending a hill, we entered upon a flat, marshy plain, on which the town of Rochester is situated. It has more the appearance of a town in a new world than any I visited, and nothing can be more miserable than its appearance from a distance. An open space has been merely burnt in the forest, and the town has been run up without any attempt of getting rid of the innumerable stumps of trees which even make their appearance in the outer streets of the place. It is, in truth, a city in the wilderness, and cannot be healthy, so long as it is surrounded by such dense, dark forests. The trees in America are not felled so that the stump remains level with the ground, as in England, but according to the convenience of the woodman, who generally strikes the trunk about three feet from the root. Where a thick forest has thus been cut down, the desolate appearance the face of the country presents can be scarcely imagined:—large blackened trunks, and arms partly consumed by fire, lie encumbering the ground till they decay, or are again consigned to the fire by some more industrious farmer than the generality of the Americans. At Rochester, however, nothing of this kind has yet taken place, though it is the most thriving town in the state. The softer kinds of wood, such as birch and beech, decay sufficiently in six or seven years to admit of being knocked up, but hemlock and pine will scarcely be affected by the seasons of half a century.

Crossing the Genesee river, we entered the principal part of the town, and drove to the Eagle, situated in the main street, a fine hotel with excellent rooms and an attentive landlord. The town has risen in an incredibly short space of time: twenty years since it was a wild uninhabited tract where 14,000 people now earn a livelihood. Its rapid rise originated from the Erie canal passing through the town, and the Genesee affording so great a water power to the extensive flour, cotton, and other mills on its banks. The canal crosses the river by a fine aqueduct three hundred yards above the Falls, where the celebrated leaper, Sam Patch, took his last and fatal descent in 1829. The Falls are over a perpendicular ledge of rock, 97 feet in height: with that descent however he was not satisfied, but had a platform erected to the height of 25 feet on a small island which divides it, and in the presence of thousands of spectators precipitated himself into the gulf beneath, from which he never re-appeared. Many ladies who were the innocent spectators of his death, little imagining there could be any risk, as he had already made a similar descent from the Falls of Niagara, fainted when, after anxiously awaiting some seconds for his re-appearance above the surface of the water, they at last discovered by the shriek of horror which arose from the assembled crowd that they had been instrumental in the destruction of a fellow creature; and every one regretted, now it was too late, that such an exhibition had been encouraged. The unfortunate man, being intoxicated when he ascended the platform, did not preserve the proper position for entering the water; and his death doubtless arose from the great shallowness of the stream, it being ascertained that there were only fifteen feet of water to resist the impetus of his weight falling from such a height. It appears to signify but little how men immortalise themselves, and Sam Patch has rendered himself immortal, at least in America, by more innocent means than most of his ambitious brethren. The scenery about the Falls is uninteresting, and but little worthy of notice, though a large body of water forms the cataract. The banks of the river are high and contracted, and covered with extensive ranges of mills.

Judge Rochester, whose family resides in the neighbourhood, was the great proprietor of the land upon which the town is built; he was a man of considerable influence in the state, and stood a contest for governor with De Witt Clinton. Many of the streets are well laid out, and contain excellent buildings; the arcade, however, in which is the post office, is but a second rate structure, the plan of the whole ill arranged, and making a poor figure for so flourishing a town. The churches are superior in style of architecture, and constructed of more durable materials, than is generally the case in America. We attended divine service at the first presbyterian church, which was well attended, and heard an excellent sermon.

The cholera being very prevalent in the town, we departed on our route to the westward on the morning of the 13th of August. In answer to our enquiries at the office the preceding evening, the book keeper informed us that the coach would start at four o'clock in the morning. This being rather too early an hour for some of the party, we agreed to take an extra coach which can always be obtained (there being no post chaises in the country) at all the principal hotels. The book keeper no sooner heard this our determination, than, being alarmed at the idea of losing so many passengers, he proffered to delay the coach until after breakfast, if that would be an accommodation to us. At half past eight, accordingly, the heavy vehicle drove up to the door, with the only seat we had not secured occupied by a retailer of groceries, who, with the patience of Job, had been awaiting our pleasure for upwards of four hours and a half. His eyes beamed with evident delight, and he gave a kind of inward chuckle as he saw No. 1 carpet bag thrown into the boot; and not a hint did he drop during the whole journey of the unconscionable time we had delayed him for the mere purpose of gratifying our gastronomic propensities. For small families, the travelling arrangements in America are most inconvenient, as there is no alternative but either to be crowded with nine inside passengers, and no one knows who, as companions, or to be put to the heavy expense of hiring an extra. The time, too, at which the regular stage (as they term them) arrives at the place of its destination is a matter of the greatest uncertainty, depending entirely upon the number of passengers—not that any delay is caused by their additional weight, but by the distance they may reside from the direct line of road; for a coachman will drive a quarter of a mile out of his way to take up or put down a person.

At this time, travelling amongst the Americans themselves was nearly at a stand still; every landlord and coach proprietor complained bitterly of the presence of the cholera, as having done them incalculable injury. The only people I met on the move for pleasure, during the latter part of my journey, and through the infected districts, were foreigners, to whom the panic was a vast advantage, as there was not the usual crowd of summer tourists, and I never was at a loss for a seat in the coach, bed, or board, which would not have been the case in healthier seasons. Our party this day consisted of a cidreant lieutenant of the British navy, now a naturalised American, two Frenchmen, two Englishmen, one Scotsman, and a Welchman, whom chance only had brought together within the last two days.

We now entered upon the famous "Ridge road" which extends for eighty miles, from Carthage, near Rochester, to Lewistown on the Niagara river. From the circumstance of its running parallel with Lake Ontario, at the distance of six or eight miles, and its elevation above it being about 100 feet, with a gradual inclination towards the water, it is supposed to have once formed the southern boundary of the lake, and to have been thrown up by the action of the waves. Being formed of sand and fine gravel gives to that opinion some foundation; and that such banks can be formed by the action of the sea is very evident upon many parts of the English coast. From having been always referred to the Ridge road, when I found fault with American highways, I expected to travel upon a perfect level, instead of upon a road broken, as this is, by frequent abrupt and deep ravines. From this time I was told that I ought to see one somewhere far back in the west, several hundreds of miles distant in the Ohio country, which was not inferior to any macadamised road in Great Britain; but, as my curiosity never carried me so far away from the Atlantic as the Allegheny Mountains, I can only speak of those highways over which I did travel, not one of which would have escaped an indictment in the old country. In some states, as in New York and Connecticut, turnpikes are frequent; but this collection of tolls did not tend visibly to the improvement of the roads. The gate is generally formed of a hurdle, or a long narrow frame with numerous vertical bars, which is drawn up in the manner of a portcullis by ropes into a roof built across the road, until the traveller has passed.

There is no attraction in the scenery to lead a person upon the Ridge road, being carried through a flat and uninteresting country, with only a narrow strip, never exceeding a mile in width, redeemed from the surrounding forest. In no part of our journey were the waters of the lake visible, though but few miles distant. Settlements, however, are forming rapidly, and, from the clouds of smoke which hung over various parts of the forest, it may safely be predicted that not many years will elapse before the thick veil will be withdrawn. Three miles from Lockport, we left the Ridge, and entered upon a rough, shaking, "corduroy" road, a new species of rail-way they might call it, being formed entirely of split trees and rails laid across the road, without any regard to level or disproportion of size, and a most sovereign contempt for any thing like repairs. Such a wretched apology for a highway ought to have immortalised its inventor's name, in place of being called after the coarse cloth which it resembles in grain. The man, at least, deserved a patent for having discovered a most excruciating mode of dislocating bones, and an easy method of breaking the axletrees of carriages, combined. We proceeded at a marvellously uncomfortable, slow, foot pace over this corduroy, until crossing the Erie canal, we entered the village of Lockport, which, like Rochester, or most places on that line of communication, has sprung up in almost a day. The greater part of the village is situated on the summit of a hill, over which the canal is carried by means of five locks, each containing 16 feet water, and raising a boat 12 feet. As the ascent of a boat through such a succession of them would much delay those on the point of descending, both loss of time and confusion have been avoided by having a double row of locks, side by side. These being principally cut out of the solid rock, and well finished off with substantial masonry and iron railings, may, with the great embankment over the Irondequoit creek, be considered the most arduous undertaking between Buffalo and Albany. After having surmounted the locks, the excavation through the solid rock extends for upwards of two miles. The surplus water of the canal supplies several mills with a powerful stream, one, too, which will never fail, the canal itself being fed by Lake Erie. The mills return the water to the canal again below the locks, and the clear current, which flows at about a mile per hour, renders the Erie canal very different in appearance from our muddy works of the same description in England, which are so often unnavigable, from a scarcity of water in the reservoirs. There is a singularly constructed wooden bridge, composed of a series of platforms of open frame work, one above the other, below the basin at the foot of the locks. It extends over the canal from one side of the ravine to the other, at not a less height than 80 feet from its foundation, and 60 above the level of the water, and at a length of about 300 feet.

Having visited all the objects of curiosity in the village, not excepting the saw mills, we took the packet boat at a quarter to eleven o'clock, and in fifteen minutes more had passed through the locks. A fine, clear, full moon, rendered the numerous lamps about those works quite useless, but its charms were not sufficiently powerful to induce us to expose ourselves to the night air and heavy dew, by remaining on deck until the boat had emerged from the excavation of the mountain ridge.

At daylight, on the 14th, we passed through the Tonawanta creek, up which the canal had taken its course for several miles; and by seven o'clock arrived at the village of Black Rock, where it enters the harbour formed for vessels trading upon Lake Erie. In company with another gentleman, I left the boat a mile below the village, and walked leisurely along the towing path, diverging from it at Black Rock, and passing through the principal street. Being on the frontier, it suffered during the barbarous and retaliatory warfare of 1812, but has again sprung up into a moderately sized place, schooners and small brigs being built there for the navigation of the lakes. The canal keeps along the bank of the river to the town of Buffalo, three miles distant, where it communicates with Lake Erie, having passed through an extent of country from its entrance to the Hudson not less than 363 miles.

Buffalo is a thriving, bustling town, handsomely and well built, and daily increasing in number of inhabitants. It was supposed to have received its death blow during the last war, but one house escaping the conflagration; it rallied again, however, upon the laying out of the canal, and has now a population of about 8000, and ere long promises to outstrip Rochester itself. Its situation, though having one front upon the lake, is far from agreeable, the surrounding country being flat and uncultivated. So low indeed is some part of the town, that heavy westerly gales raise such a swell on this vast inland sea as to cause a considerable inundation, frequently proving destructive to the property on the margin of the water.

During the morning we visited the Seneca tribe of Indians, who, to the amount of 700 or 800, possess a large tract of land of an irregular form, but containing about 100 square miles, to the S. E. of the town, upon which their farms and woods closely verge. The school in the mission house, four miles from Buffalo, is an object of great interest. It consists of from thirty to thirty-five boys and girls, between the ages of eight and fourteen, the greater portion of whom are maintained at the mission house by the society, the parents scarcely contributing any thing towards their support. The instructor informed us that some of them now and then brought a few provisions and some clothing, but nothing more. We heard the first class read the nineteenth chapter of St. Matthew, without any previous study, each scholar (there being eight in the class) reading two verses until the chapter was concluded, afterwards spelling and defining the most difficult words in it, in a manner which would have reflected great credit upon English children of the same age. Their mistress said that she invariably found them intelligent, willing and apt to learn; but their countenances appeared to me very heavy, and far from being indicative of sense. They are allowed to converse with each other in the English language only, and have been christened after the most approved American manner. In the first class, there were Phoebe, Letitia, Maria, and other awkward creatures, with similar rustic names; and two clumsy looking lads, of fourteen years of age, with faces as round and flat as a Cheesecake, were known as James and Edward, though I could imagine their distinctive titles amongst the tribe would be "Sleepy-eye," and "Owl." The mission has been established nine years; and, though there are but few church going people amongst the tribe, yet it is equally divided between the Christians and worshippers of the Great Spirit, the latter of whom are steady opposers of the mission and will never cross the threshold of the house. The tribe (which since the death of their celebrated warrior, "Red Jacket," has been governed by a kind of oligarchy of chiefs) is divided, according to their religion, into two distinct parties, which, though associating but little, yet live upon good terms with each other, having the same influence and an equal voice in the councils and management of the public affairs. All the reservation is common property; but, if any individual clears and encloses a tract for the purposes of cultivation, no one can interfere with that farm so long as he tills the ground; for the time being, it is to all intents and purposes his own. Many of the tribe are honest, industrious farmers; we saw several of them with their squaws riding to town on horseback, and in the common American carriage, or carry all. But the majority are indolent and intemperate, suffering much in winter for want of clothing and provisions, and being generally supplied with the necessaries of life by their richer and more sensible brethren, some of whom, even were they of the "pale faces," would be considered men of small but independent fortune.

The church, situated near the Mission-house, is a neat wooden edifice, with accommodation for about two hundred and fifty persons. The psalms and prayers are printed on one page of the book in the Seneca and on the opposite in the English language. The members of the church marry according to the established form.

We now proceeded to a house in the village (which is scattered widely over the country,) for the purpose of making some enquiries respecting their treatment of the cholera, which had already appeared with fatal effects amongst many of the Indian tribes. A party, amongst whom were several women, were sitting at the door busily employed in picking greens for dinner, despite the great outcry raised against vegetables at this time. The females, upon our approach, immediately rising, entered the house, while I entered into conversation with a heavy, dull-looking man. He spoke English, and was a thorough Yankee, guessing I came from the east, and reckoning that it was considerable sickly in New York. When I came to the point, however, and wished to discover the cholera remedy, he referred me to a lean, Roman-nosed, curly-headed man, who did not understand English, and put my questions as an interpreter to him. This man pointed out some herbs which grew wild in every direction, saying that they boiled and then administered them as a broth to the patient, wrapping him af-torwards in blankets, and producing great artificial heat in his body by means of hot stones, &c. This treatment had met with wonderful success, there being only eleven deaths out of one hundred cases, a much greater proportion of recoveries than amongst the "pale faces." I tasted the herbs, and found one to be the wild chamomile; the other was hot and pungent to the taste, and fiery as Cayenne pepper. The houses in the village were similar to those of the American labouring class, and the "Indian Hotel" was quite a respectable-looking edifice, and doubtless well attended. As in many other instances, I had formed very erroneous ideas of the personal appearance of the red men of the woods, imagining them to be noble-looking warriors, of fine stature, with countenances of the Grecian or Roman cast; but I found them more like the dark and vengeful Malay. A French gentleman, one of my fellow-travellers, had evidently formed a similar opinion; for when I pointed out to him a female of the tribe, who, with her papoose (infant) slung across her shoulders, and in her person resembling a moving bundle of old clothes, was walking past the hotel in Buffalo, he enquired with the greatest marvelé to what sex the person belonged, and, upon my informing him, exclaimed, raising his hands with astonishment, "Oh! la malheureuse! la malheureuse!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE KING'S DOMINIONS—NIAKARA FALLS—FORT GEORGE.

In the evening, taking a carriage, we drove to Black Rock, and, crossing the violent stream of Niagara to the little hamlet of Waterloo by a horse-ferry, stepped ashore into our own good king's dominions. I really felt quite at home again, for what reason I know not: I had experienced nothing but civility and attention in the United States; yet here we were at a hop, step, and a jump in another land. Every thing denoted a different country; the first signs we saw over the public-house doors were "the Crown," "the King's Arms," with other loyal superscriptions, and the first steamer which dashed past us was the "Adelaide." It was truly a relief to my eyes after the many and various Eagles I had sojourned at and the divers "Citizens' Union Line" steam boats, in which I had travelled.

We proceeded down the Niagara River, which flowing out of Lake Erie at Buffalo with a rapid descent, and varying from five hundred yards to two miles in width, empties itself after a course of thirty miles into Lake Ontario at Fort George. It was a mild and agreeable summer's evening, and, without viewing things with a prejudiced eye, I certainly never enjoyed a journey in the States so much as this one, and never travelled on a road, not excepting even the famous Ridge-way, to be compared with it. The bridges were strong and well built, the road level and free from corduroy and ruts, running the whole extent of our ride parallel to the river, without any fence intervening between us and the water, but flanked on the other hand by well cleared and cultivated grounds, and neat old-fashioned cottages. Of all our party, seven in number, probably I did not the most enjoy the scene, yet to me it was truly delightful,—one of those few which men are permitted to enjoy. Two hours' drive brought us to Chippewa Battle Ground, when I paid my respects to the field by walking over it, with the last true account of the action in my hand, to ascertain the position of the contending armies. While looking out for some mound or brief monument (of which there was not even a single vestige,) erected to the memory of the numerous brave who fell on the hard-contested day of the 5th of July, 1814, I saw the light white cloud of spray rising from the Falls of Niagara, beautifully gilded by the declining sun. Battle Ground, King's Arms, and well-cleared country, were alike forgotten, and, throwing myself into the carriage, I leaned back, keeping my eyes as intently fixed upon the white pillar of spray as the Mussulman does his penetrating gaze upon the new moon. Twenty minutes more took us past the bold and beautiful Rapids to the Pavilion Hotel. My French friends, true to their national feature, were noisy in exclamation and other tokens of surprise, joy, and astonishment; the English, characteristic of their country, spoke not a word; but, not the less feeling the beauties of the prospect, gazed on the magnificent scene in silent admiration. As I could almost pardon the Parsee for adoring so splendid a phenomenon as the rising sun in all its eastern glory, so could I excuse the red man of the woods for his devotion at the Falls of Niagara. How much more noble a deity than the muddy, slow, sacred stream of the Ganges! Probably we could not have been introduced to such a scene at a more favourable time; a brilliant rainbow was dancing in the spray, as it was agitated to and fro by the light evening breeze, and, even while we looked on, the last rays of the sun, as it sunk below the horizon, tinged the vapoury mist with a hue no artist could imitate. The snow-white wreaths of water, as they rushed over the broad ledges of rock with furious violence, for a mile above the falls, contrasted with the dark blue surface of the still calm current above, and the vivid green sheet as it shot forth from its dark bed over the tremendous precipice into the foaming abyss below, presented a scene which it is the good fortune of but few to see, of still fewer to appreciate, and which none can well describe. I have read many accounts and descriptions, seen innumerable prints and sketches of the Falls of Niagara; but not a single one ever gave me the remotest idea of their stupendous magnificence. I should say to all those people who possess the means of gratifying their admiration of the works of nature, "If you wish to form an idea of the noblest sight in the creation, cross the Atlantic, and, seeing, judge for yourselves."

Towards midnight, when nought was heard but the thundering of the mighty cataract, I walked out and stood on the bank for some time, looking at the awfully grand scene beneath me, which is equally sublime when viewed by the soft and silvery but indistinct light of the moon as during the brighter rays of the meridian sun, and is certainly more calculated in the former case to inspire a feeling of awe. Upon me the scene made a deep and lasting impression. Retiring to my bed, I dreamed of strange events, of vast waters rushing through my ears, of drowning people, of leaping fearful cataracts, and such a dreadful medley of perils by flood and field that I was well pleased to find myself, at break of day, snugly and safely lodged in a warm bed and secure house.

After breakfast the following morning I walked out to explore the falls more minutely, the preceding evening having afforded but a superficial view of them; and, proceeding a few paces from the hotel, I arrived at a zig-zag path, which led down the steep and wooded bank to the level of the river above the falls, which is about one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet below the surface of the surrounding country. The river's banks are between fifteen and twenty feet high, from Buffalo to the village of Chippewa, when the rapids commence and pass over a series of falls with a declination of sixty feet in a mile, until they reach the grand cataract, where the perpendicular descent of the Canada side is one hundred and fifty-eight, and on the American one hundred and sixty-four feet. An island of considerable extent divides the river into unequal portions, the Canada or Horse-shoe Fall (so called from its shape) being 1,800 feet in length, and the American but 900. The river, for some distance before arriving at this spot, takes an easterly direction, when, the falls being passed, it suddenly diverges at right angles and pursues a northerly course towards Lake Ontario. The formation of the Horse-shoe can be very naturally accounted for by the greatest rush of water being in the centre of the river, and by attrition wearing away the rock, so that the falls are slowly retiring towards Lake Erie. In process of time, some 10,000 years hence I suppose, by a moderate calculation, the upper lake will be drained, and a succession of rapids only will intervene between Huron and Ontario. The last time any quantity of rock gave way was about two years since, when nearly a quarter of an acre fell from the centre of the Horse-shoe, with such a tremendous crash as very sensibly to affect the ground upon which the hotel stands, and the cottages in the immediate vicinity. Neither the heavy autumnal floods, the melting of the winter's snow, nor breaking up of the ice, make any sensible difference in the colour or quantity of the vast body of water which flows down from the upper lakes. To fall into the rapids at Chippewa, or venture within a mile of the great cataract in a boat, is considered by the peasantry almost inevitable death. Many instances are on record of men and boats being carried over it, from attempting to cross the stream too rashly within the sweeping influence of the rapids. Nevertheless 'tis said, and I have heard it gravely asserted by some people, (though they were not eye witnesses certainly,) that an old squaw once ran the gauntlet of both rapids and falls in her birch canoe, and rising again, amongst the bubble and foam of the boiling abyss, she shook her long disheveled locks awhile to discover whereabouts she was, and then swam ashore unscathed, untouched! But—

"Credat Judæus Apella, Non ego."

She must have been one of the witches of old, taking a bath or a jaunt in her sieve for pleasure.

Had we but arrived a few hours sooner, we should have witnessed the destruction of the scow, which, laden with a horse, twelve hogs, two or three sheep, and a dozen cords of wood, had struck against the pier, in making the entrance to the Chippewa Canal, and springing a leak became unmanageable. The crew, immediately perceiving their danger, threw themselves into their canoe and effected their escape ashore. The horse, it was said (with the same instinct that prompted the bears who leaped from the schooner three years since, though it was intended they should pass the falls for the innocent amusement of some thousands of American spectators,) sprang overboard and swam ashore. The vessel, with the unfortunate animals left to their fate, was carried over the centre of the vast Horse-shoe, scarcely a vestige of the wreck ever reappearing. I walked for a mile along the beach in search of fragments of the vessel, but did not observe any of its timbers exceed six feet in length, although many of them were nine inches in thickness, and in no instance was there any portion of two planks still connected. The only sheep which appeared again above water, and which was driven ashore perfectly dead at the ferry, nearly half a mile below the falls, was dreadfully mangled. The bones of its legs were broken and even crushed, as if they had been placed in a vice; but a hog, which lay near it, showed no outward signs of injury, and only bled profusely at the mouth.

The wood which has passed the falls at various times has been collected in the small rocky inlets, and at the head of the backwaters, with the edges rounded off perfectly smooth by the incessant tossing it received before it floated out of the attractive power of the falls. Even the natives of the stream do not appear proof against their influence, as numerous dead fish are always to be found on the sides of the banks near the ferry.

The grandest view of the deep gulf into which the river descends is from Table Rock, a large projecting slab on the Canadian side, formed by the under stratum, which is of a soft substance, being washed away. Two guides live within a few paces of it, and each has erected an enclosed spiral stair-case, from his wooden shanty down the side of the rock, to the loose shelving bank eighty or ninety feet beneath, along which there is an easy path to the foot of the cataract. Having with two of my fellow travellers expressed a wish to walk behind the falling sheet, we were provided with oil-skin dresses, having first divested ourselves of our usual apparel. Our new garments were by no means the most comfortable which could have been devised; they had been made for men of all sizes, shapes, and dimensions, from Daniel Lambert down to the "anatomic vivante;" and I was some time arranging matters, so that I might have a chance of retaining possession, when the furious hurricane should inflate them like the bags of Æolus. The shoes had evidently visited the water two or three times daily for the last half-dozen years at least, and, having been as often exposed to the sun, had become nearly as hard and inflexible as sheet iron. To crown all, we had each a glazed hat, and, thus equipped, we descended the staircase, and, gaining the sloping bank, descended for seventy or eighty paces under the overhanging rock, until within a short distance of the dense cloud of spray, and dark semicircular entrance, when a council of war was held with regard to ulterior movements. The day was stormy, and inclined to rain; the wind blew in strong gusts up the stream, making the waves to curl up in wreaths of foam, and cast such a dismal gloom over every thing around us as to render the appearance of our undertaking far from inviting. One of the party backed out, asserting that his lungs were weak, and a friend had told him "there was a difficulty in breathing behind the fall," so that he would not attempt to explore the dark recess: a second said that he "decidedly would not go any farther, that there was nothing whatever to see, and that mere braggadocios only went behind, so that they might talk about it afterwards." I was thus left in the minority, but, as Falstaff says, "Honour pricked me on," and, being resolved to see all that was to be seen, I boldly told the guide to lead the way, and, with a caution to keep my head down, we entered the thick mist, boring our way slowly through it in the dark. The path was at first over a narrow ledge of rock, only a few inches in breadth, and affording but a very insecure footing; the guide however grasped one of my hands firmly, while with the other I took hold of the rough projections in the rock. The wind, which equalled a tornado, blew the water against my face in such torrents that I could scarcely see; but I felt no difficulty in breathing. After proceeding thirty or forty feet behind the sheet of water, the wind moderating a little, the water descended in a more perpendicular stream, and my surprise almost amounted to disappointment when the guide stopped, and said we had arrived at "Termination Rock." I scarcely credited that we had advanced one hundred and fifty feet, and made an attempt to pass the ne plus ultra, but found it utterly impracticable, the rock becoming too abrupt to afford either a footing or a firm hold to the hands. Until this point the path is about twenty-five feet above the level of the water, and the base of the curve, between the great body of the falling sheet and rock, is about forty feet. The guide here told me to look up; but the water dashed with such impetuous violence against my face, and the light shone so dimly through the watery medium, that I made the experiment but thrice. While I amused myself with shouting at the extent of my voice, the guide was making the best use of his time in securing a quantity of the eels which abound amongst the loose stones. I could scarcely, however, hear myself; so, despairing of having any effect upon the ears of my friends in the open air, I rejoined them but a trifle wiser than when I entered, and felt rather hard pressed for an answer to their oft-repeated enquiries of "Well, what did you see?" and their jests upon my half-drowned appearance, as I stumbled over the stones, pumping the water out of my shoes at every step, and my hair adhering to my cheeks in long straight lines. Having resumed my habiliments, the following certificate was handed to me, so that hereafter no one might venture to doubt my prowess:

"This may certify that Mr. Coke, British Army, has passed behind the great falling sheet of water to Termination Rock. Given under my hand at the office of the general register of the names of visitors at the Table Rock, this 15th day of August 1832.

"John Murray."

And on the reverse, as the medallist would say, the following exquisite morceau:—

"Niagara Falls."

The following was suggested by paying a visit to the "Termination Rock," one hundred and fifty-three feet behind the great falling sheet of water at the Falls of Niagara, on the 6th of August 1828:—

"Look up! look up! the spray is dashing—

Roaring waters foaming sweep;
O'er our heads the torrent's clashing,
Hurling grandeur down the steep.

Oh, mortal man! beneath that splendour,
How trifling, empty, vain, and poor!
Prepare then, sinner, to surrender
All thoughts unhallowed or impure.

Tremendous is the scene around us;
Oh, mark how wild the waters ring!
Terrific columns, bright, surround us:
Grand are thy works, O God, our King.

David M. Day's Print, BUFFALO.

Two days afterwards, those gentlemen who had deserted the cause on the previous occasion proposed to pass in rear of the fall, and, wishing to ascertain the appearance of it in a clearer state of the atmosphere, I accompanied them, and was much gratified with my second trip. The vast curved sheet over head now looked beautifully white and glaring, presenting an effect similar to that of the sun's rays upon ground glass, which render surrounding objects dim, and is too dazzling to gaze long upon. The smiling green verdure of the banks, with the deep blue sky reflected on the smooth surface of the river in the distance, and the brilliancy of the American Fall, seen through the thick spray at the entrance of this watery cavern, formed a strange contrast to the turbulence of every thing within. Though there was scarcely a breath of air without, yet the wind blew in the same heavy gusts behind the falls as on the preceding day, and, upon our return to the atmosphere, we were pushed out by the force of it so rapidly as to impress those persons standing without with the idea that we were escaping as rapidly as possible from the fall. I might be said to be bounding before it under bare poles; for, the guide's wardrobe being too scanty for our party of four, each of us was under the necessity of dispensing with certain portions of the requisite dress; and it fell to my lot to obtain only a pair of the afore-mentioned torturing shoes, a hat four inches less in circumference than my head, and a short frock coat of oil-skin, and thus equipped, a P.Ecosse, I encountered the fury of the storm. I should pronounce the undertaking perfectly safe for a man of the most delicate lungs, and even for ladies possessed of moderate nerves: one of the latter, with whom I have the pleasure of being acquainted, penetrated as far as Termination Rock, and I believe this is not a solitary instance. Any one who can make up his mind to walk out in a heavy thunder-shower, accompanied by a stiff gale of wind, may as safely venture in rear of the falls. With proper caution, there is no real danger; the first sight of the enormous column of water, as it descends from the mountain (Niagara being derived from two Indian words signifying "coming from above," or "from a mountain,") may raise fears, which, however, become dissipated on further acquaintance.

The hotel, and four hundred acres of ground, have been lately purchased by a company (of which, I believe, the British Consul at New York is the head,) who purpose founding a city, which is to be commenced immediately, under the name of the "City of the Falls," or "Clifton"—I forget which. The hotel, which is to be pulled down, may be well spared, without loss in any respect. It was not only a dirty and uncomfortable place, but I felt my English blood almost boil in my veins when I found myself sitting in company with two servant women at the table d'hôte, at the same time that their mistress occupied a place at the other end of the table. I could have very well accommodated myself to such neighbours in the States, but never expected to have found the levelling system introduced into the British provinces to such an extent. After being exposed to it during every meal for three days, I crossed the river to dine at the American village, where the hotel was much more comfortable, and kept by no less a personage than a general. This, however, was no novelty; for in such a nursery for militias, volunteers, and citizen guardsmen, as the States, a man need not think himself in the slightest degree honoured by being waited upon by a general officer.

The company of speculators intend erecting grist-mills, store-houses, saw-mills, and all other kinds of ornamental buildings, entertaining the most sanguine hopes of living to see a very populous city. The die then is cast, and the beautiful scenery about the falls is doomed to be destroyed. Year after year will it become less and less attractive. Even at this time they were surveying and allotting, and proprietors were planning one front of their house upon the falls, the other upon Lundy's lane, and meditating the levelling some of the rock, so as to form a pretty little flower-garden. It would not much surprise me to hear before many years have elapsed, that a suspension bridge has been thrown across the grand Horse-shoe to Goat Island, so that the good people of Clifton may be the better enabled to watch the pyramidal bubbles of air rising from the foot of the cataract. 'Tis a pity that such ground was not reserved as sacred in perpetuum; that the forest trees were not allowed to luxuriate in all their wild and savage beauty about a spot where the works of man will ever appear paltry, and can never be in accordance. For my own part, most sincerely do I congratulate myself upon having viewed the scene before such profanation had taken place. The small manufacturing town of Manchester (what a romantic name and what associations!), upon the American bank, at presents detracts nothing from the charm of the place, the neat white-washed houses being interspersed with trees and gardens; but when once the red and yellow painted stores, with their green Venetian blinds, tin roofs, and huge smoking chimneys arise, farewell to a great portion of the attraction Niagara now possesses.

A ferry-boat half a mile below the Canadian Fall, crosses to Manchester, landing the passengers within fifty yards of the American one, where the water is precipitated over a flat perpendicular rock three hundred yards in breadth. The prosperity of this village has been much retarded by two causes, one from its liability to destruction, being a frontier settlement; and the other—by no means an uncommon cause in the United States,—the extravagant price demanded by an individual, the great proprietor, for a grant of the water privileges allowed by the rapids. Two or three hundred yards from the bank above the ferry, and at the entrance to the village, a wooden bridge has been thrown over the rapids to a small island on which there is a paper mill, and connected with Goat Island, which is of considerable extent, and divides the two falls. Truly the men who were employed in the erection of this bridge must have been in full possession of Horace's æs triplex, for a more perilous situation could scarcely be imagined. A slip of a workman's foot would precipitate him into the rapids, whence he would pass with the rapidity of lightning over the falls. It was constructed at the expense of General Porter, an American officer of distinction, during the late war, and appears strong and firmly situated. The piers are of loose stones, confined together by a wooden frame or box, and the floor of planks twelve feet in width. There was one erected previously at the upper end of the island, and out of the great power of the rapids, it was continually subject to injury from the drift-ice, whereas in its present situation the rapids render the ice harmless, by breaking it before it arrives so low as the bridge. Goat Island is thickly covered with trees; but a road has been formed round it, and across it, to a position on the opposite side, from which the Canadian Fall is seen to great advantage. Another platform (for it can scarcely be called a bridge) has been constructed upon some detached masses of stone, called the Terrapin Rocks, which extend into the stream nearly three hundred feet, and to the very verge of the cataract. The platform projects twelve or fifteen feet beyond the last rock, so that a person standing at the end can look down into the foaming abyss. The situation apparently is not a very secure one, for the end is utterly unsupported, being merely upheld by the superior weight of the timber upon the last natural pier. A large party of us walked out to the outer extremity; but observing upon what a slight thread we were trusting ourselves, and the idea of the stage being overbalanced by our weight, and launching us all into the cataract and the next world, occurring to our minds, we soon retreated to a more secure position.

It has been estimated that upwards of 100,000,000 of tons of water pass the falls in an hour, of which at least two thirds fall over the Horse-shoe. The centre of this fall is particularly grand, the water falling in so thick a body that it descends nearly fifty feet in an unbroken sheet of the most vivid green. At the upper edge, where it begins to descend, the dark thin ledge of rock over which it is precipitated is distinctly visible, and gives the water in that part a beautiful and deep blue tinge. The noise of the falls is not near so stunning or so loud as the descent of so large a quantity of water might be supposed to produce. Some writer (Captain Hall, I believe) has compared it to that of the surf at Madras; the similarity of sound struck me, but I thought the roar of the waves breaking upon the sandy beach, even in moderate weather, much greater than that of Niagara. I have heard the former in calm evenings at the cantonment of Poonamalle, a distance of fourteen miles; but the latter was very indistinct at nine or ten. My bed-room at the hotel was only four hundred yards distant from the river, and I thought the noise of the falls, at night, much resembled that of boisterous and windy weather, and just sufficient for producing a most soporific effect upon me. Frequently I sat down upon the banks of the stream with my eyes closed, racking my brain in vain to discover what the sound of the cataract did really resemble. When the wind was blowing from the falls towards me at the distance of two miles, it was like that of a vast quantity of flour-mills at work, or large manufactories in the immediate vicinity. And then it appeared as if numerous carriages were driving at a furious rate along the road, and more than once I started up on my feet to ascertain who were coming. At times the noise would rise and fall as if the water were affected by some gust of wind or a heavy swell; the next moment the sound of machinery, and again the surf of Madras, would appear before me, and not unfrequently it would resemble the sound of a common waterfall, with which, probably, every one is well acquainted, but which almost any one would find it difficult to describe. Although Patch, of full-leaping celebrity, has generally the credit of leaping these falls, he is entitled only to that of having descended from a platform at an elevation of one hundred and twenty feet upon the staircase upon Goat Island into a backwater of the river.

The field of battle of Lundy's Lane is in the vicinity of a small village one mile from the falls, and was the scene of the hardest contested action during the late war. A burial ground has been formed and a church is in construction upon the rising eminence where the British artillery was posted, and where the bodies of those who fell were buried. The remaining portion of the field was purchased after the conclusion of the peace by an officer who was present in the action, and who now resides there.

The whole of this part of the frontier is a fine and fertile country; but, owing to its long settlement and bad mismanagement, the soil has become nearly exhausted. I did not see any part of America which I should prefer as a residence to that which lies between Lakes Erie and Ontario. It is much sought after by retired officers, and the better class of emigrants. The majority of the company at the hotel during my stay there consisted of families lately arrived, who were making purchases in the vicinity. If the settler seek society, he may meet a continued stream of his countrymen on their pilgrimage to the most stupendous natural curiosity in the world; and if he wish retirement, he may have it in perfection, for the attention of all travellers is so entirely engrossed by the one grand object, that they trouble not themselves with making visits, or intruding upon those who have settled down within hearing of the roar of the cataract.

Every one with whom I had previously conversed upon the subject most carefully impressed upon me that I should be disappointed with the falls. Like a good philosopher, therefore, I had prepared myself to meet the disappointment with calmness and resignation, recalling to my mind all the penny prints I had seen in my childhood, representing the pine tops, the bare rocks with a solitary goat or an Indian perched upon a promontory, and a smooth sheet of water rolling over the side of the said rock. The result was that I gazed upon them hour after hour, in the bright glare of the noon-day sun, the soft light of the moon, the sombre haze of the storm, the mild and lovely serenity of the summer's eve, with renewed and increasing admiration. I condemned those who had told me I should be disappointed as having no taste, and found fault with every living and dead author for not having sufficiently praised them. But I soon discovered that I could not succeed any better in description than in delineation of the scenery upon which the full power of my poor pencil was in vain bestowed, and all my labour was lost in attempting to give a representation which might impart to my friends some faint idea of the stupendous grandeur of the scene. The more a person gazes upon the falls, the more he admires them. New beauties appear with every change of wind and every passing cloud. In a damp and calm atmosphere, when the spray ascends like a dense fog to the height of 500 or 600 feet, and mingles with the clouds, the scene differs more than one who has not witnessed it can imagine, from the appearance on a clear, sun-shining, mid-day, when only a light mist rises and curls gracefully like the smoke of a distant hamlet, or as the sun verges towards the western horizon a beautiful rainbow is seen dancing in the spray, or when a strong breeze allows it to rise for a few feet above the upper level of the fall, and then sweeps it along within a few feet of the earth, it sprinkles the traveller, at the distance of half a mile, with a bounteous summer shower.

My time was so limited that I could spare only four days for Niagara, during which time my eyes were scarcely fit for any other object but the falls, and I parted from them with as much regret as if bidding farewell to an old friend, frequently turning round, when advanced many miles upon my journey, to gain a last glimpse of the light pillar of spray.

"What an idea Mr.— must have formed of them!" thought I, musing as I moved onwards. He was an old fellow-traveller I had met by chance at Buffalo, and, seeing him step into a coach after breakfast, I had the curiosity to ask him where he was bound to. "To the falls," was his reply. "And how long do you intend staying there?"—"I shall return in the evening;" and verily I met him eight hours afterwards half way back to the hotel from which he had started. He had hurried down to Manchester, fourteen miles distant, peeped at Goat Island, pulled across the ferry, toiled up the zig-zag road, peered over Table Rock, and throwing himself into another coach, hastened back by the Canada shore, and could now enjoy the satisfaction of telling his friends that he had seen the falls, or use the laconic word of the Roman, "veni, vidi."

An hour's drive brought us to Queenston Heights, upon which there is a monument of freestone 130 feet high, dedicated to General Brock.

We obtained a fine view from the summit of forts George and Niagara, with the vast expanse of blue waters of Lake Ontario, and York (the capital of Upper Canada) on its northern shore.

Lewiston, a mile from the ferry, on the opposite side of the river, though not possessing so fine a situation, promises to become a flourishing village; but presenting no object of interest, excepting the remains of Fort Gray upon the river's bank, I recrossed the Niagara, and arrived by sunset at Newark, Fort George, or Niagara (as it is severally called,) at the junction of the river with Lake Ontario. The first mentioned was the original name, but it was changed by law in 1798, and of late years has been more generally known as Fort George by the military and Niagara by the provincialists. As the Americans have a garrisoned fort of the latter name on the opposite bank, it creates much confusion and occasions frequent mistakes amongst travellers. Crossing the common, a crown reserve which is used as a race-course, my eyes were once again greeted with the sight of St. George's banner, and the athletic figure of a Highland sentinel, pacing to and fro on the broken ramparts of a fort near the entrance to the town. A few minutes brought us to the best hotel, where, though the landlord used his utmost endeavours by civility and attention to render us comfortable, yet still I could not resist drawing secret and inward comparisons between the American and Canadian hotels—comparisons indeed, which were far from favourable to the latter; and I began to find my British prejudices in favour of the infallibility of every thing Canadian already wavering.

The town occupies a pretty situation on the margin, and about twenty feet higher than the lake, which has so much encroached upon it by the waves undermining the banks, that batteries which were thrown up but a few years since, as near as possible to the margin of the water, for the laudable purpose of annoying the enemy's fort on the opposite peninsula, have now nearly disappeared. The common above the town is intersected with the breast-works and redoubts of the English and Americans, as each party alternately had possession. These works, which are now rapidly crumbling into dust, and possess but the shadow of their former greatness, might with some trifling expense be again rendered formidable. At the present time they are only put to shame by the neat, white appearance of the American Fort Niagara, which being built exactly opposite the English town, and not 800 yards distant, might annoy it by a very effective bombardment.

The following day being Sunday, I attended service at the Scottish and English churches. As the former had been commenced from the foundation within only a few months, the interior was in a very unfinished state; but the congregation was large, and I was much struck with the fine soldier-like appearance of two companies of the 79th Highlanders, who attended in their full costume.

There having been a death by cholera in the hotel during the night, I was anxious to leave the town immediately; but, no public conveyance travelling on the Sabbath, I was necessarily detained until mid-day on the Monday, when embarking in a steamer I crossed the lake, and in five hours entered the harbour of York, the capital of Upper Canada.

CHAPTER XIX.

YORK, KINGSTON—RIDEAU CANAL—MONTREAL.

The old Indian name of York was Toronto, and it was so called from the circular bay upon whose margin the town is built; but the same rage and bad taste for modernising the names of places has spread over the Canadas as in the United States. The first objects which meet the eye upon approaching the bay are the miserable barracks and mud fort upon the left, Gibraltar Point and Light-house on the right, and the large building of the new parliament house in the town, about a mile distant from the fort, in front. The town, containing between 8000 and 9000 inhabitants, is situated on low ground, which rises gradually as it recedes from the lake, but attains no great elevation. The streets are straggling and ill paved, but the greater proportion of the private houses and shops are of good substantial masonry. The public buildings, with the exception of government-house, which in point of external appearance is little superior to a cottage, are plain and excellent, and the English church, when completed, will be a tasteful and ornamental structure. The new parliament house, a spacious brick building, was in an unfinished state, and had been appropriated for the purposes of an hospital during the prevalence of the cholera, of which cases were daily landing from every vessel that brought emigrants from Montreal. It was truly melancholy to see some of the wretched objects who arrived; they had left England, having expended what little money they possessed in laying in a stock of provisions for the voyage and payment of their passage across the Atlantic, expecting to obtain work immediately when they landed in Lower Canada. Being deceived in these prospects, they became a burden upon the inhabitants of Quebec, or the provincial government. Forty-five thousand emigrants of all classes landed in that city during the first three months of the season, and the fate of many of them was miserable in the extreme. Nearly every headland of the St. Lawrence was occupied by a hospital, tenanted by numerous sufferers. Those who had some small funds, and intended settling in the lands belonging to the Canada Company, were forwarded to the upper country in the following manner. The emigrant who purchased not less than two hundred acres in the scattered crown reserves, or one hundred acres in the Huron Tract, received a passage to the head of Lake Ontario, upon depositing with the company's agent at Quebec a sum of money equal to the price of his conveyance to the head of the lake. After he had fixed upon his land, he showed the receipt for his forwarding-money to the company's agent at York, and it was taken in part payment of his second instalment, the company allowing the purchasers of their lands to pay by six instalments in five years, and giving them a right to occupy the lots after payment of the first instalment.

The situation of York is far from an inviting one, the inhabitants being subject during certain seasons to the fever and ague, caused by the marshy ground which lies close to the town and around the head of the bay. It is almost to be regretted that a better site could not have been chosen for the capital of an increasing country. Though a more central position than Kingston at the foot of the lake, yet in no other respects does it equal it. The bay is too shallow to admit vessels of even moderate burden, and in time of war it is always exposed to the incursions of American gun-boats, and the town subject to be sacked, as in 1813. Some years since it was proposed that the capital of Upper Canada should be on the borders of Lake Simcoe, and a water communication be opened with Montreal by means of the shallow lakes and Rideau Canal; but I believe all thoughts of removing the seat of government from York are now entirely laid aside. The land in the immediate vicinity is poor and cold, but becomes more fertile as the distance from the lake increases, and good farms are abundant towards Lake Simcoe, and on the side of the road called Yonge Street. The place is however only in its infancy as yet, and said to be increasing rapidly, though the comparisons between it and Buffalo, the last American town I had seen, and of a very few years' growth, were much in favour of the latter. There are no places of public amusement, and the chief diversion for the young men appeared to consist in shooting musquito hawks, which hovered plentifully about the streets and upon the margin of the bay in an evening. Upon these occasions the sportsmen made their appearance, equipped in shooting jackets, and attended by their dogs, as if prepared for the 12th of August on the moors of Scotland.

I found nothing here to make a longer stay than three days desirable, and was on the point of proceeding to Burlington Bay, for the purpose of seeing the head of the lake, and visiting Brandt, the celebrated chief of the Six Nations of Indians, who possess a large reservation there, when an officer, who had just arrived from Brandtford, informed me had seen a man dying of cholera in the chief's house the preceding day.* Being in a bad state of health myself at this time, and uncertain of obtaining medical assistance there if required, in company with a friend I embarked in a steamer, and arrived at Kingston the following morning, after an unpleasant voyage of twenty hours, over a short, dancing sea, which I found by far more disagreeable than the long swell of the Atlantic.

The town and uncomfortable inns were crowded to excess, owing to the assizes and the bishop's visitation occurring together; nor was it without great difficulty that we succeeded in obtaining a sleeping apartment upon the ground floor of the principal hotel. Justice appeared to be distributed and the representative of the law to be attired in the same plain and simple manner as in the States. We saw the sheriff dressed in plain clothes, but with a cocked-hat, queue, and sword, walking through the streets to the court-house, with a judge, undistinguished by dress, upon either side of him.

The town, which contains about 5000 inhabitants, lies upon the margin of an arm of the lake, with the navy-yard upon the opposite peninsula, formed by this inlet, and the entrance to the lake of the Thousand Isles. By the Indians, an old encampment which they had upon the spot where the town now stands was called Catarakwi. When the French became lords of the soil, they erected a fort, and named it Frontenac, in honour of the governor of Canada, and both were in turn ousted by the English; and Kingston, during the late war, being the great naval depot for the fleets upon the lakes, it was a busy, flourishing place, but declined with the peace. It may now, however, experience a re-action from the Rideau Canal communicating with the lake here, and be again restored to its former prosperity. This canal continues up the inlet of the bay until it reaches the first locks at the mills, five miles distant: the masonry and the whole workman-

* Brandt (or Tekanehogan, as he was sometimes called) was carried off by the same disease a few days after I left York. He had distinguished himself upon several occasions during the last war with the United States, and was a polished, well-informed man. His habits were those of a European, and, in his earlier days, he had resided for some time in England. His father's name has been immortalised in "Gertrude of Wyoming."

ship connected with them are much superior to those upon the Erie or Chesapeake and Ohio Canals. The total number of locks between Kingston and Bytown, upon the Ottawa River, one hundred and thirty-six miles distant, is forty-seven; their length about one hundred and forty, breadth thirty-three, and depth sixteen or seventeen feet. Dams, upon a very extensive scale, have been had recourse to throughout the line of canal, instead of excavations as in England. Where such works have been thrown across marshes, or the Rideau river, in order to swell the rapids and form a navigable stream, so vast an extent of stagnant water (in one place 10,000 acres) has been created as to render the settlements in the vicinity exceedingly unhealthy. I saw many of the workmen at the mills who were perfectly helpless from the marsh fever they had caught. These large inundations, however, in a few years will destroy the drowned forest, and a quantity of valuable land may then be reclaimed by small embankments. The whole work was completed at an expense to the imperial government of 700,000/. In the event of war with our neighbours, it will be found invaluable for the transportation of military stores and troops from the lower to the upper province, without being subject as heretofore to captures from the American force upon the St. Lawrence, or to running the gauntlet of the batteries upon their bank of the river. Like the Erie, in the state of New York, it will also encourage settlers along the whole line, as an outlet is now opened for the produce of their farms. Two steamers were at this time continually running between the Ottawa and Ontario, and the traffic of heavy boats also appeared considerable.

Several large hulks of vessels of war, built during the last war to cope with those of the Americans on the stocks at Sackett's Harbour, and which were never launched, are now fast falling to decay in the navy-yard at Kingston.

A seventy-four had been sold two or three months previously for 254, and a few days before our arrival a heavy squall of rain, accompanied by lightning, had split the St. Lawrence of 120 guns down the centre, and, the props giving way, the vessel broke into a thousand pieces, covering the ground all around with a heap of ruins. Ere long the remaining four or five frames will meet with a similar fate, as they are in a very advanced state of decay, partly owing to the want of proper care, and being run up hurriedly and of unseasoned timber. There is also the commodore's house (his flag, by the by, was at this time flying on a cutter stationed in front of this squadron of hulks,) and some fine marine barracks in the navy-yard. The ground rises abruptly in rear of them, and forms a shelter to the capacious bay in front of the town. On the summit of this elevated land a fort of considerable extent was repairing; it occupies an excellent position for defending the entrance to the harbour and the narrows of the St. Lawrence. The new barracks in the town are also fine substantial buildings enclosed by a loop-holed wall, and erected at the opposite extremity of the bridge to the marine barrack.

Brockville, upon the English bank, 50 miles from Kingston, is the prettiest town and situation I saw in Upper Canada. It is on the side of a hill, rising gradually from the St. Lawrence, with the Court-house and three churches on the summit, and the principal street running parallel with the water ornamented with a fine row of trees. The country on the bank below the town becomes better cleared and cultivated, with pretty hamlets and farm houses, which are well opposed to the dense dark forests on the American shore.

We arrived at Prescott, 72 miles from Kingston, early in the evening; but the inn was in so dirty a state, and the whole town presented such an uninviting aspect, that we were induced, in spite of the necessity of subjecting our baggage to the scrutiny of a custom-house officer, to cross the river to Ogdensburgh, immediately opposite, in the State of New York, where we found a comfortable hotel.* This town, which much differs in cleanliness of appearance from its Canadian neighbour, contains about 1200 inhabitants, and is situated at the mouth of the dark marshy waters of the Oswegatche, which, flowing from the Black Lake, eight miles distant, unites here with the deep blue St. Lawrence. The remains of the barracks, originally built by the French, and occupied by the British prior to the cession of the town in 1796, but burnt in the subsequent war, are seen on the point of land formed by the junction of the two streams.

Prescott contains from 800 to 1000 inhabitants; and being the head of the small craft navigation from Montreal, and the foot of the sloop and steam navigation with Lake Ontario, much business is carried on in the forwarding of goods and travellers, and a vast deal more in the smuggling line. Endless are the disputes and broils on account of the seizure of a steam-boat which plies between the two towns every ten minutes for the convenience of passengers, who are not unfrequently well supplied with contraband goods. Broadcloths and English goods of every description being much cheaper in the Canadas than in the United States, the summer shoal of Yankee travellers unite pleasure and business in their tour to see the Falls of Niagara and the fortifications at Quebec, by ordering their stock of apparel for the year at Montreal, thus evading the frontier duty. Many of the mercantile houses in Prescott and Ogdensburgh are connected. I had some conversation with a storekeeper who sat next to me at the table d'hôte in the latter town, and, walking into a warehouse in Prescott the following day, found him busily employed there. He said he had another establishment on the opposite side of the river.

After a detention of two days we succeeded in meeting with a bateau, which was proceeding down the St. Lawrence, a mode of travelling we considered preferable to a heavy coach over a bad road. The boat had arrived the preceding evening at Prescott with fifty Irish emigrants, after a passage of eight and a half days from Montreal, and was returning with a cargo of 100 barrels of flour from the Cleveland mills in Ohio, which, after payment of a duty of one dollar per barrel, at the Coteau du Lac, where it crosses the frontier, is rated as Canadian flour, and finds its way to England in British vessels. The bateau was a strong built craft, from 40 to 45 feet in length and 7 or 8 in width, and, being heavily laden, so much preparation was made by nailing skirting-boards round the bulwarks to prevent the spray damaging the cargo that I imagined we had embarked upon rather a dangerous undertaking. The whole complement of navigators, captain included, were longer in setting our solitary piece of canvas than it would have occupied the crew in reefing topails on board of a man-of-war. Our steersman bore the character of being the steadiest and most able pilot upon the river, having been accustomed to the navigation of it for twenty years. He took the vessel down the first rapid with sail set, which is considered rather an unusual thing, and so very slight was the inclination of the water that we began to think, if such were the far-famed rapids of the St. Lawrence, that the whole affair was a complete bugbear.

Passing sufficiently close to Cryslar's farm on the left bank to see the riddled gable ends of the cottages, and the extent of the position where the American army was repulsed in November 1814, when on their march to Montreal, we approached the rapids of the Long Sault. Our sail was stowed snugly away some time before we came in sight of the white breakers, and, as soon as the bateau dashed into the heavy swell, it evidently became a difficult matter to guide it. The steersman had laid his hat upon the deck, and his lips moved as he muttered a prayer to some favourite saint, whilst every nerve was strained in the guidance of his helm, as if the slightest deviation from the narrow track would subject us all to destruction. Upon the summit of every wave, the boat gave a bound forwards; the centre of it, yielding to the shock, rose and fell with the motion of the waves, and, when it entered an eddy at a bend in the river, the full power of the oars was required to prevent it breaching to, when we should have inevitably been lost. The descent on the Canadian side of the river cannot be made, excepting for rafts of timber, and the only channel is by the terms of the treaty thrown entirely into the hands of the Americans, the islands being divided, by each power taking the alternate one; the island in this place lies between the channel and the British shore. With an unskilful or timid pilot, the descent of the rapids would be a perilous undertaking, as any chance of safety by swimming would be hopeless; and for real pleasure one descent is quite sufficient. If I were ever to travel down the course of the St. Lawrence again, I should take the land conveyance from Prescott to Cornwall, though I never enjoyed myself more than during the five hours I was on board the bateau this day, and we outstripped the coach two hours and a half in the journey of fifty miles. We saw a steam-vessel which was off the stocks and nearly completed at Prescott, for the purpose of running down the smaller rapids, and constructed upon a novel principle. The vessel was of great length and extremely narrow in the beam, with six long cylindrical boilers, and the paddles astern, on the supposition that in ascending the stream they will propel the vessel quicker than paddles on the sides, which might retard its progress, by being opposed to the full power of the current. Four rudders were placed equi-distant on the stern, so as to give the steersman more command over the vessel in the violent eddies; and, if the experiment answered in the smaller rapids, it was intended to attempt the passage of the Long Sault.

After passing a most miserable night, toiling about in a heated room, and disturbed by the whispering and screaming of children, and the scolding of mothers, we embarked on the morning of the 28th of August on board a steamer, at that most uncomfortable of all homes aboard a ship,—five o'clock, when the passengers are all asleep in the cabin, the crew are washing and scrubbing the decks, and a thick cold mist rises from the surface of the water. The boundary line between the British territories and the United States runs on the verge of the village of St. Regis where the Iroquois tribe of Indians have a large settlement, a few miles below Cornwall, and just within the Canadian frontier. Their priest, a French Canadian, came on board and accompanied us to Montreal: he was a sensible, well-informed man, and told us, in the course of conversation, that he was a native of Quebec, and had never been out of the provinces, though he intended visiting Europe the ensuing season. His whole tribe, 800 in number, were Catholics, and, with the exception of 70 or 80, much addicted to drink, their mode of life (being employed in the arduous work of transporting goods up the river to Prescott) rather encouraging their natural inclination for spirituous liquors. The cholera had been raging amongst them violently, eighty of the tribe having died in a very short space of time, the priest performing the duties of surgeon in addition to his own. He was evidently a worthy man and much esteemed by the tribe: All the Indians we met upon the road and even in the streets of Montreal, sixty miles distant, saluted him by touching their hats and smiling with pleasure when they saw him. Throughout the country every one spoke in high terms of the exemplary conduct of the priests during the prevalence of the disease. The Iroquois have a second village at St. Louis of five hundred inhabitants, within a few miles of Montreal, and there is a third of four hundred farther down the St. Lawrence. We were informed by the priest that during the war of 1812, and the two ensuing years, the tribe took an oath at the altar, before entering the field, that they would not commit any cruelties upon their prisoners nor even scalp their enemies when dead, and that in no single instance was this sacred pledge broken. They had bestowed one of their significant, fine-sounding names upon him, the pronunciation of which I was attempted to learn, but the interpretation of it was—"The man who carries the work;" that of his predecessor in the pastoral duties had been "the rising sun," from his eyes being generally fixed upon the heavens.

At the village of Coteau du Lac, at the lower extremity of Lake St. Francis, we took coaches through a flat but well-cleared country, with a continued street of French settlers' houses on the road side. At the Coteau rapids there is a fort of considerable extent; and a few miles further are the Cedars, the prettiest rapids on the St. Lawrence, where a detachment of General Lambart's army was lost through the unskilfulness of the pilots, when moving down to the attack of Montreal in 1776. A canal is now excavating for the purpose of avoiding these rapids, which are more dangerous than any of the others, the water being shallower. As we passed them the wreck of a bateau was visible above the surface. At a point of land below the Cedars we again embarked on a steamer, and, proceeding through Lake St. Clair, passed a fort erected during the late war by a convict at Montreal in a spirit of loyalty. It appeared to be kept in excellent repair, and formed a pretty object upon a headland of the smooth lake. A cross erected on the summit betokened its present unwelcome occupation, and accordingly we found it now the residence of monks.

At the village of Lachine, on the island of Montreal, we again landed, and took coaches through a densely populated country, and on that account more closely resembling Europe than any district I had seen in America. The suburbs of Montreal are much like those of a French town, and crowded with small taverns with seats and trees in front of them. Signs are suspended across the street, upon which all the good things that may be obtained within the house are recommended, and inscriptions in both languages attract the traveller. One or two dispensers of café and eau-de-vie have mounted higher than their neighbours, and posted up some such couplet as the following:—

* Major Hamilton & Co. would have made a round-about journey rather than make such an acknowledgment:—Ed.

"Belfast Hotel.

Good morning, friends—
Come in and rest—there's yet a chair,
As you can have refreshments here."

The city when viewed from the low range of hills upon which the road is formed, has much the appearance of a European town. The approach to it from Lachine, nine miles distant, is exceedingly fine, the city being backed by the broad St. Lawrence and a bold mountainous country; but, upon entering it, we passed through such narrow and filthy streets, that it seemed to me sufficient to account for the dreadful mortality which had taken place from the cholera. Every seventh person had been cut off in the course of a few weeks, and every one seen in the streets showed by his dress that he was mourning the loss of a relative or a friend. At the time the disease was raging with the greatest violence, there being from 170 to 200 deaths daily out of a population of 32,000, a stranger entered the city, in his appearance almost resembling an Indian Paquir. His beard had been unshorn for weeks; his attire was tattered, and but little better than that of a common mendicant. He carried several small cases suspended from his neck, containing hog's lard, maple sugar, and charcoal, with which he proclaimed he would check the fury of the disease, and exposed himself wherever his assistance was required without receiving any remuneration. Many of the people looked upon him as being deranged, and held him up to ridicule; but others, who had seen whole families of their dearest friends swept off in a single day, were anxious to catch at any thing which bore even a most distant chance of cure along with it. Whether from having faith in these his simple medicines, or that they actually had some effect, I know not, but they grew so into repute that, when I arrived at Montreal, the "Charcoal Doctor" (as he was called) was catemmed by some as no less than their guardian angel. I saw a long letter addressed to him, signed by nearly two hundred people whom he had attended, and who did not hesitate to say that they considered him as sent by Divine Power to their assistance. He was now residing in an eminent practitioner's house, and still attended persons without making any charge for his services, only whoever required them paid for the hire of a carriage, his practice being too extensive for a pedestrian. I never could ascertain, nor could any one, I believe, have informed me, whence he came, who he was, or any thing about his previous life. There were, of course, ten thousand surmises, but the general opinion appeared to be that he was an American, from one of the New England States, and had been residing among the Indian tribes for many years, until accident had informed him of the dreadful pestilence raging in Montreal.

CHAPTER XX.

DESCRIPTION OF MONTREAL.—WOLFE AND MONTCALEM—FALLS OF MONTMORENCY.

The island upon which Montreal is built is about 32 miles in length and seven in breadth, and formed at the junction of the Ottawa, or Grand River, which divides the Upper from the Lower Province, and the St. Lawrence. The black waters of the former river do not mix with those of the St. Lawrence even at the city, which is ten miles below the union of the two streams; but a distinct line or boundary between their waters can be seen at a considerable distance. This circumstance gave rise to the old Indian saying of, "As soon shall the waters of the Ottawa mix with those of the St. Lawrence as the blood of the red man with that of the pale faces." The river in front of the city is nearly two miles wide, but the depth is only sufficient for brigs and ships of small burden, of which but a very few lay in the stream at this time, though more mercantile business is transacted here than at Quebec. A noble quay extends for some distance along the margin of the water, and, being constructed of good substantial materials, is a great ornament to the city: it was only just completed, from the design of Captain Piper, I believe, of the Royal Engineers.

The prettily wooded island of St. Helens, two miles in circumference, lies opposite the town. There is a small fort and barracks at its lower extremity, which must, however, have been constructed only for the purpose of disputing the passage of the St. Lawrence, as the rocks rise so closely behind some of the buildings that a moderately active man might leap without much exertion on to their roofs, or a small party of riflemen might subject the garrison to great annoyance. It is the grand depot of artillery and military stores for Canada; and, judging from late circumstances, such an establishment is much required. The 15th regiment of foot were encamped amongst the trees, having withdrawn from their quarters in the city in consequence of the cholera having made such havoc in the ranks; and, though at this time only half a mile distant from their barracks, not a single case had occurred since their residence in the island.

The mountain from which the city derives its name rises about 700 feet above the level of the river, and two miles in rear of Montreal. The summit and half way down its sides are covered with forest, but the base is occupied by some neat houses, with gardens and ornamental grounds.

The city possesses some fine public buildings, of which the catholic cathedral is probably superior to any thing of the kind on the whole American Continent, or any structure of the 19th century. The funds failed before it was completed; the tower, therefore, and some of the exterior ornamental work are unfinished. It is of dark gray stone, and built after the Gothic style of architecture. The dimensions of the interior are 255 by 130 feet, and it is capable of containing 12,000 people, there being two galleries on each side of it. The vaulted roof is supported by eighteen columns, stained in bad imitation of marble, and, with great want of good taste, has been chequered with alternate black and white stripes, which detract much from its beauty. At the south end, there is a large stained window, representing the ascension of our Saviour, but in my opinion executed in too gaudy a style to be pleasing: bright greens, and yellow, which are the predominant colours, neither have a good effect, nor do they throw a soft and mellowed shade over the body of the church.

I was shown through the Convent of gray nuns by a garrulous veteran of the 29th regiment, who had joined his corps in Canada in 1785, and the Hospital in 1791, having lost his left leg by accident. His recollections of England were indeed very faint; he had an indistinct idea that it was not so well wooded as America, that turnpike roads were more general, and that the population was rather thicker upon the ground, but nothing farther. He asked me if I was acquainted with Mr. Walton of London, and Mr. So-and-so of Liverpool; and, though by his own account he was a native of some village in Herefordshire, I overheard him telling one of the nuns that he came from the same town as myself and was well acquainted with my family! The hospital or convent (for it is known by both names) is situated between the St. Lawrence and a deep, dirty creek, over which a stone arch was erecting, so as to cover it in, the prevalence of the cholera having been partly attributed to the unwholesome effluvia arising from it. It is a large heavy pile of building, and has been much augmented of late years; the chapel was also now enlarging by means of funds transmitted from France, and, when I entered it, the fat old superior and two of the sisters were planning improvements, assisted by a host of carpenters and masons. All religions, sects, and nations, are alike admitted; and but lately the representatives of nine different nations were within its walls. Every room was neat and clean, and the inmates appeared as comfortable and happy as infirm and aged people could be. Including from fifty to sixty orphans, there were no fewer than 300 inmates; but a striking difference was apparent between the care and attention paid to the legitimate and illegitimate children: they were not only in separate rooms, but the former were far neater in their personal appearance, and bore evident symptoms of being better cared for than the others, who it would seem were supposed to have less powerful claims. A considerable income is derived from the sale of little fancy articles made by the nuns, of whom there are nearly thirty, and by the children, every visitor purchasing a few, for which he generally pays well without scruple, having been witness to the excellence and benefit of the institution. Though I visited it as early as half past 10 o'clock, I found old and young sitting down at well covered dinner tables.

The catholic is the prevailing religion in the city, and the Seigniory of the island is held by the clergy of that church, from which, with a heavy per centage upon the transfer by sale of all real estates, a large revenue is derived. Though so many English and Scots reside in the city, the French language is very generally spoken, and but few of the natives of the lower class speak English fluently. The shops are very excellent, and I never saw in one place so many for the sale of clothes, the entire street of Notre Dame being occupied by them. The market-house is not only a shabby, but a dirty building; at the head of it is a monument erected to Nelson, about thirty feet in height, surmounted by his statue, with an inscription and relieves upon the pedestal. Adjoining it is the Place d'Armes, a levelled platform on the side of the hill upon which the city stands. Its length is about 300 yards, and breadth 100, and is a fine promenade, but no ornamental buildings front upon it. One side overlooks some fields, and the others are formed by the rear of the jail and some common private dwellings. The hotels are excellent, and the British American, where I resided during my stay at Montreal, is very comfortable—in fact, the finest house for the accommodation of travellers in the Canadas. A person is there relieved from witnessing the disagreeable habits so common in the United States; the habits indeed of the provincialists differ but very little from those of the old country.

There appeared, I was sorry to see, a most violent ill-will existing between the French and English settlers, which was carried to an extraordinary pitch on the side of the former, who in their public meetings did not hesitate to accuse the British government of sending a torrent of protestant emigrants "to wrest their native country from them, and (to quote the language of one of their orators) to obtain the disposal of a property which ought to serve as an outlet for the industry of the Canadian youth, and as an asylum for their posterity." But he yet hoped "that they might preserve their nationality, and avoid these future calamities, by opposing a barrier to this torrent of emigration." A resolution to the same intent was passed at a meeting held at St. Charles's, at which opulent and influential persons, who had filled high and honourable posts in the colony, took a lead. The Montreal Herald, an able and well-conducted paper, in noticing the proceedings of this meeting, says of the above resolution, "This uneasiness about the uncultivated lands arises from the anxiety of a party (who have long lived upon the delusive dream of one day reverting to France, or being able to revolutionise Canada) to arrest emigration, and thus prevent the settlement of those lands by British subjects, which must of course strengthen the hands of the government, and for ever dissipate the ridiculous idea of 'La nation Canadienne.'" At this same meeting the British were also accused of having introduced the cholera into Canada; or, in the words of the resolution itself (the 13th), "That England will, in any case, have to justify herself, for having suffered so considerable an emigration at a time when she was under the frightful influence of the cholera, which by this means has been introduced into this colony, the climate of which is the most healthy in all America, and has covered it with mourning and desolation." I must confess that the little I saw and heard of the French Canadians impressed me with very unfavourable opinions of them. In the full enjoyment of their own religion, civil laws, and political rights—burdened by no taxes of any description—with free trade, and England's protection, they were dissatisfied and discontented. Not the slightest wish to improve the state of the country was any where visible; but every public undertaking of any importance was the work of too kind a stepmother. I had crossed the frontier with the expectation of finding one of the happiest and most loyal nations in the world; but, as far as my judgment went, found it far otherwise. To me the Canadians appeared utterly devoid of that spirit of enterprise which distinguishes the English and American settlers; and, though three fourths of the inhabitants of Lower Canada (or nearly 300,000) are of French descent, they are almost confined to the original settlements, along a narrow strip on the banks of the St. Lawrence, where they have impoverished the soil by their slovenly system of farming.

Leaving Montreal at eight o'clock in the evening, I lost a view of the scenery below the town, and of Sorrell at the mouth of the Chambles or Sorrell river, where the governor-general usually passes some of the summer months. But the recollection of our two hours' stay there is well impressed upon my memory. It was about midnight when we arrived, and the few passengers (only sixteen in number) had early retired to their berths. The vessel was scarcely moored alongside the pier ere I was awakened from a sound sleep by the violent screams of some poor man whom the crew were carrying ashore, just attacked by the cholera. I had been suffering much the preceding week from an illness which at one time threatened to take a dangerous turn, and had not yet recovered from the effects of it. I shall never forget the misery I endured the remainder of that night; I threw myself off my cot, and walked the upper deck in the cold night air, while the screams of agony still rung in my ears, and paced up and down until dawn of day, by which time I had mustered up all my stoicism, and was prepared for any event. A naturally good constitution, however, in a few days enabled me again to undergo almost any fatigue.

The steamers on the St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec, are superior to those even on the American waters which had so much surprised me. The "British America" and "John Bull" are fitted up in a magnificent style, and are complete floating drawing rooms. The dimensions of the latter are on the grandest scale, being 188 feet in length by 70 in breadth, the wings included, and about 1200 tons burden. Its name is well merited, having towed six vessels, two of them of 350 tons, from Quebec up to Montreal, at one time. The traveller may really experience something like comfort on board of them, there not being the crowd of passengers, nor the scramble for meals, to which he is so accustomed in the States.

The country below the town of Trois Rivières, at the mouth of the St. Maurice, becomes more diversified, affording occasional views of rising hills below Quebec, and long streets of houses with white roofs and walls, which, when first seen at a distance on the lofty banks of the river, may be easily mistaken for a large encampment. The French settlers usually paint the roofs white, as tending to preserve the shingles of which they are constructed, and also to repel the heat of the sun's rays. I have seen many washed in this manner from the foundation to the ridge pole, and the chimney painted black; I always thought they bore a close resemblance to a negro woman decked out in her best bib and tucker. After passing the mouth of the Chaudière river, over which a fine bridge of one arch is thrown, and entering Wolfe's Cove, the shipping and fortress of Quebec begin to open out from behind a promontory; and few places can boast of so magnificent an approach. The bold craggy rocks of Cape Diamond, crowned with the impregnable fortress, stand in bold relief against the sky; numerous ships lie at their anchorage in the broad and smooth river, 350 feet beneath, between the citadel and point Lévi; and in the distance a lofty range of blue hills form a fine background to a level and thickly populated country. For some time the old and picturesque buildings only of the lower town at the water's edge are visible; nor until within the distance of half a mile from Point Lévi does the upper town, with its numerous glittering spires and convent roofs, begin to show itself on the opposite side of the citadel, or the more prominent object, the castle of St. Lewis, the residence of the governor-general. It is supported upon the edge of the precipice by large buttresses under the foundation of the outer wall of the building, and almost overhangs the houses at the margin of the water. But all these favourable impressions are dispelled upon entering the dirty narrow streets of the lower town; nor was it until after much perseverance that we obtained accommodation of a very indifferent kind in the upper town. The principal hotel had been closed, without any consideration for the comfort of a few travellers, as soon as the cholera broke out, the landlord finding that he was a loser by keeping the establishment open.

The capital of Lower Canada occupies the tongue of a peninsula formed by the junction of the St. Charles with the St. Lawrence, and contains upwards of 20,000 people. The upper town is encircled by a strong wall nearly three miles in extent, with batteries at intervals, and is entered by five gates, the principal one from the harbour being at the summit of a steep and winding road up the side of the rock. The lower town is built in some places upon piers, and land reclaimed from the river: in others by undermining the base of the rock. Instances have occurred (one during my residence in America) of large portions of it giving way and rushing down upon the roofs of the houses from a height of two or three hundred feet.

The citadel, which is the great lion of the place, occupies a large proportion of the upper town, and is situated upon the highest part of Cape Diamond, a hard but brittle rock with quartz crystals interspersed. The stone, however, is not of a fit quality for the fortifications, and the materials used in their construction are brought by the St. Lawrence from Montreal to the foot of an inclined plane, which has been constructed from the river into the interior of the citadel, and hoisted up the railway by means of machinery. Great additions were making within the fortress, but the old French walls, erected during the time of Montcalm, and which the engineers were facing afresh, were yet firm. Much yet remains to be done in the interior, and even on the exterior works on the face towards the plains of Abraham.

An obelisk has lately been erected by the officers of the garrison to the memory of Wolfe and Montcalm, in front of the government gardens. It is 65 feet in height, but bears no inscription, nor even the names of the heroes in whose honour it was erected. The plains upon which both fell lie about a mile to the west of the citadel, from which the ground rises and falls in small and abrupt undulations. The field of action is yet open, and used as a race course; but the rock against which the British general reclined, when dying (near a redoubt which may be even now traced out on the borders of the plains,) was destroyed by blasting with gunpowder some time since, the Vandalic proprietor of the garden in which it was situated complaining that his fences were injured by the curiosity of visitors. There is a figure of Wolfe carved in wood, and fastened at the side of a house at an angle of a street about 12 feet from the ground, which has always been considered an excellent likeness. The general appears in rather a strange costume for a warrior: a double breasted red frock coat with yellow facings, cocked hat, yellow top boots, white breeches, and white shoulder belt for his sword: his position—one arm a-kimbo, and the other extended as in the attitude of giving orders. The spot where General Montgomery was killed in his attack upon Quebec on the night of the 31st December, 1775, is within a few paces of the foot of the inclined plane, and his remains were interred, until 1818 (when they were removed to New York,) near the gate of St. Lewis.

The Jesuits' convent, which reverted to the crown some years since, is now occupied by a regiment of infantry, and makes an excellent and capacious barrack. What was the fathers' pleasure garden in olden times is now the parade ground. In other respects it appears to have undergone very little change (except with regard to its occupants,) being surmounted by the old spire, and retaining the strong iron-studded gates, with the sacred devices upon them. On the opposite side of the market place is the large and ungraceful building of the Roman catholic cathedral, where I attended one day at the performance of high mass, but was glad to make my escape again into the open air, such a dense crowd was there in every part of. As in Montreal, the catholic clergy possess an extensive property in Quebec. The seminary which adjoins the cathedral occupies, together with its garden, seven acres of ground in the upper town, the Ursuline convent possesses as much more, and the Hôtel Dieu even as much as twelve; so that, what with the citadel, convents, churches, barracks, and open squares, the population of the upper town is reduced to a mere cipher compared with its extent.

The old parliament house, situated near the gate leading from the St. Lawrence on the eastern side of the town, was formerly the residence of the catholic bishops. It is a crazy old edifice, and much requires the support of a new wing, which is now erecting.

Although there is little of interest in Quebec itself, yet the surrounding scenery is sufficient to compensate for any loss. In company with two English gentlemen, I made an excursion on the 1st of September to the Falls of Montmorenci, about seven miles from the city. The road crosses the St. Charles river over a long wooden bridge, and becomes execrably bad as soon as the outskirts of the lower town are passed, although a continued line of houses and small farms extend the entire distance. The hills which run parallel with the river, at the distance of ten or twelve miles, form the boundary of the narrow belt of cultivation. Putting our horses up at the small French inn on the banks of the Montmorenci, we walked down to view the Falls; but with what far different feelings from those with which we had visited Niagara three weeks before! We had been told every where in Quebec of the Falls of Montmorenci, and consequently considered ourselves, as travellers, in duty bound to visit them, though, had each of us spoken the candid truth, we should have said we had seen quite sufficient falls of water to satisfy the taste of any moderate man. And really Niagara, the great climax of every thing grand in a cataract, gives one a sad distaste for all future sights of that description. No one, unless he is blessed with the happy talent of forgetting things as soon as he has seen them, should venture near another fall for at least a twelvemonth after he has seen that at Niagara. If he does, it is ten to one that he annoys his friends who act as chaperons upon the occasion, by showing the most perfect indifference, or something even approaching to sovereign contempt, at the sight.

At Montmorenci the fall itself is every thing: there are no grand accompaniments. The water shoots in a sheet about 120 feet broad over a precipice to the depth of 240 feet, and then rolling onwards a few hundred yards unites with those of the St. Lawrence. The banks on each side of it are smooth and precipitous, with their summits crowned with trees, and a mill is perched on high upon the verge of the Fall. There is, however, a fine view of Quebec, and the isle of Orleans which forms the eastern side of the noble harbour, from the junction of the rivers. One of my companions and myself thought proper to ford the Montmorenci below the Falls, where it is 1500 feet broad, to the ruins of a large saw mill upon the opposite side, for the purpose of ascertaining the depth of water and forming some idea of the difficulty of the heroic Wolfe's enterprise when he stormed the French batteries under a heavy fire. In twenty-five minutes we gained the opposite bank, having narrowly escaped being washed off our legs several times; but our wounded feet, (owing to the sharp edges of rocks,) with cramped and stiff legs for the next forty-eight hours, gave us ample cause to repent our undertaking. The mill, which was the most extensive in the province, had, by some strange accident or neglect, been consumed by fire a few months previous, though a sufficient body of water could have been thrown upon it to have almost washed away the entire building. A broad and deep water course conducts a powerful stream from above the Falls along the summit of the bank until immediately above the mill, when it rushes down an inclined plane of 300 feet in length, with amazing power upon the wheels. From it, conduits were so arranged as to lead the water throughout the building in case of necessity, but all appeared to have been of no avail in staying the destruction. Several acres of ground were covered with the timber which had been prepared for exportation. Wolfe's Cove was also so densely covered with it that it was like one huge red; and, notwithstanding thirty or forty vessels were lying in, it made no perceptible diminution.

CHAPTER XXI.

DESCEND THE ST. LAWRENCE—ANECDOTES—JOURN TO FREDERICKTOWN.

The wind it was fair, and the moon it shone
Serenely on the sea,
And the vessel it danced o'er the rippling waves,
And moved on gallantly. Old Ballad.

Previous to the appearance of the cholera, a steamer plied between Quebec and Halifax in Nova Scotia, but, owing to the long quarantine imposed upon vessels arriving at the latter port without a bill of health, the proprietors declined making any further trips until Quebec should be pronounced free from infection. This was the most unexpected impediment to the tour I had meditated, through the eastern provinces, and the uncertainty of the length of voyage in a sailing vessel was such that I lost to the resolution of making an overland journey through the dense forests, or paddling myself in a canoe down the rivers into New Brunswick. My time, too, being very limited, it was necessary that I should either pursue that course or lay aside all thoughts of seeing any thing further of the British provinces. My friends attempted to dissuade me from the undertaking, on account of the lateness and unhealthiness of the season, and the weight of a hair would almost have turned the scales, when I fortunately became acquainted with Mr. Reid (a gentleman from Georgia,) who having much the same object in view as myself, we agreed to make the journey in company. Having, therefore, laid in a small stock of provisions, a bottle of laudanum, a whole box full of opium pills, with a suitable quantity of eau-de-vie and eau-de-vie, as a precaution against the cholera, we set sail with a light westerly breeze down the broad St. Lawrence, at mid-day on the 3d of September. As the weather appeared settled and pleasant, we preferred taking an open pilot boat to travelling in a carriage over a hundred miles of rough road, and at considerable additional expense, the owner of the land conveyance having the conscience to demand fifteen dollars per diem for the trip.

Being ebb tide, we glided rapidly past the isle of Orleans, where those huge floating masses of timber, the Columbus and Baron Renfrew, were put together, and by the time the flood had set in, were thirty-eight miles from Quebec; when not having sufficient breeze to stem the tide, we came to an anchor. The sun had set some time, but it was a mild and pleasant evening, with a bright moon shining overhead, and every star in the heavens so clearly reflected in the smooth mirror upon which we lay that indeed we should have been invariable to the charms of nature, had we not been delighted with our situation. Thinking that music would well accord with the time and place, I produced a flute from the depths of my portmanteau; and having in my earlier days learned the gamut, "God save the king," "the British Grenadiers," and a quick step or two, favoured my companion and the pilot with a solo. Though, probably, not equalling the strains of Orpheus, it had some effect upon the crew of a schooner which lay at anchor about two cables' length ahead of us. A deep and hoarse voice immediately hailed us across the water to come a little nearer to them, followed, when we spurned their invitation (rather rudely I must confess), by a most authoritative order "to strike up 'Hearts of Oak,' or they would board us." Now, having no ladies in our company, as was the case with the old story of Dr. Young and the guardsmen upon the Thames, we had no plea for consenting; so sounding "Britons, strike Home," we boldly defied them to mortal combat. Not knowing, however, with what force they had to contend, they contented themselves with saluting us with a broadside of most mellifluous sea phrases, and firing at intervals half a dozen rounds of small arms, well loaded with powder.

Although the night was so lovely, I cannot say that we by any means passed a comfortable one. The boat having no deck, and being too narrow in the beam to admit of reclining at full length on the thwarts, we were obliged to sleep in a sitting posture on the bottom, with the back of our heads against the edge of a seat, and accordingly each of us awoke in the morning with a neck as stiff as that of a raw militia man in his patent leather stock upon the first training day. Getting early under weigh, we beat slowly down against a head wind, and passed the quarantine station off a rocky island 45 miles from Quebec. A drizzling rain coming on at mid-day, and increasing to torrents, accompanied by a heavy gale towards sunset, rendered us in a most miserable plight. The river was now ten miles in breadth, and, a heavy sea rising, my companion became very unwell. The pilot soon followed his example; and I, not doubting but that it must be the cholera, busied myself in searching for the laudanum, brady, and opium pills, which, as is ever the case when things are most required, were not found until the whole contents of my portmanteau had been turned out upon the wet deck. All my fears, however, respecting cramps in the legs, and other alarming symptoms, were quite unnecessary. "Parturiunt montes; nascetur ridiculus mus:" the upshot of all was—they were only troubled with that very common complaint, or rather, I should call it, worst of all miseries—sea sickness!

A thick fog coming on at dusk, with flood tide, the pilot informed us that, not knowing whereabouts the land lay, he dared not venture to run in shore on account of the rocks, and that we must pass another night on board; and the prospects of such a night, too! For some minutes we endeavoured to prevail upon him to run on; but, finding he would not hazard anything, we began to make the necessary preparations for weathering it as well as possible. I drew on two pair of trousers, a seal skin cap and hat, two coats, and a seal skin jacket, with hood like that of an Esquimaux, which I had purchased at Quebec; and, as the anchor was again let go, quietly sat down, and most patiently endured the pitiless peltings of the storm. At intervals, during the night, I fell into a slight doze, but by degrees the heavy pitching of the boat would cause my head to strike against a thwart, or touch the bottom of the vessel, in which the water was now from four to six inches in depth, and awake me—for the purpose of going through the same motion again at the expiration of another quarter of an hour. When the morning dawned the weather had not moderated in the slightest degree; but with heavy hearts and drenched clothes we again got under weigh. For my own part I was so encumbered with the weight of my heavy apparel that, had the boat swamped, I should have gone to the bottom like a lump of lead; my companion, being an indifferent sailor, could scarcely raise his head, and the only active service I could perform was to sit at the bottom of the boat, wrenching the rain out of my cap and jacket, or take a turn at bailing out the water. And, when this last occupation had ceased, the three of us huddled ourselves into the stern-sheets, about four feet by three and a half, for mutual warmth; and with chattering teeth sat there, for all the world like so many dripping fowls upon a perch during a shower of rain.

We did not make the land round Kamouraska Bay, ninety miles below Quebec, until we had been exposed to the full fury of the storm for twenty-four hours. In another hour we landed, and were soon comfortably stowed away in a little French inn, busily employed in overhauling our wet portmanteaus, and inspecting the state of our stock of provisions. The report upon them was about as follows: the biscuit and salt had dissolved in the water; the cheese required a place in the oven for an hour or two; the meat had been rolling about at the bottom of the boat throughout the night; my companion's claret-coloured over coat, which he had bought at a sloop shop in Quebec, was three shades lighter; and the notes and sketches I had been taking the preceding day were no bad representation of the state of the heavens during the storm.

The uncertainty whether we could carry our baggage throughout the journey had occurred to us before leaving Quebec, and we had resolved to leave it, if anywise cumbersome, with some villager, retaining only sufficient clothes to fill a knapsack, which we could ourselves carry. Upon enquiring at Kamouraska, we met with a Yankee pedlar who was returning with his cart to the States, and would travel fifty-five miles upon the same route as ourselves. He volunteered to carry our trunks for four pounds, with a proviso that we should walk by his side; alleging at the same time that it was impossible to perform the journey under three days. "We might have seen roads," he said, "but we had never seen the Temiscouta Portage;" and, as to making a bargain of us, he would not carry the portmanteaus for twice the sum, if his own business did not compel him to go that way; and, furthermore, as the track was very dreary, he wished some pleasant company. Fortunately we had no occasion to close with this disinterested offer, a by-stander offering to furnish two carts for the same sum, affirming that one could not carry the two small portmanteaus. The chagrin of our Yankee friend at losing so good a bargain was very evident, notwithstanding all his assurances that his only desire was to see us safe to the end of the journey, and prevent our being imposed on. He took his leave of us, saying that the man who offered to accompany us neither knew what he said nor what he was undertaking; and, finally, that we should not travel the fifty-five miles agreed upon under four days, and that the flies in the woods would bite our ears off, if we did not tie them on with a strong handkerchief. We also experienced much difficulty in replenishing our commissariat department, and could obtain only a loaf of bread and a cold shoulder of mutton—a short supply for seven days, which we calculated our journey would last. But our severest loss was not discovered until we were on the point of starting; the pilot had appropriated our whole stock of brandy, consisting of two bottles, to his own use.

On the 6th of September, with two guides to whom the cart belonged, we pursued our route down the course of the St. Lawrence, the road passing along a narrow and thickly settled belt of ground, which had apparently once been the channel of the river, judging from the nature of its soil and a rocky range of hills running parallel with it on the outer side of the cultivated lands. The scenery was strikingly fine and bold, and numerous ships, tacking to and fro with an adverse wind, rendered it a most enlivening scene, until our arrival at the Temiscouta Portage, nineteen miles from Kamouraska, when we struck off to the southward, and ascending some high ground for ever lost sight of the St. Lawrence. The road was, however, still passable, and, though our progress was but slow, there was nothing as yet to warrant the pedlar's alarming accounts; while the log huts, though presenting a most miserable exterior, would at least shelter us from the threatening storm. When the rain, however, began to descend, and night set in, we made several fruitless applications for admission: one said there were too many of us; another referred us to his neighbour a little farther on; and a third had a sick person in the house. At last we bade adieu to enjoying a night's rest within doors, and approached the dark and apparently impenetrable wall of the tall forest, when descending a small ravine, with a ruiwet at its bottom, we spied out another log hut, though scarcely distinguishable amongst the blackened stumps. Considering it as our last hope, we made so pathetic an appeal that we were all admitted. The tenement was but a very small one, and occupied by an old couple of about sixty winters, with their niece, about fifteen years younger. The room into which we were ushered was scarcely seven feet to the ceiling, and blackened by the smoke of years. A straw mattress and a blanket occupied one corner of the room; the square iron stove, two chairs, a couple of stools, and an old wooden shelf, with an oil-skin hat, and a lamp suspended from the raft of a knife stuck into a crevice between two logs, formed the rest of the furniture. But it was amply crowded when the horses had been suitably provided for, and the seven of us were assembled. After enjoying a cheerful chat over the fire for some hours, and attending to the gesticulations of our host, who, as he sat on a corner of the bed with a thick red Kilmarnock cap upon his head, related anecdotes of his life to a group which would have furnished a fine study for any of the old Dutch artists, we were shown into a room containing a single bed for the accommodation of Mr. Reid and myself, who went dinnerless and supperless to bed, lest our provisions should fail us when most required.

At daylight the following morning, after an early meal upon our bread and mutton, qualified by a draught of cold water, we prepared for another day's fatigue, tendering some trifle by way of remuneration to our hostess for the night's lodging. We had some difficulty in prevailing upon her to accept it, and, when once accepted, the old lady in the warmth of her heart would insist upon cramming our pockets with wood nuts. With many expressions of thanks and wishes for a good journey from the worthy couple, we crossed the small stream (the Green River, I think,) and entering the forest lost nearly all semblance of a road. The trees had been certainly cut away, so as to afford a passage from six to nine feet in width, but the stumps had been left standing, and, where a marsh was to be crossed, that horrible invention "corduroy" had been resorted to. Frequently a decayed timber gave way under the weight of the horses, which floundered up to the top of their backs in black wet soil. In other places the road was floating on the surface of a deep pond; and then for a mile or two we had some little variety in clambering up hills over huge masses of rock, or stumbling up the bed of a torrent. Now and then, indeed, cutting away the windfalls (as the Americans term the trees which are blown down by a gale of wind) afforded us a short respite from the jolting, but during that time we had to ply our axes unremittingly. Mr. Reid had taken charge of the first cart, and, the Canadians walking alongside of us in their large mud boots, for some time I attempted to derive advantage from my companion's misfortunes, and learn to steer clear of them, but generally found myself deposited in a much deeper and worse hole, or brought to a stand still by a large piece of rock; so, despairing of bettering my condition, I calmly awaited the shock, and setting myself well against it in my seat, and compressing my lips, I plunged into the midst of every thing up to the axletree, with my loose portmanteau tossing about, and flaying my legs at a most unmerciful rate. The self-same abominable flies, too, the Yankee had so glowingly described, added to the pleasures of the journey by tearing pieces of flesh from our ears, as though each of them had been provided with a pair of the best Sheffield forceps. Having endured this patiently for three hours, during which time we had advanced just so many miles, we could bear it no longer, and dismounting we proceeded on foot. By mid-day we arrived at the river St. Francis, a small stream which is involved in the boundary question between Great Britain and the United States, where we met the royal mail upon its way from Halifax. The letter bags were fastened upon a dray or low sledge drawn by a single horse, which was moving quietly along, cropping what little grass grew by the road-side. The guard, fifty yards behind, was taking it equally leisurely, amusing himself by blowing through his tin horn and listening to the echo of the unmusical notes he produced, as they resounded amongst the distant hills. The meeting was unexpected on both sides, and as he came suddenly round a turn in the forest, raising his hand to salute us, he slipped over a stone, and fell upon his back in a mass of mud and water; but rising again immediately, with the most enviable unconcern, he stood up to his knees in it, answering our numerous queries. He travelled over the road, or seventy-two miles, once a week, without meeting a human being in three months, and I will bear witness he had no sinecure.

At three o'clock we reached the first hut, where the guides proposed passing the night, but the interior was in such a filthy state, and so crowded by a large family, that I preferred trusting to the weather in the woods, and, as an inducement to proceed, urged the possibility of arriving at a farm house upon the lake, fifteen miles farther. The Canadians willingly assented; so once more we toiled away over the rough hills, gathering the bilberries, nuts, gooseberries, strawberries, and other wild fruits, which grew in abundance on every side. Partridges too crossed the path frequently, almost within reach of our sticks, with the greatest impunity; for never were there such peaceably disposed travellers in the woods before; we had not even a pistol, gun, tinder-box, or, as Sheridan says, "a single bloody-minded weapon" with us.

Throughout the day we were journeying in a kind of no-man's land. The British Government claim it partly by the right of possession (which, as every one knows, is nine points in law,) and have the credit of having expended at various times within the last dozen years upwards of 1000L in forming this road (which is the only one between Quebec and Halifax) out of an old Indian hunting path. A traveller has some difficulty in accounting for the expenditure, unless he comes to the conclusion that it has been sunk in one of the marshes, or frittered away upon a corduroy. The United States claim the debatable land by right of treaty (which same treaty each party construes according to its respective interests,) though it will be evident to any one who will refer to the map that brother Jonathan wants to possess it merely in order that he may serve as a thorn in the side (to which indeed the form of the tract in question bears a strong resemblance) of the British provinces, thus cutting off the direct route to Quebec, the key of British North America in time of war, dividing the lesser provinces from the Canadas, and probably erecting fortifications upon a frontier which would extend within thirteen miles of the St. Lawrence. The intrinsic value of the land is next to nothing, and can be but insignificant to a nation already in possession of 1,205,000,000 acres of land, or 2,000,000 of square miles.

Three hours after sunset the guides, who were ahead, hailed us with the cheering sound of "une bonne espérance." This was followed by a charge of several cows, which, rushing past, were greeted also by us as a happy omen. Scarcely more exultation could have been expressed by Xenophon and the 10,000 Greeks of old, when the ocean again displayed its broad waters to their view, than was by us when we saw the light surface of the Temisouata Lake lying far beneath us. But a few minutes before we had held a council of war about bivouacking in the woods, the want of the requisites for striking a light, and a sprinkle of rain, alone causing us to persevere in our journey, which came to an end by eleven o'clock, when we arrived at Mr. Frazer's house and farm, after eighteen hours of most fatiguing toil, over twenty-four miles of ground, and through forest where we could never see twenty yards from the road, the only object worthy of notice being the majestic hemlock trees, or the branches of the pine, with long streamers of green moss hanging from them. Although the hospitable owner of the house had retired to rest some time, he rose immediately upon our knocking, and gave us a hearty welcome, with a cup of excellent tea, and a shake-down upon the floor. He told us he had lived there nine years, but the land was poor, and he was so tired of his solitary life that he intended to leave his farm and retire to some property he possessed on the river Du Loup, situated in a district of which he was seigneur.

He furnished us, the next morning, the 8th of September, with two canoes and a man in each, and, parting with our Canadian guides, we paddled down the lake until we arrived at the residence of Mr. Frazer's next and nearest neighbour, six miles distant. We presented him with some late newspapers, and his wife in return soon provided a comfortable breakfast. The settler, when we arrived, was sitting at the window, poring over an old number of the Sailor's Magazine. He had served twenty-four years in the 49th regiment, and three years in a veteran battalion, when, receiving his discharge, he was settled with several other soldiers on the borders of the lake and upon the portage, to keep open a line of communication with the St. Lawrence. All the others, despairing of making a livelihood after the first two or three years, when their rations of flour were withdrawn, had migrated to some more populous and promising country. Sixteen years had expired since he landed in the thick forest, on the spot he then occupied, with his wife and two boys. He said that for the first twelve-month he much felt the loss of his barrack-room society; but, setting to work with a good heart, he built a log hut, which was now occupied as a pig-stye, and persevered in clearing the ground until the seventh year, when disease attacked his cattle, and carried off every head. This so discouraged him that he quitted the place, and returned into the inhabited part of the country, but soon again visited his old farm and commenced anew. From that time every thing had gone on in a flourishing manner. He now possessed nine cows and a hundred acres of cleared land, and was perfectly happy and contented. His sons were grown up men, and were mowing a few acres of grass, but the corn was yet green and did not appear as if it would ripen before winter. It did not, however, seem at all to concern the worthy veteran, who said "he must hope for the best." I asked him how he disposed of the produce of his farm, and his answer was that "his farm did not yield any thing more than would provide his family. Butcher's meat they did not require, and were well satisfied with salt pork and vegetables." His maple sugar was most excellent, and he had made 460 pounds from 800 trees the preceding year; but the land in the vicinity was generally poor, and upon the headlands (to use his own expression) "there was not enough to feed a mouse, though there was a good farm here and there away from the lake." He was a true Corporal Trim: in the first instance, he fought the battles of Chipewewa and Lundy's Lane, for my edification, upon the white hearth-stone with a piece of charcoal, but, finding my undivided attention was bent upon something more substantial, he transferred the scene of action to the breakfast table, where he most gallantly carried the heights of Queenstown upon the top of the loaf of bread, and stormed Fort Erie through the spout of a tea-pot. He talked with the greatest pride of having served in the same regiment with Lord Aylmer and Sir Isaac Brock, regretting much that the former was not at home when he made his biennial trip to Quebec for his pension during the summer. To show, however, his esteem for him, he had a large proclamation respecting the cholera, and the performance of quarantine, with the signature of the governor-general, nailed up against the wall of his house.

Wishing him success, we again pushed on, lashing the two canoes together and keeping close under the lee-shore, there being so fresh a breeze that we were several times in imminent danger of being swamped, from the frequent strong gusts of wind which swept down the valleys between the high lands with which the lake is skirted. In the widest parts, the lake does not exceed a mile and a half in breadth, and is about twenty-five in length. After entering the narrow and rapid stream of the Madawaska river (the outlet of the Temisouata lake) we glided swiftly along between undulating and beautiful banks, the hills rising from one hundred to five hundred feet in height, and covered with every description of forest tree, but touched only here and there with the dark foliage of the pine, while, at the very margin of the water, the white trunks of the birch were most prominent. We rested an hour at mid-day for the purpose of dining, our table and couch being one of the veteran's hay-cocks, in a cleared spot of ground twenty miles from his house, the first open space we had seen since quitting it. Ten miles farther we heard the merry chattering of some children, evidently Irish, from their accent, and, rounding a point, found a parcel of little urchins in high glee throwing pebbles and sticks of wood at another who was angling in a most artist-like manner, as he floated down the stream in a bark canoe. In the background, a party of five or six newly-arrived emigrants were sitting round a fire superintending the cooking department, their log huts being in an unfinished state. The ground for the space of an acre was covered with the smoking trunks of trees, and blackened logs, and here and there the murky skeleton of some decayed giant of the forest was gradually consuming away as it retained its erect position. From this small settlement there were partial and new clearings for an extent of five or six miles, when the thick forest again closed in upon the river.

About eight o'clock we were moving along with increased velocity, having passed over several rapids most gallantly, and shipping but a small quantity of spray, when I heard a hollow roar a-head, which I was well aware must arise from some cataract, and hinted to the boatmen that they had better keep a sharp look out a-head. They, however, not pleased I suppose at being dictated to by a greenhorn in such matters, ran on in the same course, until we could not well make the shore, and had a good chance of taking a leap over some falls of twelve or fourteen feet, had not a rock twenty or thirty yards above them luckily intervened, and brought us up with such a shock as nearly to throw Mr. Reid out of the bottom of the canoe, where he lay fast asleep, into the water. I was on the point of throwing myself in to swim, when I observed that our head-way was stopped, and after some difficulty we succeeded in gaining a little inlet formed by a rock on the verge of the falls. Taking out our baggage, we carried it as well as the canoes over the rocks to the level below, and, again stepping in, were in a few minutes at the settlement of Madawaska at the confluence of the Madawaska and St. John's Rivers. It was formed by the Acadians, after their expulsion from Nova Scotia about the year 1754, and is situated in a pretty and rather fertile spot, but with no regular village. We could obtain some tea and beds at a small inn, the landlord of which also filled the twofold occupation of grocer and retailer of rum; but, as elsewhere upon our journey, there was no butcher's meat, not more than half a dozen travellers visiting the settlement in the course of the year.

When we arrived the landlord was superintending the erection of a grist mill, some miles distant; but his son rode off and summoned him to attend his guests: and, before we had dressed in the morning, a tall, dark, but sanctified and clean-shaven man, walked into the room, and announced himself as our host and humble servant to command—Siméon Abair by name. After the creation of many difficulties upon his part, he agreed (as the rapids were too dangerous to attempt paddling ourselves down the St. John's) to provide us with a canoe and man for five pounds, assigning "harvest time" as the reason for making so exorbitant a demand. As he would not abate any thing, the money was paid him; but upon proceeding to the river, to which, as we subsequently remembered, he hurried us, without allowing the boatman to approach, or even to speak to us, we found a little cockle-shell which would have filled and swamped in the first cusp or a slight summer shower. Protesting that I would not run the risk of my life and loss of my baggage for a distance of one hundred and fifty miles in such a craft, sooner than lose such good customers he furnished us with a more capacious one, and we proceeded on our course down the St. John's. Two days afterwards, we had the curiosity to enquire of the boatman whether he had been paid for the trip; he said, "Yes; that he had received three pounds." The sight of the man's features, when informed of the sum the landlord had charged us, was worth the other two pounds, and we could not forbear bursting into a hearty laugh as he told us, with the most piteous face imaginable, that he "should as have so much cared if any one else had cheated him, as that the landlord was his godfather;" that he had said we were fatigued, and wished not to be annoyed by seeing the boatman, but would make a bargain with him; and "that, though he had made a good thing of it, he could screw only three pounds out of us." Had not our time been so valuable, scarcely any thing would have given both of us so much pleasure as returning and ducking the old bear, making him refund the money, and then handing it over to our honest hard-working boatman.

Our canoe was a log one, twenty-four feet in length by three in breadth, so that with our baggage, and three heavy people, its sides were within four inches of the water. As we floated along, numerous fair damsels at work in the fields on the river's banks, waved their long black hats to our boatman, or gave him immemorial commissions for ribands and other finery to be purchased at the capital. Although he answered "oui, oui," a hundred times, yet still, as he paddled along, there was a last request, until we were so distant that nothing but an indistinct murmur reached our ears. The day was squally, with heavy showers of rain, so, coming in sight of a respectable-looking farm-house about twenty miles below Madawaska, we pulled in shore and landed, for the purpose of seeking a few minutes' shelter from a heavy storm which was threatening to burst over us momentarily. Upon entering the house we found half a dozen men and women most earnestly engaged in discussing a substantial dinner, and drinking tea at the same time. The whole party were crowded round a little table where there was just sufficient space for them to squeeze their elbows in, while a rear rank, or a corps of reserve, was formed of ten or twelve hungry-looking young children, whose countenances expressed the greatest anxiety to be called into action. Although we took our seats on a bench fastened to the wall, with the usual salutation, not the slightest notice was taken of us by any of the party, so intent were they upon the subject before them; nor was any offer made about partaking of their cheer, though we were drenched to the skin, and might reasonably be supposed to have no distaste for the good things we saw upon the table. At intervals we heard one of them addressed by the title of captain, and I must acknowledge, though I had seen many strange captains in the United States, I had never before been in the presence of such a libel upon a military rank. The noble commander had a face as round and as red as the rising moon, with little gray eyes protruding from his head like those of a boiled lobster; a few white hairs scantily covered a forehead whose capaciousness would have puzzled Spurzheim himself, and his rotundity would have even put old Falstaff to the blush. Our boatman wishing to consult him upon some military matter, he waddled down to the water's edge with us after the shower had passed over, and laid down the law in the most direct terms. As we proceeded on our voyage, the boatman informed us that he carried a musket in the captain's company in the militia, and had been called out on duty the preceding year to check some aggression of the Americans; but, not having received any remuneration for his services, his captain had given him the requisite directions for obtaining it by making application at Fredericton. Excepting the tely arrived Irish upon the Madawaska river, these were the first British settlers we had seen since leaving the veteran's house upon Temiscouta lake, and from this specimen we were almost justified in forming but a mean opinion of the New Brunswickers' hospitality.

Twenty miles farther brought us to the Great falls, where we again landed, the portage commencing at the rather dangerous vicinity of about one hundred and fifty yards above them, the influence of the cataract being very evident upon canoes which must cross the river to gain the entrance of the portage, situated in a small circular bay. The surface of the river is perfectly smooth and unbroken until it gains the very edge of the rock, when it is precipitated seventy feet in a sheet of amber-coloured foam into a narrow and rocky channel, not exceeding thirty-five in breadth, down which it boils and bubbles for the space of half a mile, and then expands into its original width of about one hundred and fifty yards. There is a tradition, though seemingly not a very probable one, that several canoes of Mohawk Indians, who had attacked a tribe near the source of the river, and massacred all, excepting two old squaws, were (accompanied by their prisoners) floating down with the current at night, and were to a man dashed to pieces over the falls, of whose existence they had not even the most remote idea. The squaws aware of the circumstance perished with them, not wishing to survive the destruction of their tribe. Sitting upon the rough crags on the margin of the cataract, we made a late dinner upon the last remains of our shoulder of mutton, sacrificing the well-picked bone to the shades of the old squaws and the Grand falls.

The river banks, formed of a hard rock, with light covering of soil, exceed one hundred feet in height above the falls, and more than two hundred half a mile below them. The man who conveys the boats across the portage* earns a good livelihood by his two-fold occupation of farmer and boat-carrier. Our canoe, with the baggage in it, was drawn along a winding road on a sledge by two oxen, and launched again into the water half a mile below for a quarter of a dollar. Timber was formerly drawn up on the level of the bank, and then launched again into the water down an inclined plane, but this system was soon abandoned as too expensive, and it is now allowed to shoot the falls, which in the freshets but little injures it.

For seven or eight miles the current carried us on with great velocity over the "White Rapids," the "Black Rapids," and a series of others, all sufficiently dangerous to encounter without a skilful pilot, and we landed at dusk near a small log hut, the first we saw after leaving the portage. The banks had continued a hundred feet in height, and covered with a dense pine forest, but we frequently passed groups of woodsmen bivouacking by their fires at the water's edge after their day's labour had ceased. Throwing up part of the baggage over my shoulder, I walked up to the hut, through whose small window the bright light of the wood fire could be seen blazing cheerfully, and knocking at the door walked in, and found a family of seven, who welcomed me most hospitably. My companions following me, we joined the circle, and, after enjoying a bowl of excellent milk, asked the settler's history. He had been a comrade of the veteran upon the lake, and had been settled there at the same time, when his nearest neighbour lived at twenty miles' distance. He had now one within six miles, but considered it no advantage, and would rather that people did not settle so near to him, as he should then have no fear of quarrelling. Part of his house had been washed away by the freshets during the spring of the previous year, and, although it was twenty feet above the level of the river, the water had stood five feet five inches in his kitchen, which was the only room he had remaining. This summer, too, the bears had destroyed thirteen sheep and four hogs of his stock, but he had yet twenty-three sheep remaining, and two cows. The only neighbours, however, he did not appear, in any manner, to approve, were the Americans, whose boundary was within five miles. He said that he had been over amongst some of them lately, and told them that they had better be silent upon the subject of the boundary question now, for that New Brunswick had a governor who had just been most satisfactorily arranging the same kind of a dispute in the East Indies.

As the night was advanced, wishing to obtain a few hours' sleep, I threw my wet great coat upon the floor before the blazing hearth, as the most comfortable berth I could select; but the settler's wife would so positively insist upon Mr. Reid and myself taking possession of the only bed in the room, upon which, she asserted, "she had just placed new blankets for our express comfort," that I was compelled most reluctantly to relinquish it, while the settler and his son went out and sought a night's rest amongst the straw in the stable. I had heard from the boatman on the Madawaska river that the house was not celebrated for its cleanliness, and a sight of the bed convinced me that there must be very substantial reasons for its fame having spread through hundred miles of nearly uninhabited country; so I walked out of the house with the intention of sleeping in the open air, and thus avoid giving any affront to our hostess, but the mist rose so thick and cold from the water, and remembering the story of the bears, I thought it more prudent to undergo a night's tortures within doors. On returning into the house, I found my friend already between the far-famed blankets: the boatman had taken up my comfortable position on the hearth: the children were lying upon a bed at the foot of ours, and the settler's wife sat in a chair watching the fast dying embers. I was somewhat puzzled to discover how Mr. Reid had contrived to turn in; for I had no idea of risking myself otherwise than in my clothes, and, after considerable manoeuvring, took an opportunity, when the settler's wife turned her head, to spring in, and strongly intrenched myself up to the chin between the coverlid and upper blanket. My friend had taken up a similar strong position, and was almost choked with attempting to smother his laughter. We were not such old soldiers, however, as to outmanoeuvre the enemy in this manner; for swarms of light infantry poured down upon us in every direction; and most stoically did we bear their attacks for the short time we were awake, but the fatigues of the day soon caused us to be unconscious of every thing that was passing. Towards morning I was awakened by some heavy weight upon my feet, and, at first, took it for a visit of the night-mare; but arousing my senses a little, and feeling it move, I was convinced it must be one of the children; so out of gratitude for our accommodation I could not remove it, but endured the evil, until rising to depart upon our voyage I discovered that it was a large black dog which had favoured us with his company.

Two hours brought us to the mouth of the Aroostook river, and Stobec, a small Indian village on the opposite bank. Landing where we saw a bark canoe drawn up on the beach, we fortunately met a staff officer, who had been up the Aroostook to check some aggressions of the American lumberers in the forests on the disputed territory, and was now on his return to Fredericton. We proceeded in company through a fertile and from this time well-inhabited country, with fine bold scenery at every turn of the stream, and at night arrived at Woodstock, about sixty miles below the falls and half a mile from the river, where we found a comfortable little inn, kept by an American. The division of the counties, which had only lately taken place, had not been publicly stated more than three or four days, and Woodstock, which had formerly been in the county of York, was now the capital of the new formed county of Carleton. At present, it is but a small village, though doubtless, ere many years have passed, it will be one of the most considerable towns in the province, being situated in the most fertile part, and already possessing a large agricultural population. Persons anxious for posts under government, and to establish themselves with the earliest foundation of the town, were flocking in from all directions; no fewer than three surgeons and four attorneys had already arrived, though there was neither fee nor food for one of them. The small and formerly quiet village had already divided opinions and clashing interests, and numerous little jealousies and bickerings had arisen. It is a straggling place, settled partly upon a creek near the river, and partly upon the high ground where the inn was; so each party wished to establish their own spot as the site of the capital, and derive the advantage of having the public buildings there.

The evening gun, from the American garrison of Houlton, only five miles distant, can be distinctly heard at Woodstock; and as we were descending the river on the 11th of September, we caught a glimpse of Mar's Hill, upon which the boundary monument has been erected. Large as the St. John's river is, it is rendered utterly un-navigable by the numerous rapids, where, in many places, the depth does not exceed three feet. The beach every where was strewn with fine timber, which had been left by the falling of the spring freshets, and which could not now arrive at the port of exportation before the ensuing year, and flat-bottomed provision-boats can with difficulty reach Woodstock on the third day from Fredericton. The scenery throughout the St. John's is of a superior order to the generality of that in America, and becomes bolder and more beautiful as the river nears the ocean; but the land decreases in fertility in an equal ratio every succeeding mile below Woodstock. The falls of the Pokeok at its junction with the St. John's, seen through a wooded and rocky chasm, and an Indian village with some fine drooping elms upon a bold undulating country a few miles lower down, are exceedingly picturesque objects.

With the exception of Woodstock, it cannot be said that there is any settlement which can come under the denomination of a village between the Green river and Fredericton, a distance not short of two hundred and twenty miles. In many parts, as at Madawaska, a narrow riband of farms extends along the banks of the St. John, and stretches back from a quarter to a mile inland. Three or four tribes also of Indians have their strange-looking collection of bark-built wigwams huddled together upon the headlands formed by the junction of the Tobique and other tributary streams: the chief's house is usually distinguished from the rest by having a flag-staff alongside of it, or the roof being rather more elevated. The costume of the females struck me as much gayer than that of the tribes I had previously seen in the Canadas. Their dress here was generally of brilliant and gaudy colours, with their black hats encircled by a broad silver band. The men, who appeared to subsist chiefly upon fishing in the summer season, had the same heavy and forbidding countenances I had observed amongst the Seneca and Iroquois tribes. I was informed, however, by officers of the army, and agents who had superintended the annual distribution of presents from the British government to the tribes upon the borders of Lake Huron, that fine athletic warriors of the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, with noble features, used to attend upon those occasions with one side of their face painted sky blue, and the other chequered with vermilion and bright yellow; but all whom I saw fell very far short of the natives of Bengal and Pegu both in stature and countenance.

At ten o'clock on the night of the ninth day from our leaving Quebec, we arrived at Fredericton, three hundred and fifty miles distant, rejoiced beyond measure that our fatiguing expedition was at an end. The cramping attitude of sitting crouched at the bottom of the canoe for sixteen hours, during four successive days, without being able to change that position, lest the heavily laden and frail vessel should capsize, was irksome and overpowering in the extreme. But when our troubles and vexations were over, as usual we laughed heartily at all our adventures; and, taking it all in all, I may fairly say that I enjoyed this journey more than any other portion of my travels on the continent of America. Our provisions had been rather short, and the bread on the fourth or fifth day became so excessively sour, from alternate wet and exposure to the sun, that it was unwholesome as well as unpalatable, and began to affect us seriously. Nor had our night's rest been sought upon couches of the softest and most fleecy down; but, in the enjoyment of good health, other matters were of trifling moment, and soon consigned to oblivion.

CHAPTER XXII.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE—SPIRIT OF EQUALITY—DISPUTED BOUNDARY.

After the separation of New Brunswick from Nova Scotia, in 1785, Colonel Carleton was appointed governor of the new province, and selected a spot on the right bank of the river, where Fredericton now stands, as the site of the capital. The situation is good, being the head of the tide-water and the sloop navigation. Though ships of large burden can ascend to the mouth of the Oromucto, from twelve to fifteen miles below, yet merchandise is usually forwarded from the sea-port ninety miles distant by small craft, the Falls of St. John, two miles from the harbour, preventing the passage of large vessels except at high water. The town consists of two principal streets, running parallel with the river, and contains about 1200 inhabitants, but as yet has no regular market nor fair. The point of land upon which it is built is flat and low, being but a few feet above the level of the freshets. A low range of rocky hills, however, rises half a mile in rear of the town, and another at rather a greater distance on the opposite side of the St. John's, into which the pretty stream of the Naasawhaak empties itself. The river immediately above Fredericton is studded with many beautiful islands of considerable extent, which, being inundated at certain seasons, produce abundant crops of hay, as is the case with the low land on the banks; but, in general, the soil is cold and poor.

* Owing to the numerous rapids on the river St. John, these portages or carrying-places are frequent. The eastern provinces, more especially New Brunswick, are so intersected with streams, whose sources are in the immediate vicinity of each other, that the whole country may be traversed by means of them with very little difficulty: and, in short, the rivers are the highways of the province. The Grand Temiscouta portage is of an extraordinary length, being thirty-six miles over a mountainous country, and very little used, except by casual travellers, but some of the navigable streams are within two miles of each other, yet flowing in opposite directions.

The original government house, a wooden edifice, was burnt by accident some few years since, and the present substantial and spacious one of fine freestone was erected during the administration of the late governor, Sir Howard Douglas. In point of situation and style of architecture it far exceeds both that at Quebec and the one at York; and, with the tastefully laid out pleasure-grounds and gardens, occupies a large tract of ground on the margin of the water above the town.

The college, situated at the base of the hills, is another fine stone edifice, and in addition to possessing the enormous grant of 6000 acres in its immediate vicinity, has 1000*l.* per annum allowed by the British, and the same sum by the provincial government. The former made their grant on condition that the province allowed an equal sum; but of late years the house of assembly have shown a disposition to withdraw their grant, though that of the mother country was made in perpetuum. They contend that they cannot afford to pay so highly for the education of the half dozen young men who study there under a president and four professors. The other public buildings are of wood, and do not display any thing either tasteful or expensive in their structure. The officers' barracks, for the few companies of infantry quartered in the town, are prettily situated on one side of a square, surrounded by fine trees and the intervening space laid with grass, where the excellent band of the 34th regiment attracted a crowd of auditors during the fine evenings of September.

Many of the old inhabitants were the royalists of the American revolution, who settled in New Brunswick after the forfeiture of their property in the States, and several of them still hold high official situations. But, as in the Canadas, the same blunt manner and independent spirit which an Englishman is so apt to censure in the United States is here very perceptible, and the lower classes of people assume similar airs. A shopkeeper is mighty indignant if so addressed: forsooth he is a storekeeper; a blacksmith is a lieutenant of militia grenadiers, and sports his full-dress uniform, with gold wings, as proudly as a nobleman; a maid-servant, who has emigrated from England only three years before with scarcely a shoe to her foot, walks in to be hired, and in the presence of the lady of the house, seats herself in the best chair in the parlour, and then enters upon business with the ease of one who is reciprocating a favour: in short, no one confers a superior. They certainly possess the levelling system in full vigour, inhaled, I should imagine, from the opposite side of the frontier. "Ne sutor ultra crepidam" is not the motto here; the majority of the house of assembly is composed of ignorant farmers and shopkeepers, the representatives of the eleven counties into which the province is divided. One thing, however, I will acquit them of: they neither chew tobacco nor do they annoy you in their hotels with the essence of egg-nog and mint juleps.

The New Brunswickers, generally speaking, are a fine athletic race of people, and the lumberers, in personal appearance and strength, will not yield to the peasantry of any nation. They are alike insensible to heat and cold, and, with a stock of salt pork and rum, remain in the woods without quitting them for months, employed in their hardy occupation of felling timber. The province will doubtless improve rapidly. The timber trade, which has so long employed the energies of the inhabitants, is already beginning to fail in some parts, and agriculture will be more attended to. The farmers have ever been in the habit of paying their one shilling and sixpence per ton into the crown-land office for a license to lumber during the winter months, entirely neglecting their farms for a pursuit which would bring them a little more ready money. Owing to this ruinous system, the specie has found its way into the United States for the purchase of flour and pork, while a system of barter has been established between the inhabitants of the interior of the province, the labourer receiving so many bushels of wheat for his work, and the whiskey dealer bartering with the butcher or tailor.

The population of the province, including the scattered Acadians and original French settlers, who possess considerable tracts of land upon the eastern coast, does not at present exceed 100,000, though it is now rapidly increasing. Many emigrants of a highly respectable class, and men of good education, were continually arriving during my stay at Fredericton. They intended purchasing farms on the banks of the St. John's, near Woodstock; but I could scarcely imagine that persons who had been accustomed to mix in the gay scenes of a college life, and move in the higher walks of society in England, would ever be happy or contented in a comparative wilderness, where they must be solely dependent upon their own resources, and their time, devoid of excitement, must hang heavily on their hands. From what little I saw of the vast western continent, I should say it was no country for a mere gentleman, who retained a fondness for hunting and shooting, but rather for artificers and farmers, whose previous habits enabled them to put their own shoulders to the wheel. Of the natives of Great Britain the lower orders of the Scots are usually considered the best settlers, having been more accustomed to privations and hardships than their English neighbours, who, though not so addicted to spirituous liquors, are a worse class of settlers, and more dissatisfied with the change they have made, than the Irish. The Lowlanders again are even a better description of settlers than their Highland brethren, who, like the French, satisfied with a mere existence, care little about the improvement of their farms.

Until the arrival of Sir Archibald Campbell, the present governor, no part of the world could have possessed so few and such bad roads. Since his arrival, however, the "Royal Road" has been surveyed, and several miles of it are already completed; the intention being to extend it on the opposite side of the river to the Grand Falls. By the course of the stream the distance is one hundred and thirty miles, which will be shortened forty miles by the new road, and, at the same time, not only tend to the rapid settlement of the interior of the country, by throwing open a mercantile line of communication, but in time of war will be of incalculable advantage as a military road to Quebec, with the broad stream of the St. John's, a natural protection against any sudden inroads from the American frontier. Most of the allotments upon the seacoast have been occupied many years, and the occupation of those upon the banks of the principal rivers followed. They are generally of a narrow frontage, so that each occupant may command water navigation; but some extend to the rear as much as five or six miles; and the second and third occupations from the river are even now filling. The best crown lands are at this time selling at three shillings, and the general average of crops is about eighteen bushels of wheat per acre. The winter being of longer duration than elsewhere, winter wheat is not sown; the soil, however, yields the finest potatoes in North America, which give the name of Blue-noses to the New Brunswickers, from the small eyes or excrescences with which they are covered, and they are exported to the United States in vast quantities. The province as yet (owing to the dense forest) has been very imperfectly explored, but it is known to abound with coal, slate, freestone, and granite; it also produces some small quantities of various ores. Its climate is dry and particularly healthy, excepting about the coast of the Bay of Fundy, where, from the continued fogs, the inhabitants are said to be liable to pulmonary complaints.

During my ten days' residence at Fredericton I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Audubon, the celebrated ornithologist, who, with his sons, was searching for additions to his laborious undertaking.

The militia were called out for three days' training, and the battalion which assembled at Fredericton 1000 strong, was composed of fine athletic men. Only 200 of them were armed, and about the same number had clothing and accoutrements. There was also an African company, who had decked themselves very gaily, and carried the only drum and fife in the field. They appeared quite proud of their occupation, not being exempted, as in the United States, from the performance of military duty. The province could, in case of emergency, furnish 20,000 men, (but, unfortunately, there are neither arms nor clothing for one tenth of that number,) and six troops of yeomanry cavalry. The Fredericton troop made an exceedingly neat and clean appearance, being well clothed and partly armed; and in active service, in such a country as New Brunswick, would prove of very essential utility. In case of immediate aggression from their neighbours, the province must for some time be entrusted to their care alone, there being only six weak companies of regular infantry in three distant detachments, with a frontier of 200 miles in extent, and a province of 22,000 square miles in charge, while the Americans have two garrisons close upon the boundary line (at Eastport and Houlton,) and an excellent military road nearly completed to Boston. The New Brunswickers have already given ample proof that they are well qualified as soldiers to undergo any hardships and privations. During the last American war the 104th regiment was entirely raised in this province, and made a march unparalleled in the annals of English history, and only equalled by that of the Russian campaign in 1812, through the extensive forests to the Canadas in the depth of a severe winter. No troops ever behaved better in the field, and the corps was nearly annihilated at the storming of Fort Erie. Many Americans settle in the province, and are always the most enterprising and money-seeking men; many too are prevented naturalizing by an oath of allegiance, or some similar form, which the law requires to be taken in a protestant church; and, being considered as aliens, they pay a fine of thirty shillings in lieu of performing militia duty.

CHAPTER XXIII.

ST. JOHN'S—DIGBY—ANNAPOLIS—WINDSOR—HALIFAX.

On the 22d of September I embarked in a small steam-boat in company with Captain C. an old Burman friend, whom I was so fortunate as to find stationed at Fredericton, and who kindly offered to accompany me on a short tour through the province of Nova Scotia. We proceeded down the beautiful river St. John (which received its name from being discovered by De Monte on the 26th of June, 1604, the day of St. John the Baptist,) and thirty miles below Fredericton passed the embouchure of a small rivulet, which forms an outlet to the waters of the Grand lake and its numerous tributary streams.

After crossing the mouth of the Kenebekasis River and entering Grand Bay, which is interspersed with numerous islands, we were enveloped in a dense fog, and, landing a few miles farther, at the Indian village: some above the falls, proceeded on foot into the town of St. John. For three days it had been obscured by fog, viz. with us all had been sunshine and heat, the fog not extending more than ten miles up the river. During the first day we saw nothing of the town beyond the curbstones of the pavement, or the steps up to the doors of the houses; but a heavy shower of rain, which came while we were groping our way through the streets in search of the barracks and thoroughly drenched us, dispelled the fog, so that the following morning the scene rose bright and clear.

The town containing nearly 11,000 inhabitants is built upon a rocky and irregular promontory, forming the harbour and the river which here empties itself into the Bay of Fundy. The principal streets are broad, paved, and neatly laid out, with excellent private dwellings, and some elegant stone public edifices. The corporation in a most spirited manner are laying out large sums of money in beautifying and levelling the streets, though much to the inconvenience of private individuals, whose houses at the bottom of some hills have been blocked up by these improvements to the attic windows, so that a passer by may peep into the first or second story. On the summit of the hill again 20 feet of solid rock have been cut away, leaving the dwellings perched on high, and allowing the occupants a view of little else save sky and the occasional roof of a lofty house. The barracks, a fine extensive range of buildings, with some small batteries overlooking the sea and commanding the entrance to the harbour, occupy an elevated and pleasant situation in front of the town, whence in clear weather the opposite coast of Nova Scotia can be seen across the Bay of Fundy.

Every thing about St. John's presented the air of a flourishing place, and numerous vessels were upon the stocks in the upper part of the bay, where the tide rises to the height of 30 feet. In point of commercial importance it is the capital of New Brunswick, and annually 400 square-rigged vessels enter the port annually, reporting more than 100,000 tons of square timber. From Miramichi more than 300 vessels sail with even greater quantity of timber than from St. John's; and from St. Andrew's, which ranks as the third sea-port, from 150 to 170 vessels with 25,000 tons of timber. In addition to these there are several minor ports, and from the whole collectively about 11,000 seamen are employed in the trade of the province. It appears by returns made in the year, 1824, when the trade was rather braver than at present, that 324,260 tons of square timber were exported from the various sea-ports, exclusive of gum, lathwood, and deals. St. John's possesses most of the lumbering trade from the western coast of Nova Scotia, and the duties upon English importations being lighter than at Halifax, it absorbs much of the traffic which would otherwise flow to that city. This and the adjoining province of Nova Scotia, under different regulations, might have been still greater nurseries for British seamen than they are; their interests upon several occasions have been neglected by the mother country, who by the treaty of 1703, granted to the United States participation in the fisheries, and a general permission to take fish at the distance of a cannon-shot from the coast. This permission has been much abused by their frequently running in-shore at night, entering the bays to set their nets, in many instances forcibly preventing the British fishermen from carrying on the fishery, and destroying the fish by throwing the offal overboard, while the provincialists carry it ashore. These rights they forfeited by the war of 1812, but the renewal of them at the peace was strangely permitted, with the most injurious effects to the colonies.

The immediate vicinity of the town, and for an extent of some miles up the river, is such a mass of rock, covered only here and there with stunted pine, as almost to deter any emigrants from penetrating into the interior, or at least to give them a very poor opinion of their adopted country. The only rich or fertile tract I saw, was a narrow strip of land about a mile in width, running between two ridges of rocks away from the bay, and which had been reclaimed from the bed of a river or large inlet. By some people it is imagined to be the course of the St. John's previous to its bursting through the ridge of rocks which create the falls. The opening through which that river passes is in the narrowest part called the "split rock," and not more than 40 yards in width; a quarter of a mile higher up the stream is a second pass, from 150 to 200 yards wide, above which the river expands into a capacious bay. The great rush of the tide is such, and it rises so rapidly, that the water at the flood is some feet higher below the split rock than above it, and renders it impassable, except at high water for half an hour, and the same fall is formed at the ebb tide, when it is again passable for the same time at low water. Boats frequently venture too far, not aware of the time of tide, and are lost in the whirlpools and eddies; one, containing three men, had been lost the day before we visited them, the most powerful swimmer not being able to gain the shore. The noise from them can be distinctly heard at the distance of some miles, and the harbour, a mile below them, is covered with floating froth a foot in thickness. A few years since an engineer officer proposed undermining or blasting the rocks, which vary from 50 to 100 feet in height, and thus opening a passage for the free admission of the tide; but the project was opposed by the landholders some miles above the town, who represented that the river would thus be drained and rendered too shallow for navigation.

Leaving St. John's in a steamer on the 24th, with the sea as smooth as a lake, but the vessel rolling heavily, we passed out of the beautiful harbour by Partridge Island (the quarantine station at the entrance, which, being high and rocky, is an excellent breakwater and shelter to the harbour in easterly gales), and steered for the Nova Scotian coast, forty miles distant. The lofty heights in the rear of the city, the various Martello towers and light-houses on Partridge Island and the headlands, the batteries and barracks rising upon a gentle acclivity from the harbour, with the ruins of old Fort Howe frowning from a rocky precipice over the city, which is built upon several eminences, form a picturesque scene when viewed from the Bay of Fundy.

In five hours we entered the strait of Annapolis (or Digby, as it is frequently called,) which is about a third of a mile in width, with high lands from 500 to 600 feet in height upon either shore. A violent tide rushing through it into the bay of Fundy renders it next to an impossibility for a vessel to beat against a head wind into the basin of Digby, one of the finest summer harbours on the American continent, and in which the whole British navy might ride with safety. Were batteries thrown up at the entrance of the strait, the passage would be rendered utterly impracticable at any time. In winter, however, it is rendered unsafe from the vast quantities of ice which drift down from the Annapolis River. Several wigwags were erected upon the sandy beach by the Indians, who, with their rifles, assemble throughout the summer for the purpose of shooting porpoises in the basin; and, by afterwards disposing of the oil which they extract, they manage to make a tolerable livelihood. We saw several paddling about in their canoes, who appeared very expert, and were informed it was no uncommon thing for them to kill at a single shot. The basin is also celebrated for its chickens (a species of herring;) but of late years their number has considerably decreased, owing to the numerous weirs, which destroyed the young fish. The small town of Digby, which owed its origin to the fisheries, is prettily situated on a light gravelly soil at the water's edge, about three miles from the entrance of the strait. After passing an hour or two there, we pursued our course up the basin, which for its whole extent is divided from the Bay of Fundy by only a narrow chain of hills, between whose base and the margin of the basin there is a strip of about a mile in breadth of well populated and cultivated land. Near the head of the basin, at the influx of the Moose River, are the remains of an iron foundry which was commenced in 1825, by the Annapolis Mining Company, with a capital of one hundred shares of 100l. each, and afterwards increased to double the amount, but failed through improper management, and is now mortgaged for a trifling sum. There was a fine field open for their undertaking, nearly all the minerals throughout the country being reserved by the Crown, and granted for sixty years by the late Duke of York to Messrs. Rundell and Bridge, who have only opened some coal mines at Pictou on the northern coast of the province.

We arrived at Annapolis, situated ten or twelve miles up the river of the same name, early in the afternoon. Though formerly a town of so much note, it has now dwindled down into a place of inconsiderable importance, not containing more than 1300 inhabitants. From the year 1712, when Nova Scotia was ceded finally to Great Britain by the treaty of Utrecht (which took place two years after the conquest of the country by General Nicholson with the forces of Queen Anne,) until 1749, it was the capital of the province, but in that year the seat of government was transferred to Halifax. From the first exploration of the country in 1603 by De Monts, who built a fort there and named it Port Royal, until 1712, it changed masters eight times, having been restored to France by treaty every successive time it was taken by the English. The old fort is yet extant upon a point of land formed immediately below the town, by the junction of a small stream with the Annapolis river, and is occupied by a detachment of infantry from Halifax. An old block-house, and a square brick building within the ramparts, bear such outward signs of antiquity that one might almost imagine them to be coeval with the original French settlers. The principal part of the town runs in one street, parallel with the river above the fort; but to the eastward of it, on the land side, there is a continued succession of neat private residences for nearly a mile, all of which have gardens prettily laid out, and even quickset hedges. These last immediately attracted our attention, being the first I had seen in North America, though, at this time, I had travelled 2500 miles in it. The orchards are extensive and numerous, much cider being made in this part of the province, and I could have fancied myself in an English village, had it not been for the negroes with whom the street swarmed, and whom I should never have expected to see in such numbers so far to the north.

On the morning of the 25th of September we left Annapolis, pursuing our journey to Bridgetown, fourteen or fifteen miles distant, where we crossed to the right bank of the river and followed its course over a poor and exceedingly light soil. The township of Ailsby, fifteen miles in length, produces only a crop of rye and Indian corn in three or four years, and then lies by for pasture for a length of time.

The day was stormy, with heavy rains, and the coach only a second-hand American one, with "Western Mail, New York, and Hoboken," upon the doors; neither was it water-proof, the canvass curtains hanging down in long shreds, and flapping to and fro with the wind. The horses too were poor specimens of the Nova Scotian steeds, three out of the four being lame; the coachman however was perhaps one shade more professional in his appearance than those in the States. I attempted to kill time by reading Bulwer's Eugene Aram, but was incessantly interrupted, when devouring one of the most interesting chapters, by a prosing little woman eighty years of age, with snow-white hair, rosy cheeks, bright black eyes, and a set of teeth which would not have disgraced a Brahmin. She was the very picture of good health, but most unfortunately my neighbour, and apparently took a great fancy to me, as the full benefit of her colloquial powers was bestowed upon me in some such interesting conversation as "Aye, these barrens are very dreary, but you will soon come to the settlement:—now there's a pretty interval—this is a poor territory."

Near the village of Ailsby we passed in sight of Clermont, the pretty country residence of the Bishop of Nova Scotia, and a few miles farther entered the Cariboo Swamps. It is the source of two rivers, the Annapolis and Cornwallis, which rise within a few paces of each other by the road side, and flow to the ocean in opposite directions, one emptying itself into the Basin of Minas and the other into the Basin of Digby. It was formerly a favourite hunting ground of the Indians, but few of the animals from which its name is derived are now to be found in any part of the country.

Every one forms some ideas of a place before he visits it, and mine were fully realised throughout this day's journey. After leaving the swamp we entered dense forests of pine, unvaried by a solitary habitation for many miles, and the few small clearings were plentifully covered with Nova Scotian sheep, alias large black stones; but at Kentville, where we passed the night, the country assumed a more fertile appearance, and our road continued within sight of the large prairie and rich dikes of Cornwallis and Horton. A long range of hills, from 1000 to 1200 feet in height, commence just beyond the village of Gaspereaux, which derives its name from a poor description of herring which run up a small stream in shoals during the spring, and are caught in such vast quantities that the fishermen frequently allow the poor people to take them away gratis. They also form a considerable article of trade with the West Indian Islands. The rivulet winds up rather a pretty and fertile valley, twelve miles in length, between the village and the mountains, and has its source from a lake at the head. The view of Cape Blomidon, or Blow-me-down (as it is now significantly called, from the heavy gusts of wind which prevail off its bluff point,) with the basin of Minas and the opposite shore, is a fine and extensive one when taken from the high part of the Horton Mountains, over which the road passes. For the first time in America, I saw a drag-chain used in their descent, but the road was excellent; and though closely packed with eight people inside, and only two seats, we travelled the ten miles in an hour and ten minutes.

Making a circuitous route of six miles in twenty, we crossed the Avon, about 150 yards wide, and arrived at Windsor to breakfast. If a bridge were constructed across the river at this town many miles of mountainous country would be avoided. We were informed that one was in meditation some years since, and that the abutments of it were actually commenced, but the work was abandoned for some unknown reason. A long wooden pile of building, with a flat roof, occupies an eminence one mile from the town, with twenty-five windows in each story, which, consequently, might be reasonably supposed to be a cotton mill; but, not being in the vicinity of any water, I came to the conclusion that it was a barrack: my loquacious neighbour however set me to rights by informing me that it was the college. It certainly exhibits a strange architectural taste, though quite a modern building, the institution having been founded only thirty years. At this time there were twenty-one students, who are eligible at the early age of fourteen, on account of young men entering upon business so early in life. They are required to wear the cap and gown, but little attention appears to be paid in this respect to the rules of the college. I saw some very unacademically-dressed young men in green shooting jackets, standing at the hotel door, smoking cigars, and surveying each passenger as he stepped out of the coach. The only mark of scholastic garb they wore was the square cap and tassel; and one of them crossed the street with his gown folded up and carried under one arm and a large stick under the other. The qualifications of the president are, that he must have taken a degree either of M. A. or Bachelor in Civil Law at Oxford, Cambridge, or Dublin. There are twelve divinity scholarships attached to the college by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign parts, each scholar enjoying 30l. per annum for seven years. The object being that people may be induced to educate their children for the ministry of the Church of England, there are also four scholarships of 20l. tenable only for four years. At the foot of the hill upon which the college is erected is a large substantial stone building, used as a preparatory academy. It was built at an expense of 6000*l.* and has also twelve divinity scholarships of 30*l.* attached to it, which are held either for seven years or until matriculation, and, as well as those at the college, are nominated by the bishop and appointed by the society.

Windsor, equally with every Nova Scotian town which I visited, impressed me favourably with the province. The streets are clean, and the houses have a respectable and pleasing appearance, superior to the Canadian villages. The town is situated upon the margin of the Avon, where it is 1100 feet broad, and is the great port for the exportation of gypsum, of which nearly 100,000 tons are carried annually to the United States for the purposes of farming; but it is very little used in the province as a manure, either not suiting the soil, or being improperly applied. The whole face of the surrounding country is scarred with quarries, and the lofty banks of the river St. Croix, a few miles distant, are composed of the same mineral, and are nearly as white as the cliffs of Dover. It does not lie in a compact body, but is intermixed with red and blue clay. After exportation, it is ground fine in a mill and scattered over the land by the hand in about the proportion of five bushels to the acre, answering well upon a dry sandy soil, and showing a dark mark upon the grass, which springs up in the parts where it has been scattered. It is also said to prevent that bane of the farmer, the rust in the wheat, which are supposed to be occasioned by the thick fogs of Nova Scotia. When we arrived at Windsor and walked to the piers, where the vessels were loading with gypsum, the bed of the river had a most singular appearance. As far as the eye could reach, only a thick bed of yellow mud was visible, and the keels of the vessels were 40 feet above the level of a small fresh-water brook, which flowed in a narrow gully through it. The height of the tide increases in an unaccountable manner as it approaches the N. E. along the whole coast of North America. At New York common flood does not average more than five or six feet: at St. John's it is from 20 to 25, at Windsor about 35, and increasing in rapidity as the basin becomes narrower, it rises near Fort Cumberland and Truro to the astonishing height of 75 feet in the spring tides. The captain of a vessel assured me that he had cast anchor in twelve fathoms' water in Chignecto Basin, and had walked round his craft at low ebb.

The crops throughout our journey appeared in a most deplorable state; in many parts they were yet green, though it was now the 26th of September, and some were entirely destroyed by the frost, which had been capricious in the extreme: one field was probably quite destroyed, and the farmer at work cutting it for winter fodder, while the next was yet in a flourishing state. Owing to the lateness of the spring, and the early September frosts, it seemed probable that the farmer's yearly labours would receive but a poor return. Winter wheat is not sown in consequence of being liable to be thrown out of the ground at spring by the effects of the severe frosts in winter, and spring wheat is raised with difficulty in some parts of the province. The crops in good upland vary from 16 to 25 bushels. The other grains, however, grow well, oats yielding 25, rye 16, and barley 20 bushels. Indian corn produces from 25 to 30 bushels, but it requires long heat, and the climate of Nova Scotia is too treacherous to be trusted long with impunity; this year I do not recollect seeing above two crops which promised to repay the farmer. The land is admirably calculated for potatoes, an average produce being 200 bushels per acre; and the rotation of crops, after breaking up the green sward, is to commence with oats, followed by potatoes the second and wheat the third year, when again potatoes, then wheat, accompanied by clover and timothy seed. Few farms are divided into fields which receive a prescribed treatment in turn, but remain in grass until the failure of the crops indicates the necessity of change; wheat and oats are generally sown in April, Indian corn between 10th of May and 5th of June, barley and buck-wheat 1st of June, and turnips 10th of July. Mowing usually commences the last week of July, and reaping the same time in August, but this season the hay was not stacked as late as the 9th of October. The following return was made a few years since under authority of the local government: Quantity of land in Nova Scotia, exclusive of Cape Breton 9,994,880 acres, of these 6,119,939 have been granted, but 1,781,392 have been escheated, leaving at the disposal of the crown 5,656,223 acres. Of the above quantity three parts is prime land, four ditto good, three inferior, and two incapable of cultivation: this is exclusive of lakes and land covered with water. The horned cattle are well shaped; but the horses, though hardy, are of a mixed Canadian, American, and English breed, and have fallen off of late years. When the Duke of Kent was governor of the province he used his utmost endeavours, by the importation of several Arab horses, to introduce a good breed, and partly succeeded: but since then the best horses have been drained off by purchasers from the States. New Brunswick produces a superior breed in swiftness and beauty. A celebrated horse in that province, some few years since, took a sleigh upon the ice from St. John's to Fredericton, a distance of 76 miles, in six hours and a half. A useful pony, rivaling the Shetland in diminutiveness, and varying from 5*l.* to 7*l.* in price, is in common use amongst the young people of Nova Scotia. It is imported from Sable Island, an almost barren sand, 35 leagues from the coast, upon which a few ponies of a larger breed were landed many years since as food for shipwrecked seamen, but, their numbers increasing too rapidly for the extent of herbage, many have been withdrawn, and a humane establishment has been instituted there at an expense of 800*l.* per annum. From the same return which is quoted above it appears that the cultivated land in Nova Scotia amounts only to 1,292,009 acres, though the first crop after clearing the ground always repays all expenses of labour and purchasing seed, the expense of felling and clearing away the wood being from 25 to 30 shillings per acre; for cutting, heaping, burning, and fencing, 3*l.* I observed that here, as in the States, the sickle was but little used, the cradle scythe doing its work more expeditiously.

We changed our coach at Windsor for one of larger dimensions, and, the Halifax races commencing the following day, we had an addition to our party of half a dozen lawyers and attorneys returning from the circuit to enjoy the gaiety of the capital. My prosing old torment contrived to place herself beside me again, and, after congratulating me upon the vicinity we had preserved, she transferred her little grand-daughter from the centre seat, where her bonnet was crushed into every possible shape but the one the maker did intend, to place a upon my knee. What with the child, the old dame's vexatious garrulity, and fifteen inside passengers upon a hot day, I was almost worked into a fever, and was therefore happy to escape when we stopped to change horses, and walk up the Ardoise mountain. This mountain derives its name from the slate with which it abounds, and which appears upon the surface in every direction, but the monopoly of Messrs. Rundell and Bridge laid an injunction on a quarry which was opened a few years since. The circumstance rather reminds one of the fable of the dog in the manger; for the material would be in great demand for building, and soon supersede the combustible shingles which at this time are in general use. The road continues over high ground, after gaining the summit, passing between many lagoons varying in size from twenty to forty acres, which afford excellent trout fishing, and have some good land near them. One farm especially, the property of Mr. Jeffries, collector of customs at Halifax, was quite a treat to a traveller who had been so long accustomed to see nothing but a most slovenly system of agriculture. It displayed much better management than that of his near neighbour, Mr. Uniacke, late attorney general, whose farm and house were erected upon such a barren spot, and so much money had been expended upon the estate, that, to use a fellow-passenger's expression, "for every stone he had picked up he had laid down a dollar." Each house is prettily situated near a small lake, with undulating and well-cleared grounds, laid out in gardens and with quickest hedges; they had also planted several hundreds of English oaks in the hedge-rows, which appeared to be thriving tolerably. The same fellow-passenger related the following anecdote to us, respecting this unproductive farm. The original proprietor was taken prisoner during the war of the revolution, and marched under suspicion of being a spy to Halifax, from the opposite extremity of the province. On his route to the capital, he requested permission of the escort to rest himself for a few minutes upon a stone by the roadside (which, in corroboration of the veracity of the story, was pointed out to us) and, while sitting upon it, he said that if ever he was so fortunate as to acquire his liberty, and gain an independent fortune, he would purchase the land upon which it lay. In process of time his anticipations were realised, and, purchasing 5000 acres of that rocky country, he expended nearly 25,000*l.* upon them. He was spoken highly of as being a charitable man, and giving employ to numerous workmen. The house now bids fair for becoming a mass of ruins, the present possessor not admiring so unsociable and desolate a place.

There certainly ought not to be any apology required for a man committing suicide in the twenty miles after passing the Ardoise mountain, nor any fog necessary to disgust him with life if compelled to take up his abode in such a country. A new line of road had been laid out some two or three years previously, and, nothing being expended upon the repairs of the old one, we had to jolt about most unmercifully over huge rocks and deep water-courses. It was well, indeed, that we were packed so close, and had not much space for pitching to and fro. Our road lay through the leafless forest, which was consumed in the summer of 1825, at the same time as the awful fire at Miramichi in New Brunswick, which spread over six thousand square miles, destroying towns, human beings, wild beasts, and even the natives of the streams in its devouring course. Nothing can exceed the desolate appearance of the country over which it swept; the trees either yet remain, hardened by the fire, in their natural position, and casting a wintry gloom over the few green shrubs which are creeping up again at intervals beneath them, or have been consumed by internal fire, leaving only a mere shell or skeleton. It is a singular fact that in most instances where the forest has been consumed by fire a different growth of wood springs up from that which the ground formerly produced; thus a hard timber is frequently succeeded by a soft one, and maple or birch shoot out from amongst the roots of the pine. The quality of the soil is nevertheless generally known by the growth of the timber; black and yellow birch, with elm, ash, hemlock, or maple, are certain indications of a rich soil. A small growth of white birch denotes a thin cold soil, and pine a dry sandy ground: though this rule does not always hold good, as strips of pine are frequently found in the best land.

Night had set in by the time we had arrived within ten miles of Halifax, and I, allowing my head to sink down upon my breast, breathed hard, and affected sleep, for the purpose of avoiding the old lady, who was by far a greater plague to me than ever the old man of the sea was to Sinbad the sailor. But all this ruse de guerre was of no avail: "I am sure you will never wish to travel with such an old woman again," said she; "most sincerely shall I pray for it," groaned I; and my evil genius persevered in describing the Bedford Basin upon whose margin we were now travelling, and related "how the French admiral and fleet scuttled themselves and went down with colours flying in the presence of the English, sooner than surrender," and how the mast of the admiral's ship was yet visible above low water on a calm day. I was mute, but ever and anon peered out, and squinted through one eye to the right and left, in hopes of seeing the long-wished-for city; but there was only the white light water of the basin below, or the dark outline of houses at intervals on the right, with the roaring stream of the Sackville, as it descended over its rocky bed from the chain of lakes we had passed during the day. I almost shouted with joy when the exclamation of "there is the city-dell" (citadel) broke from her, and we entered the streets just as the vivid flash of the heavy gun from the ramparts, and the numerous bugles and drums of the garrison, announced that it was eight o'clock.

CHAPTER XXIV.

RACES—HALIFAX—THEATRE, &c.—SHUBENACADIE CANAL.

I have seldom witnessed a livelier scene than the Halifax race-course presented on the 27th of September. The day was remarkably favourable; not even a passing cloud appeared to plead an excuse for not forming part of the show. By mid-day the city had poured forth all its inhabitants, both horse and foot, who were either grouped upon the ramparts or brow of the citadel hill, or listening to the military bands who played between the beats on the plain below. The scene was rendered more enlivening by the numerous gay uniforms of the rifle brigade, 8th and 96th regiments, which, with detachments of artillery and engineers, composed the garrison. The races had been set on foot by the officers of the army and navy upon the station, many of whom carried off the palm of victory in competition with professional jockeys. They were more suitably equipped too for running a race, according to an Englishman's notions of dress, than the provincialists, who cut rather an outré appearance riding in their shoes and loose trousers. Many of the races were well contested, and the sports were kept up with great spirit for three days. A captain and subaltern became field officers on the course, owing to the treachery of the ground which gave way under the horses when they were making nearly their last spring to gain the winning-post. A midshipman merited by his perseverance what he could not gain by the fleetness of his steed, as he ran for almost every stake, from the cup down to the saddle and bridle. The grand stand consisted of a few pine boards loosely tacked together, and was altogether a most frail and tottering erection, and proto trusting one's life in it, it would have been a matter of prudence to have insured it. We had one or two false alarms of "coming down," from boys scrambling upon the roof, or gentlemen of heavy weight venturing upon the floor; but, the generality of the ladies preferring to witness the races from their own carriages, the show upon the stand was limited to about a dozen or eighteen people. All booths for the sale of spirituous liquors were prohibited near the course, but the law was evaded by the proprietors of contiguous fields letting them for the erection of tents, which proved of some service in attracting all those who had an inclination to be disorderly away from the peaceable portion of the assemblage.

We dined at the public ordinary the same afternoon, held in the Mason's Hall, a room of noble dimensions, but rendered gloomy by the ceiling being painted in most deplorable taste of a deep black colour, varied here and there with a streak of white, a compass, a rule, an eye, and other strange devices of the craft. I could compare the general effect only to that of a storm about to burst over the heads of the company, and it certainly much marred the beauty of the ladies who attended the ball in the same room the following evening. The cup, which had been made at New York, was produced after the cloth was removed for presentation to the winner, a citizen, and I believe the only one who entered a horse for the race.

The peninsula upon which Halifax stands is formed by the harbour, called Chebucto, and the northwest arm, which branches off at Point Pleasant, three miles below the city (the entrance being guarded by redoubts and Martello towers,) and runs almost parallel to the harbour, approaching within a mile of Bedford Basin. Melville Island, where the American prisoners of war were confined, is situated under the rocky and lofty wooded bank a short distance from the entrance, but only a few old houses and a mill now remain upon it. The harbour is about sixteen miles in length, and from one and a half to two in breadth, terminating in Bedford Basin, which would alone furnish a safe anchorage for the whole British navy, the entrance to it not exceeding 800 yards in width, when it expands to a noble sheet six miles by four. The approach from the sea is well protected by the fortifications at York Point, some miles below the city, and George's Island opposite the lowest extremity of it. McNabb's Island of 1100 acres, purchased a few years since for 1000*l.*, protects the shipping from the fury of the Atlantic. The peninsula rises rather abruptly from the water, the streets being laid out parallel with the harbour from north to south; but they are much confined by the citadel on the summit of the hill, and the crown reserves around it. The city is consequently much compressed in width, and occupies only a narrow strip of land, being about two miles and a half in length by a quarter of a mile in width, and all the cross streets are inconveniently steep, but the corporation were as actively employed as at St. John's in levelling and making them more commodious. The buildings are nearly all of wood, there not being more than 150 stone houses out of 1600. At the last census, in 1828, the population was 14,439 souls, the increase since the peace being but trifling. During the war it was the great British naval depot of North America, and the dock-yard establishment gave life and employ to the city; but a few years since a great portion of it was transferred to the Bermudas, as being central between the North American colonies and the West Indies, and the harbour not being liable to be closed by the ice during the winter months. There are great objections, however, to Bermuda, on the score of the climate, which destroys more naval stores in one year than Halifax would in half a dozen. The admiral and commissioner divide their time of residence equally between the two stations, and were on the point of sailing for Bermuda when we quitted Halifax.

The citadel, which is raised upon an old fort of smaller dimensions, will not be completed for some years; the work is carried on chiefly by the soldiers of the garrison, who receive ninepence per diem extra while employed during the summer months. The position is a commanding one, and a fine prospect is afforded from the ramparts. The barracks at present occupied by the troops are of wood, with very little to recommend them, except some fine mess-rooms, and a library instituted by Lord Dalhousie, when governor of the province. A fire would prove of infinite service towards beautifying the city, by destroying both them and a great proportion of the private dwelling-houses. Those even which are built of substantial materials are principally of the shaley iron-stone rock of which the peninsula is formed, and which contains such a quantity of the ore that it oozes out in long streaks down the walls, and gives them a most lugubrious and prison-like appearance. Some of the public edifices are of a handsome freestone, and the province building, as it is called, situated in an open square, surrounded by an iron railing, and the interior prettily planted with locust-trees, would not disgrace the capital of Great Britain. It contains rooms for the council, house of assembly, and all the provincial offices. Its external dimensions are one hundred and forty feet in length, seventy in width, and forty-two in height; but the colonists do not appear to feel much pride about the grandeur of it, and their approbation of it is smothered in complaints of the extravagance of the cost. They have another source of lamentation in Dalhousie College, which occupies one end of the parade, where the guards mount daily, and which was commenced in 1820, but not completed for want of the necessary funds. It is, also, a handsome free-stone building, but unoccupied. Part of it, from humane motives, had been fitted up by the governor as a cholera hospital, as well as the levee room at government house; but fortunately neither of them was required. The latter is situated near the lower extremity of the town, but rather too near a burial ground. There are only two churches of the protestant episcopal religion, St. Paul's and St. George's, the latter a plain circular wooden edifice, bearing a close resemblance to the Coliseum; besides these, the catholics and dissenting sects have six chapels. The number of places of public worship, in proportion to the number of inhabitants, appeared far less in the British provinces than in the United States. On the banks of the river St. John, the great turnpike of New Brunswick, and along which much of the population is scattered, there was barely a church in every thirty miles; and though on our route to Halifax they exceeded in number those in the sister province, yet still they were comparatively few to those in the States. The provincialists are exempt from all tithes, the ministers of the church of England being supported by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, from which they receive an annuity of about 200*l.* sterling (nearly 250*l.* currency). The society also allows 25*l.* for each new church, and one was pointed out to me which had been actually erected for that sum. In addition to the twenty-one clergymen thus paid, they have also many schoolmasters and catechists in Nova Scotia, upon salaries from 15 to 20 and 30*l.* per annum. The followers of the church of Scotland are the most numerous of the various denominations in the province, there being by the last official return 37,925; of England, 28,659; of Rome, 20,401; Baptists, 19,790, and only three Jews, who, as the American saying is, are no match for any one in Yankee land, or the countries north of New York.

We attended the theatre one evening to witness the performance of "Simpson & Co.," and the "Poor Soldier;" but almost took alarm at the box-office, which was in a damp corner on the ground-floor behind a green curtain, where we received some dirty play bills, not broader than the riband of a lady's bonnet. The interior of the house well corresponded with it. We managed to obtain seats in the front box, from which an active man might have almost leaped over the people's heads in the pit on to the stage. Altogether it was much like performing in a sentry-box: we were so close to the performers, that a darkened eyebrow or rouged cheek could be easily detected, and the prompter's voice was heard in every sentence; yet, spite of these objections, the good citizens were flattering themselves that Fanny Kemble would extend her engagements from the States to the capital of Nova Scotia. The house was very thinly attended, but the heat was so oppressive that in half an hour we were glad to beat a retreat to our quarters, where I was again, for the second time during our travels, confined to my bed by indisposition for two days, but was happily surrounded by military friends, who soon set me on horseback again. I gave the band-box of a theatre the full credit of inducing if not of producing my indisposition.

We enjoyed many pleasant rides towards Point Pleasant, and the pretty private residences near the city, and passed an entire day in visiting Rockingham, where Prince's Lodge, formerly the Duke of Kent's country seat, is mouldering into dust, and in making the circuit of Bedford Basin. The road winds prettily along the margin of the water through a thick grove of birch and forest trees, crossing innumerable rivulets which pour their tributary streams into the basin from the rocky and but thinly inhabited country with which it is surrounded. The lodge is a large wooden building, six miles from the city, without any claims to architectural beauty, and, from its numerous large sash windows, may be likened to a conservatory or a lantern, there certainly being a greater proportion of glass than timber in the front. The grounds have been laid out tastefully, and the situation is exceedingly beautiful, overlooking the broad expanse of the basin, from the edge of which it is about three hundred yards. After the duke's departure from the province, the property came into the possession of Sir John Wentworth, the lieutenant-governor, who allowed it to fall into its present ruinous and forlorn state. Not a vestige of the double tier of verandahs remains; the balcony and parapet railing are hanging in the most doubtful suspense; and, when we expressed a wish to see the interior, the old soldier in charge said that he would not insure us against either vanishing through one of the floors or being buried under the falling roof. The old guard-house has been converted into the stables of a comfortable inn, the scene of many garrison pic-nics and citizens' Sunday parties.

We continued our route to the village of Sackville, at the head of the basin, three miles farther, where there is a small military post for the apprehension of deserters; and struck into the forest by a bridge path, over the same rough and hilly country to the village of Dartmouth on the opposite side of the harbour. The Shubenacadie Canal, which was designed for the purpose of connecting the Basin of Minas with the harbour, and thus diverting part of the trade of the western towns of the province from St. John's in New Brunswick, has its commencement in rear of the village. The original estimate of the expense of finishing the entire work was 75,000*l.*, the canal being fifty-three miles in length, and sixty feet in width at the surface, with sufficient depth of water for vessels of eight feet draught. The locks were to be ninety feet in length within the chambers, and nineteen and a half feet in width, in order that steam boats might tow vessels of considerable burden from Halifax into the Bay of Fundy, and thus save them the long circuit of a dangerous coast. The legislature at the commencement made a grant of 15,000*l.*, and the heaviest expenditure would be upon the first section of 1200 yards, at an estimate of 23,000*l.*, the canal being raised by seven locks into Dartmouth Lake at an elevation of seventy feet above the level of the sea. Thence, with but short exceptions, it would run through a connected chain of lakes, into the Shubenacadie (derived from Shuben, signifying a "river," in the Micmac language, and Acadie, the original name of the province,) which flows into the Basin of Minas, that great reservoir of rivers (receiving the waters of not fewer than eleven powerful streams). Owing to an error in judgment the work has entirely failed, and the canal, now under mortgage to government for 25,000*l.*, is in as forlorn a state as the Prince's Lodge. Instead of the expenditure being entirely confined to the first section, which would have opened a communication with the lakes, it was spread out in portions through the whole sections, not one of which was completed, the original estimate falling far short of the requisite funds; and, all attempts to increase the stock proving fruitless, the work was laid aside, and the scheme is apparently abandoned. The locks are of fine substantial masonry, their bottoms composed of excellent inverted arches; but, many of them being in an unfinished state, the frost and heavy rains are already committing great havoc. It was stated that Colonel By, the engineer of the Rideau Canal, had lately surveyed the works, and had given in an estimate of 75,000*l.* for the completion; but here, as in the other British provinces, that same sad want of a spirit of enterprise is very apparent; and the chances are that the Shubenacadie Canal will be in statu quo a century hence.*

We had an opportunity while at Halifax of seeing some of the provincial militia. They were well equipped in every respect, and appeared to take some pride in making a soldier-like appearance. They had lately been engaged in several sham fights with the garrison, and the skirmishing over several miles of rough ground had instilled such a martial spirit into them, that they were parading voluntarily to perfect themselves in military exercise. The province can muster 22,000 infantry, but no cavalry as in New Brunswick.

There is a settlement of negroes a few miles from Halifax, at Hammond's Plains, the commencement of the military road laid out by Sir John Sherbrooke, in a direct line to Annapolis, through the dense forest, which lessens the intermediate distance nearly one-third. Any one would have imagined that the government would have taken warning from the trouble and expense it incurred by granting protection to those who emigrated from the States during the revolution, 1200 of whom were removed to Sierra Leone in 1792 by their own request. Again, when 600 of the insurgent negroes, the Maroons of Jasouthwest during the ensuing twenty-four hours, I proceeded in the steamer to St. Andrews, a sea-port of considerable importance on a peninsula of New Brunswick, thirteen miles from Eastport. The scenery up the bay is fine and bold, the Shamcook Hill rising in rear of the town to the height of 1100 feet, the only paper-mill in the province being situated upon the small river which flows near it, and bears the same name. When we arrived within two miles of the town, the tide was half ebb, and, the night being stormy and dark, the steamer ran its keel deep into the mud. After remaining there sufficiently long to exhaust all our stock of patience, we took to the boat, and, landing upon the beach near a light-house, sought our way, drenched with rain, and covered with mud, to the hotel. The light-house (lucua a non lucendo, again!) shows no light, the establishment necessary for trimming lamps, watching, &c., putting the third port in New Brunswick to the expense of thirty pounds per annum, which was deemed too extravagant a sum for the benefit of three hundred inward and outward bound sail annually, was accordingly reduced, the light being removed to another situation, three hundred yards from the point against which it is intended to warn mariners. The present beacon is merely a common lantern placed in a pigeon-box bow-window, protruding from the second story of a house, where its dim rays are exhibited at an annual contract of fifteen pounds, though it can barely be distinguished from the light in any other window in the town.

The steamer had reached her customary anchorage ground during the night, but was high and dry at the usual time for sailing, having drifted from her anchors by the heavy gale. The rain still continuing to pour down, I resolved to return by water to Eastport, in preference to taking the American coach from Robbinston, opposite to St. Andrew's; and, having a few hours to spare, I walked through the town despite of the storm. It is one of the neatest in the provinces, contains from 1500 to 1800 inhabitants, and has a considerable trade with the West Indies. As the name would almost imply, the population is chiefly of Scottish descent, but the influential people of every class were absent at Fredericton, subpoenaed as witnesses in a trial of libel upon a revenue officer by the editor of a newspaper.

While busily engaged in taking a sketch the morning after my return to Eastport, the blue Peter and loosened top-sail of the Portland packet by chance caught my eye. Leaping fence and ditch, I soon gained the inn, where I found the landlord bustling about in sad distress at my absence, the captain having already sent twice in search of me. In a few minutes more I was on board the "Boundary" schooner of one hundred and fifty tons, with forty-five passengers, and seventeen of that number in the small cabin. Our skipper was a hale, weather-beaten, healthy-looking sailor, a native of New Brunswick, but a naturalized American, so that he might be qualified to command the vessel. He was quite an oddity in his way; I asked him one evening, for want of something better to talk about, when I came upon deck, whether he thought we should have any more wind during the night. "I shall be able to tell you more about it in the morning," was his gruff reply. In less than five minutes a lady tottered up the hatchway, "Will it rain, captain?" "You had better apply to the clerk of the weather, ma'am; he's able to tell you more about it than I," said the rough old tar. Standing out of the bay by Grand Manan Isle, we found a heavy head swell upon the sea from the gale of the preceding days, which caused the usual commotion amongst the fresh-water sailors. Our little vessel, however, cut her way gallantly through it until the second day, when, the weather moderating, she glided gracefully and smoothly upon her course. All the passengers were again alive; the gentlemen congregated in the cabin, discussing the well-worn and hackneyed subject of politics, and the merits of the several candidates for the presidential chair. Jackson, Clay, and Wirt, were in turn abused, and the morals of all being called into question, the argument somehow or other branched off at a tangent, and, settling down into one upon religion, continued with but little intermission for ten hours, and was resumed with as much vigour the following day.

On Sunday the 14th of October we were off Manegin Isle, the scene of action between the "Boxer" and "Enterprise" in 1813; and the passengers, having requested a Nova Scotian Calvinistic preacher to favour us with a discourse, had all assembled upon the flour barrels with which the deck was covered. A heavy squall coming on, when every one was wrapt in deep attention, nearly threw the schooner upon its beam ends, and dispersed the meeting in a most unceremonious manner; some rolling away to leeward, and others down the companion ladder, did not make their appearance again until we arrived in port. The wind freshened to a stiff gale off-shore towards sunset, and rather unfavourable for making Portland harbour, where the captain intended touching to land a part of the passengers, including myself; but the others, who were bound for Boston, ascertaining that it was a fair wind for that port, proposed carrying us there and defraying our expenses back to Portland. All agreed to this arrangement, excepting myself, who would not consent to being taken a circuitous route of two hundred miles when the vessel was within three miles of its destined port, and merely to please a party of people to whom time was an object of no importance, and who would not put themselves to the slight inconvenience of a few hours' delay to please me. After holding on for about an hour, and perceiving that the general opinion must be that I was both obstinate and unaccommodating, I relented, and agreed to proceed to Boston; but, when the deputation applied to the rough old seaman, he answered, to my infinite satisfaction, that "he had never sailed for Portland without making it." The wind, however, hauling still more a-head, and a short high sea rising, into which the schooner plunged so heavily that she could only carry the foresail, while she made as much lee as head-way, the old skipper was reluctantly obliged, two hours before midnight, to bear up for Boston. Running along the coast, in sight of numerous light-houses (there being seventeen in a hundred miles,) in nine hours we entered Boston Bay, after a long passage of three days from Eastport.

Having seen all the lions during my previous visit, there was nothing to detain me beyond one day, which I passed in strolling about the city. Washington's statue was encircled as filthily as ever, and the city guards were marching about as before in their strange half-cavalry half-infantry uniform. One novelty there was,—the Tremont Theatre was open, and I attended, to witness Wallack's performance in the "Brigand" and "Rent Day." The last time I had seen the former, was in the Amateur Theatre at Calcutta, where the characters, with the exception of that performed by the "Star" of the night, were much better sustained, and the scenic arrangements altogether superior. There were many incongruities, such as a young man apparently twenty-five years of age, dressed as a dandified ruffian, talking of his acquaintance with the old steward twenty-seven years before. I never saw the character of an English peasant properly dressed or personated by an American actor. Of our yoomen they make idiots, and of our servants insolent clowns. When a talented performer appears upon the American boards, he shines alone, unsupported, and the piece goes off dull and irksome during his absence from the stage. Greater support is certainly given to the drama in America than in England, and still it can boast but of one or two able native performers. Some of the scenery, from the brush of a Mr. Jones, possessed considerable merit, and I thought the interior of the house superior even to those of New York and Philadelphia. The ladies, of whom there was a very large attendance, paid a complimentary tribute to Mr. Wallack's excellent acting by displaying a long line of white handkerchiefs, which were constantly applied to their eyes; but the male part of the audience showed no outward and visible signs of approval, and an Englishman entering the house at the close of some beautiful scene would have almost imagined that it met with their disapprobation. Walking into the capacious and finely-carpeted saloon, I read a notice over the door, "respectfully requesting gentlemen not to wear their hats in it." Mine was in my hand immediately, but, not seeing another individual of the sixty or seventy persons who were present conforming to the rule, I resumed mine forthwith, for the sake of uniformity.

Early the following morning I passed through Stoneham and Reading; and, walking on as was my custom, in hopes of seeing something worth sketching, while they "shifted horses," I fell in company with a man who was proceeding in the same direction. After answering his queries, whence I came, whither I was bound, and passing a few cursory remarks upon the cholera and the weather, I cross-examined him with regard to the quality of the soil, and what kind of a harvest had been gathered during my absence. One of his answers was unique and descriptive. "Why, air, turn a goose into a ten-acre lot of it at spring, and it will come out at fall thinner than it went in; it could not get its bill between the stones to pick up the grasshoppers, and there are plenty of them." The country certainly did not promise much, but the apple trees were weighed to the ground with the overpowering load of fruit. We crossed the rapid and shallow stream of the Merrimac, nearly two hundred yards in width, three miles beyond Andover, where there are the fine buildings of an extensively patronised theological seminary. At the village of Methuen, seven miles farther, I walked to view some falls on the Spicket Creek during the time the letters were sorting, and was well punished for breaking the vows I had made not to look at any thing in the shape of a cataract for another twelvemonth, so surfeited had I been with them. Upon a moderate calculation, about a hat-full per minute contrived to escape over a rocky ledge thirty feet in height, from a dam which diverted the main body of the stream to two large grist mills.

We had six-in-hand throughout our journey over tolerably good roads, with a light load, and I never saw men more expert in their business than coachmen on the two hundred and sixty miles road between Boston and Burlington. It was rather amusing to witness the manner in which they restrained the horses when descending a steep hill, wrapping the reins of the leaders round their arms up to the elbows, using their feet to those of the wheelers, and then, leaning back on their seat, with the whip thrown upon the roof of the coach, they tugged away with both hand and foot.

By sunset we arrived at Concord, the capital of New Hampshire, situated upon a light sandy soil on the western bank of the Merrimac, which is navigable for boats to Sewall's Falls, a few miles higher. The town, containing about 2000 inhabitants and five churches, consists of two streets running north and south, each more than a hundred feet wide and a mile in length, with a row of large drooping elms on each side. The houses are of a pretty style of architecture, with double verandahs supported by light colonnades, and may vie with those of Northampton on the Connecticut river. The State House, a fine granite building with two wings, the roof surmounted by a light tower, dome, and globe, with a prodigious golden eagle to crown all, is situated in the centre of a grass square one hundred and fifty-five by one hundred paces, with iron railing in front and rear. I never entered one of the state capitals but I found some additions or alterations making in the prisons, and, though not a Howard, I generally pryed into all. The Americans have an excellent system of admitting visitors to these institutions, upon payment of a trifling sum, usually a shilling sterling, which is sufficient to keep away mere idlers, the incurious, and the old accomplices of the prisoners, and to produce an income from which salaries are allowed to extra keepers, whose time is occupied in attendance upon visitors. In the Concord prison, sixty males (five of them for life) were confined, and one female, who, according to the keeper's account, was a more troublesome and mischievous subject than all the rest together. It was conducted partly on the Auburn system, but fell far short of it in interior economy and indeed in every other respect: the shops, cells, and kitchen were not equally clean, nor were the prisoners under the same discipline and good management. When at work, the prisoners are allowed to converse upon subjects connected with their trade, the keeper acknowledging it would be an improvement if total silence could be insisted upon, but stating that some communication between them was indispensable (at Auburn, however, it is not permitted.) The articles which they manufacture are not disposed of according to contract, but by the warden, with the same injurious effect to the industrious artisans in the neighbourhood as at Auburn. The trades were few, being shoemakers, blacksmiths, carriage-makers, and stone-masons: these latter were employed in erecting an additional wing to the prison, to contain three tiers, or one hundred and twenty of the honey-comb cells in use at Auburn. Heretofore, from two to eight prisoners have been confined during the night in a large, badly-ventilated cell, with a solid iron door, and a narrow loop-hole to admit a breath of air and ray of light. This free intercourse in their cells has been the cause of several attempts to regain their liberty. The use of the lash has not been introduced, the refractory being punished by solitary confinement; but, when the latter is adopted to the extent of the Auburn system, it is difficult to see how the former can be dispensed with, or, if so, what will be the means used to keep up the necessary discipline.

From Concord we waded, on the 18th of October, through eighteen miles of white sand, to breakfast at the village of Sandbornton, leaving the Shaker settlement at Canterbury three or four miles to the right. Some of the houses were similar to many I had observed in the British provinces, being built without any foundation, and merely resting like a large box upon the levelled ground, or on a piece of rock at each angle, and, from all appearances, very liable to be blown over by the first heavy gale. Such a fate had befallen one I saw in Nova Scotia, which was literally topey-turvy. The road was carried over the apex of every sugar-loaf hill between the manufacturing town of Meredith and Centre Harbour upon Lake Winnepesaukee, when a circuit of half a mile would have taken it upon nearly a dead level. The latter village is situated at the western end of this lake with the long name. The sheet of water is twenty-three miles in length, and varies from two to five in width, and is so studded with islands as to warrant the assertion of the country people that there are as many as there are days in the year. The dominion of the sovereign of some of them would not however extend over more than five square feet of solid rock, nine inches above the surface of the water. A steamer was upon the stocks, intended for the navigation of the lake; and it was in contemplation to form an inland communication with the tide-waters and Connecticut River, by Squam Lake, two miles to the northwest, Baker's River, and a chain of ponds. It is four hundred and seventy-two feet above the surface of the Atlantic, and two hundred and seventy-two above the Merrimac, at the junction of their waters. A magnificent view is said to be afforded from the summit of Red Hill, 1500 feet in height, three miles from Winnepesaukee, but the scenery was too wooded and had too great a sameness for my taste. The road circled round the base of the hill, which appeared at a distance, with the sun shining upon it, like burning lava, so brilliant were the autumnal tints of the trees. Dense forests of pine stretched far away upon every side and at the base of the Sandwich mountains, 3000 feet in height, whose summits were thickly enveloped in clouds. The narrow stream of the Bear Camp, with which the road ran parallel, was choked up with masses of timber which had been cut the preceding winter, and, floating down towards the Saco, had been left by the falling of the waters. In many places, for the distance of a quarter of a mile, we could not obtain a glimpse of the stream, such a perfect and solid bridge had been formed over it by the logs.

Heavy rain set in at sunset, and, to add to our misfortunes, we were detained two hours at a small inn near Tamworth for the Dover coach, which brought an addition of a fat gentleman, who, weighing at least twenty stone, occupied a third of the interior of the two-horse vehicle in which we were to proceed. When our coachman saw his new passenger squeezing himself edge-ways out of his late conveyance, he exclaimed, with a shrug of his shoulders, in great astonishment and alarm, "My eye! a'n't he a burster? it might well be late; we shan't see the end of our journey this night." Preferring exposure to the rain to being crushed to a mummy with five insides upon two seats, I took my place with the coachman, who found it no easy task to steer us safely between the large stumps which lined the narrow opening, misnamed a road, through the forest of Norway pine. The darkness of the night was rendered more gloomy by the thick foliage of the trees; so, while the coachman attended to the intricate navigation, he requested me to "fix" the lamps, the oil and wicks being of so bad a quality as to fully occupy me in trimming and snuffing throughout thirteen most dreary miles. After twice breaking down, both of which accidents were placed to the credit of the fat man and his carpet bags, we succeeded in reaching Conway, seventy-three miles from Concord, by half past nine o'clock, after a fatiguing and rough journey of eighteen hours.

CHAPTER XXVI.

NOTCH IN THE WHITE MOUNTAINS—DESTRUCTION OF THE WILLEY FAMILY—AVALANCHES—MOUNT WASHINGTON.

The year was now so fast upon the wane, the days shortening, and the weather so intensely cold, that it required no small stock of resolution to enable one to desert a warm bed at a quarter to three in the morning, and encounter a keen northwester. In four hours we arrived at Bartlett, sixteen miles from Conway, when I walked out with my sketch-book while breakfast was preparing, for the purpose of attempting an outline of the fine mountain scenery, but could not command my pencil, and soon found my way back shivering to the house, where I esconced myself in a corner by the bright kitchen fire until the coach was once more ready to start. We were now hemmed in by lofty mountains, between which the road wound, preserving a level along the right bank of the Saco, a strong mountain torrent, which, notwithstanding the encroachments made upon it with strong embankments, only allowed sufficient space for a single carriage to pass in many places between the rocky barrier on the one hand and its impetuous waters, a considerable depth beneath, on the other. Numerous broad water-courses, which bore the marks of great periodical inundations when they are swollen to gigantic rivers, descend to it from the mountains' tops, being, as a gentleman, who was by chance my fellow-passenger, with great pathos expressed it, "as the veins and sinews to the human constitution." All vestiges of cultivation ceased from Bartlett until the seventh mile, when we arrived at a small farm in a solitary but pretty spot, which had been nearly carried away by the floods six years previously, with a loss of land of the value of 2000 dollars to the proprietor. Another hour's drive brought us to the Notch of the White Mountains, when I alighted from the coach with a request that my baggage should be left at an inn eight miles farther, and sat down by the road side to admire the awfully grand and sublime spectacle which the Notch presents.

The day which had been so cloudy and cold in the early part became more favourable, and the sun darted its invigorating rays through the clouds, resting on the summit of the bleak and precipitous rocks with which the valley is bounded. By degrees the light vapours arose, melting into air, or floating away gracefully and majestically, and laid open a scene which would defy the pencil of any artist to delineate faithfully. The Notch, as the terms implies, is a narrow pass, six miles in length, at the southern end of the White Mountains, the loftiest of which, Mount Washington, is 6234 feet above the level of the sea; but on each side of the pass they rise only from 1800 to 2000, at an angle of about 45°, forming a valley less than half a mile in width between their bases, and down which the roaring Saco takes its course. The whole extent of their front is furrowed and scarred by the tremendous storm of July, 1826; and the valley, choked up with trees uprooted by the roots, remnants of bridges, buildings, and huge masses of rock piled upon each other in the greatest disorder, presents what might be almost imagined as the wreck of nature. A melancholy and interesting story is connected with this storm, which will for years to come be the cause of thousands making a pilgrimage to the White Mountains. I give it as related to me by one who, though not an eye-witness, was in the immediate vicinity at the time it occurred; it was as follows:—A farmer of the name of Willey, with his wife, five children, and two labourers, occupied a house with a small farm at the upper end of the valley. They were much esteemed for their hospitable attentions to travellers, who, overtaken by night, sought shelter at their hearth, which was the only one in the Notch, their nearest neighbours being at the farm aforementioned, six miles distant. The hills at that time were thickly overgrown with forest trees and shrubs; nor had any thing ever occurred to make them suspicious of the safety of their position, until the descent of a small avalanche, or slide of earth, near the house, in the month of June, 1826, so terrified them by the havoc it caused, that they erected a small camp in what they deemed a more secure place, half a mile lower down the Saco. The summer had been unusually dry until the beginning of July, when the clouds collecting about the mountains poured forth their waters as though the floodgates of the heavens were opened, the wind blew in most terrific hurricanes, and continued with unabated violence for several days. On the night of the 26th of the month, the tempest increased to a fearful extent, the lightning flashed so vividly, accompanied by such awful howling of wind and roaring of thunder, that the peasant imagined the day of judgment was at hand. At break of day on the 27th, the lofty mountains were scarred with the numerous avalanches which had descended during the night. Every one felt anxious respecting the safety of the family in the valley, but some days elapsed before the river subsided so far from its extraordinary height as to allow any enquiries to be made. A peasant swimming his horse across an eddy was the first person who entered the Notch, when the terrible spectacle of the entire face of the hills having descended in a body presented itself. The Willeys' house, which remained untouched amidst the vast chaos, did not contain any portion of the family, whose bodies, after a search of some days, with the exception of two children, were discovered buried under some drift-wood within 200 yards of the door, the hands of Miss Willey and a labourer grasping the same fragment. They had all evidently retired to rest, and most probably, alarmed by the sound of an avalanche, had rushed out of the house, when they were swept away by the overwhelming torrent of earth, trees, and water. The most miraculous fact is that the avalanche, descending with the vast impetuosity an abrupt declivity of 1500 feet would give it, approached within four feet of the house, when suddenly dividing it swept round, and, carrying away an adjoining stable with some horses, it again formed a junction within a few yards of the front. A flock of sheep which had sought shelter under the lee of the house were saved; but the family had fled from the only spot where any safety could have been found, every other part of the valley being buried to the depth of several feet, and their camp overwhelmed by the largest avalanche which fell. A person standing in rear of the house can now with ease step upon the roof, the earth forming such a perpendicular and solid wall.

A small avalanche was seen descending from one of the mountains some days after the above occurrence. The thick pine forest at first moved steadily along in its upright position, but soon began to totter in its descent, and fell headlong down with redoubled fury and violence, followed by rivers of floating earth and stones, which spread over the plain, carrying devastation far and wide. The long heat of summer had so dried and cracked the ground that the subsequent rains found easy admission under the roots of trees, which, loosened by the violence of the wind, required but little to set the whole in motion. There was no tradition of a similar descent having ever taken place; but, upon a close examination, traces of one which had evidently occurred more than a century before could be discovered amongst the forest.

A chance stone rolling down the mountain's side, and a partridge starting up from under my feet during the time I was occupied in sketching, brought an involuntary shudder over my limbs, and the very idea of an avalanche descending and interring me alive caused me to hurry through my work and pursue my progress out of the lonely valley. The ground ascends gradually to the top, which is twenty feet wide, between lofty barriers of solid rock, the Saco and road both passing through this space, which was widened by blasting twenty-two years ago. Previous to that time the road passed over the summit of the rocks, at so precipitous a pitch that the farmers were obliged to carry their produce on its way to Portland over that part of the road themselves, assisting their horses by means of ropes and the bridle up the ascent. A sleigh, formed of two young pine-trees, in a few minutes enabled them to pursue their journey. The Saco rises a small flat opposite T. Crawford's inn, half a mile farther, from which to E. Crawford's, where I found my baggage, was four miles through an almost impenetrable forest.

There being no other visitors at this late season, my evenings were passed by the fire-side in listening to my host's lengthy stories about hunting the caribou, moose, deer, bears, and partridges, with which the mountains abound, and which he went in pursuit of with a gun of four feet barrel; or in sympathizing with him in his distress at what he considered his sole property being poached upon by no less a person than the proprietor of a rival hotel, which was opened within three-quarters of a mile, and, displaying a gaily painted sign of a lion (like a snarling cur) and an eagle, looking unutterable things at each other from opposite sides of the globe, had already attracted numerous guests. Mine host stated the merits of his case with great eloquence, and, from his having been the original guide, surveyor, and maker of the road up the mountain, he had some right to look upon the new comer in the light of an interloper. The spirit of rivalry had, however, proved of some service, having incited him to make considerable additions to his own house, all of which were run up with true American expeditions. The white pine was growing in the forest in January, and in June formed an inhabited house, the planks, which cost only five dollars per thousand, being kiln-dried as soon as they came from the saw-mill.

After waiting most patiently two days for the clouds to clear off, and afford me a sight of the lofty mountains, I resolved to take my departure the following morning, without attaining the grand object of my journey. Upon awaking on the 21st of October, after a violent stormy night, I found the window of my room thickly incumbered with frost. In an instant I sprang out of bed, and, seeing a clear blue sky, hurried on my dress, tumbled down stairs head foremost, minus hat, stock, and boots, but with pencils, paper, rubber, and board in hand, and throwing back the door of the house, rushed into the open air to seize the long-wished-for sketch, when, lo and behold! thick dark clouds hung more heavily about the mountain's brow than even on the preceding days. The wind, too, cut like a razor (that of the briny gods upon the equator, I mean,) so I darted up stairs again into my berth, and, burying my head under the clothes, blamed myself for not having selected a room which had one window at least towards the mountains. My host, however, consoled me at breakfast with the news that the wind was blowing the clouds away, and that my wishes would be gratified in the course of the day; but, upon my proposing to ascend Mount Washington, which was thickly covered with snow, the guide said that "he would not go up for a five dollar bill, for that it would require two men to hold my hat on." I therefore satisfied my climbing propensity for that day by ascending Mount Deception, which is well named, and affords ample fatigue for unambitious travellers. The prospect that the ensuing day would bring more moderate weather induced me to prolong my stay for the purpose of ascending the loftiest.

Mount Washington is nearly in the centre of a continued range running from north to south, each of which is named after the presidents of the United States in succession; but, as usual, one political party of the people will not consent to General Jackson's name being aggrandised or immortalised in the range of White Mountains. The height of the principal of this chain above the waters of the Connecticut River at Lancaster, 300 miles from the sea, is as follows: Washington, 5849 feet; Adams, 5382; Jefferson, 5280; Madison, 5038; Monroe, 4931; Quincy, 4470; Pleasant, or Jackson, 4338. T. Crawford's house is 635 higher than the Willeys', and 345 higher than E. Crawford's, which is 1069 feet above the Connecticut. Avalanches have descended from all the summits, and continued for a great distance along the level ground, the largest (which is from Mount Jackson) being upwards of four miles in length.

At half-past four, on the morning of the 22d of October, I set off in company with a guide for the foot of Mount Washington, leaving the selection of the road to my steed, which, having served a long apprenticeship, carried me safely through the huckleberry swamps and forest for six miles. We were detained a few minutes by some windfalls, which the guide cleared away with his axe; and after fording two small creeks, and the broad bed of the Ammonoosuck river four different times, we arrived at a place where the road being impassable for horses, we tied them to a tree and commenced the ascent. The guide favoured me with brief advice upon the thesis of "Festina lente," and, profiting by his hint of not commencing the journey at too rapid a pace, I led the way up a rough and steep path, which admitted of our walking only in Indian file. It became excessively precipitous at Jacob's ladder, 100 feet in height, which is formed of smooth angular stones, and could not be ascended except by assistance from the roots of neighbouring trees. The lower part of the mountain was covered with deep moss and forest, which diminished in growth as we ascended; the beach and mountain-ash gave way to spruce, which dwindled at every step, and at the cape of a long projecting ridge called the "Camel's Rump" it did not grow more than six inches high, the branches shooting out in long horizontal fibres, inclined towards the base, as if seeking shelter from the strong gusts of wind which sweep down the mountain's side. At Table Rock, two miles from the base, all vegetation ceased, excepting a few occasional patches of cranberries and coarse grass, which, half a mile farther, gave place to sharp glittering fragments of rock, partly overgrown with gray moss. All natural landmarks ceasing, small fragments of loose stones have been erected for the guidance of people who may be enveloped in the clouds. After climbing up one or two steep pitches, we gained the summit at a quarter past eight, having been an hour and three quarters in the performance of three miles from the base. The view from it is most extensive, nearly one hundred mountain tops rising beneath the feet like the billowy swellings of the ocean; but it did not, I must confess, altogether answer my expectations, nor, to my taste, was it equal to that from Mount Holyoke, where all was richness and life. Here was an unvaried view of mountain and dale alike covered with forest, the small settlements but indistinctly visible from such an altitude, and scarcely relieving so dark a mass. The course of the rapid Connecticut was marked out by the light morning mist floating over it; the green mountains of Vermont were visible eighty miles distant in the west; and a long streak of light, far away upon the eastern horizon, appeared to point out the waters of the broad Atlantic; but the sun shining brightly upon the surface of the vapours in the valleys rendered appearances so deceptive that it was difficult to distinguish between them and the numerous lakes with which that portion of the country abounds.

The summits of all the White Mountains, excepting that of Washington, which has a short flat ridge with a slight peak at each end, are rounded off, and composed of loose fragments of granite, which, at the distance of some miles, assumes the white appearance from which they take their name. The intense heat of the American summer usually thaws the snow upon them by the end of August, but this year it was found, during that month, nearly ten feet deep in the ravines upon the eastern side, and for several days had again covered the last mile of the ascent with a fresh coat. The walk had so heated me that when I sat down on the cold rock, to partake of our bread and cheese breakfast, with ice in lieu of water (the springs being frozen,) the keen air almost made my blood, which had been accustomed to warmer climes, freeze in my veins, the thermometer standing three degrees below the freezing point at nine o'clock, with a cloudless sky. The Ammonoosuck River, rising in a small pond between the summits of Washington and Madison, rushes down the declivity for 4000 feet, with a tumultuous uproar, and, taking its course past E. Crawford's house, flows into the Connecticut a few miles below Bath.

I found the descent more difficult, though more rapid, than the ascent, my feet slipping from under me several times upon the icy surface, and causing me to shoot farther ahead than my own free-will would have dictated. The guides have a great source of profit in the beavers with which the mountains abound, each skin producing a dollar. They take many hundreds of them, in the autumn, by means of traps composed of a larch tree, with a transverse one upon it, set along the side of the path at forty yards' distance from each other, and baited with meat. In two hours we gained the hotel, nine miles from the summit, and taking one of the common dearborns or wagons which was passing a few minutes after, and performed the duty of the mail in those rough roads, I proceeded thirteen miles through an uninhabited district to Bethlehem, the settlement of some new religious sect, and arrived at Littleton the same evening.

CHAPTER XXVII.

OLD MAN OF THE MOUNTAIN—MISS M'CRAE—WEST POINT—NEW YORK—PASSAGE TO LIVERPOOL.

The 23d, from sunrise to sunset, was cold and rainy; and the small village of Littleton, with its streams and sheets blocked up with rafters and piles of timber, presenting no inducement to move out, my morning was passed away in flattering the landlady's vanity, at the expense of my own taste, by praising a wretched daub (evidently the handiwork of some sign-painter) intended as a representation of her pretty daughter, and afterwards discussing state affairs with a weather-bound American traveller, who had settled it much to his own satisfaction, notwithstanding all my assertions to the contrary, that he was addressing a colonel high in command in the British army. No one upon earth, save a Yankee, could have discovered that I even held a commission of any degree; but he possesses a kind of sleight of hand method of undermining and grubbing out news. "Well but, Kernel, you are taking minutes, and intend publishing, I calculate? You can prepare your sketches for the type?" "Well now, I declare there is Ethan Crawford's and the White Mountains! a'int it so?" I thought the man must be a decided quizz, and resolved that he should not have all the sport to himself, so gave him a story or two, about the truth of which I wished him to be rather sceptical, of the finger-nails of the East Indian devotees growing through the back of their hands—the burning of widows—a banian-tree covering several acres of land—the Arab horses eating sheep's heads, and a long string of similar marvellous but daily occurrences. At the onset his countenance assumed a stare of the greatest admiration and astonishment; but when I brought the sheep's heads to bear in full force he rose from his chair, and, squirting a mouthful of tobacco juice into the grate, walked to and fro upon the floor of the room, with his hands in his pockets, whistling "Yankee Doodle," and thus made my triumph complete.

I rode out early the following morning to the iron-works at Franconia, about six miles distant. They are the property of a company, and produce a metal of soft, tough quality, considered superior to any in the States. The ore is found in considerable quantities in the hills, three miles distant, and supplies another foundry in the immediate vicinity; both establishments, however, are upon a small scale. Pursuing the Plymouth road for seven miles, I entered the Franconia Notch, a continuation of the White Mountain's range, and visited the "Profile of the Old Man of the Mountain," which is a most singular lusus nature. An exact representation of the human features, as seen in profile, is most correctly delineated by the hand of nature upon the brow of a bare rock nearly one thousand feet in perpendicular height. No art could improve the effect, nor could any attempt be made to assist it; for, the profile being seen perfect only from one point, the slightest deviation from that spot throws all into a confused mass. The upper part of the rock, too, upon which it appears, is so overhanging and free from shrubs for nearly two hundred feet, that all access to it is impracticable. One branch of the Penikese river, which subsequently takes the name of the Merrimac, rises in a small pond at its base, and opposite to Mount Lafayette, which is four thousand three hundred feet in height.

We set off the same afternoon in a mail cart drawn by one horse, over a hilly road and a good farming country, to the Connecticut river, which we crossed to Waterford in the State of Vermont. Walking into a small tavern at seven o'clock, during the time our solitary horse was relieving, we found a fine portly landlord, sitting with his legs crossed, reading a newspaper by the blaze of a cheerful wood fire. "Good evening, colonel," said the driver; "tarnal cold weather this." "Aye," answered the gallant officer, rising from his arm-chair to make room for us, and resembling a trundling hoghead of ale in colour and shape, as he moved towards the bar; "you are here sooner than I calculated; I've been at work fixing the road till sun-down, and making it as easy for you as I could by throwing dirt on it." So, in truth, it proved; for we could scarcely move two miles an hour through this marsh of his creation. I had frequently taken notice of this novel method of making or repairing a road in these parts of the States. The art consisted in first turning the ground up with a common plough, which was followed by a slightly curved, broad board, edged with iron, and a long handle attached, which, upon being elevated by the person who had the guidance of the machine, penetrated the loose earth, and scooped itself full, when, being again depressed, the load was moved by a yoke of oxen to that part of the road which required repairs, and not unfrequently was it emptied into a deep rut filled with water. The Americans in general are not much given to wasting time, labour, and expense upon the highways. During a journey of 1500 miles I did not see a solitary labourer employed upon them.

Three hours' cold drive over the same miserable roads took us by six o'clock on the morning of the 25th to Cabot, nine miles from Danville, where we had passed the night. Thence passing the pretty falls of the Winoskie, which rushed over a forest-crowned precipice by the road-side, we continued along the course of the stream to Montpelier, the capital of Vermont, containing 2000 inhabitants, and situated in a retired valley about half a mile wide, encircled by lofty hills, and at the junction of the Onion and Winoskie rivers. It was a day of election, and the State-house, a shabby looking edifice occupying one side of a square, was crowded with the inhabitants, amongst whom a great sensation had been created by the proposed removal of the seat of government to Burlington on Lake Champlain, thirty-eight miles distant.

Six horses took us rapidly from Montpelier along the margin of the Onion river, a narrow stream, but subject to heavy and sudden floods. The preceding year all the mills and factories at Middlesex, through which we passed, were carried away by the waters, and in many instances rough gravel beds, or plains of white sand, had been left in exchange for rich and fertile meadows. One house was pointed out to me as having floated three quarters of a mile from its original position, without much apparent injury; another had been left by the retiring of the waters on its gable end, and many had been swept away with all the proprietors' goods and chattels towards Lake Champlain. Not a bridge escaped uninjured: we crossed one, constructed entirely of thick planks, upon a similar principle, and with similar success, to the sloop "Experiment" at Washington. Symptoms of yielding to passing carriages early appeared, and the centre was now strengthened and supported by strong props from the bed of the river. The coachman pulled up for a few minutes to enable us to take a peep at the natural bridge near Bolton, the road passing within a few feet of the deep chasm at whose base it is formed. Appearances plainly demonstrate that the ridge which appears on each bank was originally connected, forming the dam of a large lake, and that the bridge was caused by the waters forcing the barrier, and the falling masses of rock becoming wedged in the narrow space. Four or five miles farther is seen the loftiest of the Green Mountains, known by the name of the Camel's Rump, from the form of its summit, which however bears a much closer resemblance to the Lion Couchant at the Cape of Good Hope. The whole journey from Montpelier was delightfully pleasant, and through a most romantic valley, from a quarter to half a mile in width, bounded by abrupt limestone rocks, which rose at intervals, with the lofty range of the Green Mountains in their rear. Extensive farms of rich alluvial soil occupied either side of the Onion river, and numerous picturesque villages were scattered over the face of a hilly and wooded country.

The sun had set ere we arrived within view of the buildings of the University of Vermont, which crown the eminence at the entrance to Burlington. My limited time would not admit of a stay of any duration, but it appeared, en passant, a neat, pretty town, built on a light sandy soil, rising gradually from the lake. Taking the steamer which touched at ten o'clock the same night on its passage from St. John's, on the Sorci river, we proceeded up Champlain, with a cabin full of fiery, hot-headed Clayites and Jacksonmen, each espousing the cause of his favourite candidate so warmly, that sleep was out of the question for any of the non-combatants. Fatigued with the length of my day's journey, I retired early to my berth for the purpose of inviting the drowsy god; but, the war of words waging louder and louder, I relinquished it, for the sake of learning whether any individual could possibly broach any thing new upon the subject. The only instance that occurred was in the person of a tall, broad-shouldered Kentuckian, some six feet two inches in height, who, to my infinite satisfaction, put an end to the discussion, and dispersed the entire conclave, by saying to a little Clayman, "You are a pretty sample of a white man, now a'nt you? I wish I had a tallow candle here to grease your head, and I would swallow you whole." The man of Clay, though little in body, was great in spirit, and, nothing daunted, drew himself up to his utmost height, which did not exceed five feet three, and bustling up to the tall Kentuckian he answered, with a warlike shake of his head, "You would find me a bitter pill, I guess." The several disputants, however, slunk off to their cots before the wrath of the western giant, and, in a few minutes more, all electioneering animosities appeared buried in temporary oblivion, or superseded by the long and deep-drawn breath which issued from their respective berths.

We passed the classical spot of Ticonderoga, the scene of so much bloodshed, at break of day, and arrived within a mile of Whitehall by eight o'clock, when, the river becoming too narrow for the steamer, the passengers walked to the town over a flat, swampy ground, and immediately after breakfast embarked in a packet boat, on the Champlain and Hudson canal. The piers were covered with people, who assembled to witness the starting of the opposition coaches and boats, which, as usual elsewhere, were exerting themselves to ruin each other. A steamer gained a quarter of an hour's start, but six horses towed us through the water at a half canter, and we overtook it upon the point of entering a lock, when it again gained a few minutes by leaving it full of water. Any one would have imagined that all the passengers had some great stake at risk, so laboriously did they toil at opening the gates, and exert themselves to gain upon their rival. The road running parallel with the canal, I stepped into a coach which was pursuing the same route, my baggage in the hurry being thrown ashore most unceremoniously. The steamer's progress through the water being impeded by having her paddles under the centre of the vessel, she was soon left far in the rear.

Two miles beyond the long straggling village of Fort Anne, we entered upon the military road constructed by General Burgoyne for the transportation of his batteaux and artillery, on the march from Quebec upon the Hudson in 1777, two months previous to his surrender at Saratoga. Portions of it are at this time in an excellent state of preservation, though upon the marshy ground it is formed of the trunks of trees à la corduroy. It takes nearly a direct line for the town of Sandy Hill, below which the British General threw a bridge of rafts across the river, and took post at Saratoga on the opposite bank. At the last named town, twenty miles from Whitehall, we gained the first view of the Hudson, which is here about 200 yards wide, and bounds, murmuring between high and well cultivated banks, over a succession of shallows, with a descent of seventy feet in a quarter of a mile. Descending the hill into Fort Edward, two miles farther, an aged pine tree, whose summit has been blasted by the lightning, is seen within a few yards to the right of the road. By the side of the spring at its foot, the melancholy murder of Miss McCrae was perpetrated by the Indians who accompanied Burgoyne's army in the disastrous expedition of 1777. This young lady, who resided at Fort Edward, was both beautiful and highly accomplished, and was contracted in marriage to a refugee officer of the name of Jones, in the British service, who, anxious that the union should take place, despatched a party of Indians to escort her to the British camp. In opposition to the wishes and entreaties of her friends, she willingly entrusted herself to their charge, but had proceeded only thus far upon the journey when they were met by another party, sent upon the same errand. A dispute arising about the promised reward (a barrel of rum), she was slain in a fit of savage passion by the chief, from whose hands she was snatched, and her scalp carried to her agonised lover, who was anxiously expecting the return of the parties, as a testimony that they had not failed in part performance of their commission. It is said that the officer died soon after of a broken heart. The Americans at that time industriously promulgated a report throughout the country, for the purpose of further incensing the people against the English, and widening the breach between the provinces and the mother country, that the unfortunate young lady had been murdered by the express desire of General Burgoyne, and that he had actually paid a reward to the Indians for her scalp. Such was the tenor of a letter from Gates, the American general, who did not hesitate in the most direct terms to accuse the British chieftain of so revolting a deed. Burgoyne's answer was spirited and manly: he said that, in this instance, he was induced to deviate from his general rule of "disdaining to justify himself against the rhapsodies of fiction and calumny," lest silence should be construed into an acknowledgment of the charge, at the same time expressing his abhorrence of the deed in these words: "By this motive, and upon this only, I condescend to inform you that I would not be conscious of the acts you presume to impute to me for the whole continent of America, though the wealth of worlds was in its bowels, and a paradise upon its surface." Dr. Emmons has charged the British with having committed similar barbarities during the late war, and doubtless for similar laudable purposes. The tree, with Miss McCrae's initials engraved upon it, still continues an object of veneration to the inhabitants of the village; and an old fashioned house was pointed out to me, near the outline of an ancient French fort, as being the residence of the unfortunate young lady. Her remains were removed eight or nine years since from the spot where she fell to Fort Edward Church.

Three miles below Fort Miller, the surface of the country becoming more broken, we crossed the river to the right bank. The canal, which runs parallel with the road, crosses at the same time, by means of a dam to lull the rapids thrown across the stream some distance below the bridge; and in a few minutes we arrived at Schuylerville, the scene of Burgoyne's surrender. The field in which the British laid down their arms is upon a long plain, between two ranges of heights, near the banks of the Hudson. We changed horses and coachman at the village, the latter mounting his seat in such a disgraceful state of intoxication that he could not even see the reins, but attempted to make amends by the use of his whip, with which he plied the horses so immoderately that they whirled us along at full gallop over hill and dale, with the coach at a most alarming vicinity to a fifty-foot precipice, whose base was washed by the river, with no defence nor guard between them. After he had twice fallen from his seat and injured himself severely, we resolved to run no further risks, but alighted upon the field of battle of Bemus' Heights, eight miles from Schuylerville, and, having taken a short inspection of the ground, proceeded onwards a-foot. A farmer overtaking us in his wagon, proposed to convey us to the next town, six miles distant, where we arrived about an hour after our baggage. After twice crossing the river again, once by bridge at Waterford, and by ferry at Troy, four miles lower down, we arrived at Albany, the capital of the state of New York, when the night was far advanced.

At eight o'clock the following morning, we proceeded in the Champlain, a splendid steamer, down the Hudson. The channel, for several miles below Albany, is intricate and shallow; the banks low, not well cultivated, and possessing but little interest, until we came to Cornsack landing, when they become more elevated, and the scenery gradually improves as the stream approaches the ocean. The lofty range of the Catskill Mountains are seen rearing their wooded summits to the height of 3600 feet, ten miles distant from the right bank, with the long white buildings of an hotel, the favourite rendezvous of New York fashionables in the summer season, at the cool elevation of 2200 feet above the Hudson. A few miles below, at Kingston and Redhook, is the only considerable group of gentlemen's country residences (in the English acceptance of the term) I had seen, which have more an air of aristocracy about them than the houses in any other part of the States I visited. They are pretty scattered along the margin of the river for an extent of several miles, with extensive pleasure grounds attached to them.

I took advantage of the steamer touching, to land at West Point, the seat of the Government Military Academy, 94 miles from Albany. It is situated in a romantic spot at the entrance to the Highlands, a mountainous rocky ridge, running parallel with the Hudson on both banks for twenty miles, and generally rising very abruptly from the water to various heights, from 800 to 1600 feet. The Cadets' Barracks, the same formal and substantially built edifices as elsewhere for similar purposes, with the houses of the commandant and officers attached to the institution, form nearly three sides of a square, with a parade-ground in the open space, upon a plain about 200 feet above the river. The rear is sheltered from the south and west by a hill 600 feet in height, crowned by the remains of a revolutionary fort, which are, as the Americans boast, the only ruins in the United States. In a recess at an angle of the parade-ground, a white marble monument is inscribed with the name of Kosciuszko, the Polish patriot, who resided in a small house on the sloping bank of the river, and occupied much of his time in cultivating a garden, which still bears marks of his industry and taste. West Point was one of the strongest American holds during the war of independence, and is celebrated as being the cause of the unfortunate Major André's death. Colonel Beverly Robinson's house, which was confiscated in consequence of the active part the proprietor took in bringing about the conference between André and Arnold, is on the opposite side of the river, and visible from the parade-ground.

The institution received its first organization by an act of Congress in 1812. The number of students is limited to 250, all of whom are educated and maintained at the expense of the general government, the annual cost of each being about 72*l.* sterling. At this time there are nearly the full complement, being a much greater number than is required for the officering of the small American standing army of 6000 men; but many of those educated here prove of infinite service in the superintendence of public works as civil engineers, and in organizing the militia. The average number of those who are commissioned in the regular army from the academy but little exceeds one third of those who are entered at it; about one eighth are discharged, and the remaining proportion resign. They are permitted to enter between the ages of 14 and 22, preferences being given to the applications of the sons of officers engaged in the revolutionary war; and next to the sons of officers killed in action, or the sons of deceased officers who were engaged during the last war with Great Britain. The system of education and military drill are taken closely from that of the French, and I verily believe that the Americans would give the preference to a system which emanated from that nation, though it were inferior to that in practice in England. The drills are lately arrived Irish upon the Madawaska river, these were the first British settlers we had seen since leaving the veteran's house upon Temiscouta lake, and from this specimen we were almost justified in forming but a mean opinion of the New Brunswickers' hospitality.

Twenty miles farther brought us to the Great falls, where we again landed, the portage commencing at the rather dangerous vicinity of about one hundred and fifty yards above them, the influence of the cataract being very evident upon canoes which must cross the river to gain the entrance of the portage, situated in a small circular bay. The surface of the river is perfectly smooth and unbroken until it gains the very edge of the rock, when it is precipitated seventy feet in a sheet of amber-coloured foam into a narrow and rocky channel, not exceeding thirty-five in breadth, down which it boils and bubbles for the space of half a mile, and then expands into its original width of about one hundred and fifty yards. There is a tradition, though seemingly not a very probable one, that several canoes of Mohawk Indians, who had attacked a tribe near the source of the river, and massacred all, excepting two old squaws, were (accompanied by their prisoners) floating down with the current at night, and were to a man dashed to pieces over the falls, of whose existence they had not even the most remote idea. The squaws aware of the circumstance perished with them, not wishing to survive the destruction of their tribe. Sitting upon the rough crags on the margin of the cataract, we made a late dinner upon the last remains of our shoulder of mutton, sacrificing the well-picked bone to the shades of the old squaws and the Grand falls.

The river banks, formed of a hard rock, with light covering of soil, exceed one hundred feet in height above the falls, and more than two hundred half a mile below them. The man who conveys the boats across the portage* earns a good livelihood by his two-fold occupation of farmer and boat-carrier. Our canoe, with the baggage in it, was drawn along a winding road on a sledge by two oxen, and launched again into the water half a mile below for a quarter of a dollar. Timber was formerly drawn up on the level of the bank, and then launched again into the water down an inclined plane, but this system was soon abandoned as too expensive, and it is now allowed to shoot the falls, which in the freshets but little injures it.

For seven or eight miles the current carried us on with great velocity over the "White Rapids," the "Black Rapids," and a series of others, all sufficiently dangerous to encounter without a skilful pilot, and we landed at dusk near a small log hut, the first we saw after leaving the portage. The banks had continued a hundred feet in height, and covered with a dense pine forest, but we frequently passed groups of woodsmen bivouacking by their fires at the water's edge after their day's labour had ceased. Throwing part of the baggage over my shoulder, I walked up to the hut, through whose small window the bright light of the wood fire could be seen blazing cheerfully, and knocking at the door walked in, and found a family of seven, who welcomed me most hospitably. My companions following me, we joined the circle, and, after enjoying a bowl of excellent milk, asked the settler's history. He had been a comrade of the veteran upon the lake, and had been settled there at the same time, when his nearest neighbour lived at twenty miles' distance. He had now one within six miles, but considered it no advantage, and would rather that people did not settle so near to him, as he should then have no fear of quarrelling. Part of his house had been washed away by the freshets during the spring of the previous year, and, although it was twenty feet above the level of the river, the water had stood five feet five inches in his kitchen, which was the only room he had remaining. This summer, too, the bears had destroyed thirteen sheep and four hogs of his stock, but he had yet twenty-three sheep remaining, and two cows. The only neighbours, however, he did not appear, in any manner, to approve, were the Americans, whose boundary was within five miles. He said that he had been over amongst some of them lately, and told them that they had better be silent upon the subject of the boundary question now, for that New Brunswick had a governor who had just been most satisfactorily arranging the same kind of a dispute in the East Indies.

As the night was advanced, wishing to obtain a few hours' sleep, I threw my wet great coat upon the floor before the blazing hearth, as the most comfortable berth I could select; but the settler's wife would so positively insist upon Mr. Reid and myself taking possession of the only bed in the room, upon which, she asserted, "she had just placed new blankets for our express comfort," that I was compelled most reluctantly to relinquish it, while the settler and his son went out and sought a night's rest amongst the straw in the stable. I had heard from the boatman on the Madawaska river that the house was not celebrated for its cleanliness, and a sight of the bed convinced me that there must be very substantial reasons for its fame having spread through hundred miles of nearly uninhabited country; so I walked out of the house with the intention of sleeping in the open air, and thus avoid giving any affront to our hostess, but the mist rose so thick and cold from the water, and remembering the story of the bears, I thought it more prudent to undergo a night's tortures within doors. On returning into the house, I found my friend already between the far-famed blankets: the boatman had taken up my comfortable position on the hearth: the children were lying upon a bed at the foot of ours, and the settler's wife sat in a chair watching the fast dying embers. I was somewhat puzzled to discover how Mr. Reid had contrived to turn in; for I had no idea of risking myself otherwise than in my clothes, and, after considerable manoeuvring, took an opportunity, when the settler's wife turned her head, to spring in, and strongly intrenched myself up to the chin between the coverlid and upper blanket. My friend had taken up a similar strong position, and was almost choked with attempting to smother his laughter. We were not such old soldiers, however, as to outmanoeuvre the enemy in this manner; for swarms of light infantry poured down upon us in every direction; and most stoically did we bear their attacks for the short time we were awake, but the fatigues of the day soon caused us to be unconscious of every thing that was passing. Towards morning I was awakened by some heavy weight upon my feet, and, at first, took it for a visit of the night-mare; but arousing my senses a little, and feeling it move, I was convinced it must be one of the children; so out of gratitude for our accommodation I could not remove it, but endured the evil, until rising to depart upon our voyage I discovered that it was a large black dog which had favoured us with his company.

Two hours brought us to the mouth of the Aroostook river, and Stobec, a small Indian village on the opposite bank. Landing where we saw a bark canoe drawn up on the beach, we fortunately met a staff officer, who had been up the Aroostook to check some aggressions of the American lumberers in the forests on the disputed territory, and was now on his return to Fredericton. We proceeded in company through a fertile and from this time well-inhabited country, with fine bold scenery at every turn of the stream, and at night arrived at Woodstock, about sixty miles below the falls and half a mile from the river, where we found a comfortable little inn, kept by an American. The division of the counties, which had only lately taken place, had not been publicly stated more than three or four days, and Woodstock, which had formerly been in the county of York, was now the capital of the new formed county of Carleton. At present, it is but a small village, though doubtless, ere many years have passed, it will be one of the most considerable towns in the province, being situated in the most fertile part, and already possessing a large agricultural population. Persons anxious for posts under government, and to establish themselves with the earliest foundation of the town, were flocking in from all directions; no fewer than three surgeons and four attorneys had already arrived, though there was neither fee nor food for one of them. The small and formerly quiet village had already divided opinions and clashing interests, and numerous little jealousies and bickerings had arisen. It is a straggling place, settled partly upon a creek near the river, and partly upon the high ground where the inn was; so each party wished to establish their own spot as the site of the capital, and derive the advantage of having the public buildings there.

The evening gun, from the American garrison of Houlton, only five miles distant, can be distinctly heard at Woodstock; and as we were descending the river on the 11th of September, we caught a glimpse of Mar's Hill, upon which the boundary monument has been erected. Large as the St. John's river is, it is rendered utterly unnavigable by the numerous rapids, where, in many places, the depth does not exceed three feet. The beach every where was strewn with fine timber, which had been left by the falling of the spring freshets, and which could not now arrive at the port of exportation before the ensuing year, and flat-bottomed provision-boats can with difficulty reach Woodstock on the third day from Fredericton. The scenery throughout the St. John's is of a superior order to the generality of that in America, and becomes bolder and more beautiful as the river nears the ocean; but the land decreases in fertility in an equal ratio every succeeding mile below Woodstock. The falls of the Pokeok at its junction with the St. John's, seen through a wooded and rocky chasm, and an Indian village with some fine drooping elms upon a bold undulating country a few miles lower down, are exceedingly picturesque objects.

With the exception of Woodstock, it cannot be said that there is any settlement which can come under the denomination of a village between the Green river and Fredericton, a distance not short of two hundred and twenty miles. In many parts, as at Madawaska, a narrow riband of farms extends along the banks of the St. John, and stretches back from a quarter to a mile inland. Three or four tribes also of Indians have their strange-looking collection of bark-built wig-wams huddled together upon the headlands formed by the junction of the Tobique and other tributary streams: the chief's house is usually distinguished from the rest by having a flag-staff alongside of it, or the roof being rather more elevated. The costume of the females struck me as much gayer than that of the tribes I had previously seen in the Canadas. Their dress here was generally of brilliant and gaudy colours, with their black hats encircled by a broad silver band. The men, who appeared to subsist chiefly upon fishing in the summer season, had the same heavy and forbidding countenances I had observed amongst the Seneca and Iroquois tribes. I was informed, however, by officers of the army, and agents who had superintended the annual distribution of presents from the British government to the tribes upon the borders of Lake Huron, that fine athletic warriors of the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, with noble features, used to attend upon those occasions with one side of their face painted sky blue, and the other chequered with vermilion and bright yellow; but all whom I saw fell very far short of the natives of Bengal and Pegu both in stature and countenance.

At ten o'clock on the night of the ninth day from our leaving Quebec, we arrived at Fredericton, three hundred and fifty miles distant, rejoiced beyond measure that our fatiguing expedition was at an end. The cramping attitude of sitting crouched at the bottom of the canoe for sixteen hours, during four successive days, without being able to change that position, lest the heavily laden and frail vessel should capsize, was irksome and overpowering in the extreme. But when our troubles and vexations were over, as usual we laughed heartily at all our adventures; and, taking it all in all, I may fairly say that I enjoyed this journey more than any other portion of my travels on the continent of America. Our provisions had been rather short, and the bread on the fourth or fifth day became so excessively sour, from alternate wet and exposure to the sun, that it was unwholesome as well as unpalatable, and began to affect us seriously. Nor had our night's rest been sought upon couches of the softest and most fleecy down; but, in the enjoyment of good health, other matters were of trifling moment, and soon consigned to oblivion.

CHAPTER XXII.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE—SPIRIT OF EQUALITY—DISPUTED BOUNDARY.

After the separation of New Brunswick from Nova Scotia, in 1785, Colonel Carleton was appointed governor of the new province, and selected a spot on the right bank of the river, where Fredericton now stands, as the site of the capital. The situation is good, being the head of the tide-water and the sloop navigation. Though ships of large burden can ascend to the mouth of the Oromocto, from twelve to fifteen miles below, yet merchandise is usually forwarded from the sea-port ninety miles distant by small craft, the Falls of St. John, two miles from the harbour, preventing the passage of large vessels except at high water. The town consists of two principal streets, running parallel with the river, and contains about 1200 inhabitants, but as yet has no regular market nor fair. The point of land upon which it is built is flat and low, being but a few feet above the level of the freshets. A low range of rocky hills, however, rises half a mile in

* Owing to the numerous rapids on the river St. John, these portages or carrying-places are frequent. The eastern provinces, more especially New Brunswick, are so intersected with streams, whose sources are in the immediate vicinity of each other, that the whole country may be traversed by means of them with very little difficulty: and, in short, the rivers are the highways of the province. The Grand Temiscouta portage is of an extraordinary length, being thirty-six miles over a mountainous country, and very little used, except by casual travellers, but some of the navigable streams are within two miles of each other, yet flowing in opposite directions.

After beating a few hours to windward in order to weather the cape, we were enabled to bear up the channel with studding-sails set, and were off Holyhead the following evening, when time again hung heavily on our hands. It was Sunday night, and the pilots preferred continuing their carousals to noticing the numerous rockets, blue lights, and signal guns we fired, and kept us beating on and off shore in equally unpleasant weather, until daylight, when one of them took charge of the ship, and gave us the first news of a Dutch war. As usual in such cases, the accounts were greatly exaggerated; but he had more compassion than a Cork pilot, who, three days previously, boarded a vessel in which an acquaintance of mine was passenger, and destroyed the whole Russian fleet, with only the loss of a few English line-of-battle ships; yet, the information was such as to raise the military barometer of the officers on board to the highest degree. The wind veered a-head during the two following days, which time barely sufficed to beat to the mouth of the Mersey, a distance of fifty miles; nor did we land amongst the hazy and dark buildings of Liverpool until the nineteenth day from our leaving New York bay: a fourth of this our short passage had been most provokingly swallowed up by the few miles of the Irish channel.

"You might easily pass muster as one of us; for I should never have imagined you to be the countryman of these sturdy fellows," said an American fellow-passenger to me, as we were pushing our way through the dense crowd on the quay the following morning, and escorting our baggage to the Custom House, where it was passed in due time; and after the payment of half a crown for "specimens of minerals" (videlicet, a lump of Schuylkill coal, cedar from the tomb of Washington, splinter from the vessel which was carried over the Falls of Niagara, and part of Termination Rock from under them, with divers other such valuable relics,) I was soon again trundling rapidly in a good coach along the smooth roads, and amid the well-cultivated lands of the broad-shouldered sons of Old England.

THE END.

SONNETS TO ROSALIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE VILLAGE POORHOUSE."

There is a quiet cot, its walls are white
And covered o'er with foliage green and deep,—
And round the casement clustering wall-flowers creep,
And in link'd arches o'er the porch unite.
Retired and calm that humble hut is placed
In a warm valley,—and the smoke upcurls,
From the near village, fantastic whirls
Above the sheltering trees. Embowered, and graced
By their rich covering, stands that modest dome;
The light gate closed before it, and all round
The gravel'd path, pinks, daisies, deck the ground:—
That simple cot is mine,—my bosom's home,—
My heart's own resting-place, for ever fair,
For thou, my Rosalie, art smiling there!

I look into the past! and see thee there,
Laughing, yet chaste'n'd in thy young heart's glee;
And o'er that brow, unshadow'd yet by care,
The rich brown tresses clust'ring wild and free;
Thy bosom heaving with delicious sighs
That speak of aught but sorrow,—and the cheek
Flushing with unknown fancies,—and thine eyes
Speaking more tenderly than words can speak—
Thou lov'st me!

And within those eyes I gaze,
Bright with the pure soul's brightness; and thy smile
Reproves in vain—and only tempts—the praise
Of lips by smiling made more sweet the while!
And there thou standest with that glistening eye,
Blushing in youth's first love, my Rosalie!

I see thee, Rosalie!—thy charms the same,
But mellow'd and more lovely;—on thy knee
A fair-hair'd infant laughs with childish glee,
Or clings around thy neck to lisp thy name!
Still art thou beautiful; and as thy head
Is bent to kiss its cheek, thy tresses brown,
Floating in wavy ringlets loosely down,
O'er the fair features of the child are spread,
Which sleeps within their shadow.—

At thy feet
Stands the light cradle, and I see the place
Thy slumbering babe within it, and thy face
Grows bright as listening to its breathings sweet,— Thou gazest on its rest, so soft and mild,
And callest on thy God to guard thy child!

Traditionary Stories

AND LEGENDARY ILLUSTRATIONS.

BY ANDREW PICKEN,

AUTHOR OF THE "DOMINIE'S LEGACY," &c. &c.

INTRODUCTION.

The following stories are taken from a work just received from London, entitled "Traditionary Stories of old Families, and Legendary Illustrations of Family History," by the author of the "Dominie's Legacy," a book which has not, we believe, been printed in America. This new work comprises, besides the two longest we have selected, a few very brief legendary illustrations of minor interest, particularly in this country.

It appears to be the design of the author to continue his labours, and not to confine himself to Scotland; he says in the preface, "future volumes will, he trusts, show how much it is his own wish to avoid the charge of national partiality." He returns thanks to the early friends of the plan, who by patronising it in its early stage, or by supplying information for the present, or offering it for future volumes, have encouraged him to the publication. Among the names thus introduced, is a long list of dukes, duchesses, marquesses and marchionesses, earls, the Lord Chancellor and other lords, &c. &c., and last not least, Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Southey, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Wordsworth, Mr. Moore, and others. We are confident these tales will be received with favour by the public; the second in particular, is a story of great power and pathos. We shall look for the future volumes with anxiety, and if of equal merit, shall lay them before our readers.

LADY BARBARA OF CARLOGHIE,

AND

THE JOHNSTONS OF FAIRLY.

A STORY OF THE DOMINIE.*

THE DOMINIE'S PROGRAMME.

It was whilst living dull and solitary in my upland dwelling of Balgownie Brae, in the west of Scotland, and sliding listlessly on towards the evening of life, that I at one time took a plaintive thought concerning sundry events in my own history; and recalled, with an inward sadness, various illusory enchantments of my youthful days. In particular I reflected, in reference to those wanderings of mine, in the course of which I had gathered together so many records of by-gone good and evil, that there was one district of my country, to me associated with many interesting recollections, which I had not visited for above twenty moralising and regretful years.

And yet, several times of late, I had ventured towards the exterior margin of this peculiar spot, and had traced out, by the help of fancy, the green holms of Ruar water; and even seen against the evening sky the embattled turrets of old Carloghie, rising venerable o'er its sweeping woods; reminding me of promising fancies that had

* To those who have not met with a book called "The Dominie's Legacy," it may be necessary to state, that the idea is of a simple and benevolent old man—an abortive clergyman of the Kirk of Scotland, afterwards a teacher or dominie—who, becoming independent in his latter years, indulges his propensity for wandering about over the country, making his observations, and hearing and gathering old and quaint stories, in all of which the honest Dominie felt himself much interested. These he is supposed to write at his leisure, in his bachelor home; and not having the courage to publish them himself, leaves them to the author as a "legacy" for the edification of the world.

ended in nothing, and hopes whose very recollection lay in the mists of oblivion. But more than a Pisgah sight of these well known haughs, it neither answered my pride nor my prudence to take; for, occurrences had happened to myself which deeply moved my feelings—and I would not be the first to seek out those who sought not me, nor run the hazard of meeting with one, whose presence could only stir up most painful thoughts. Many a tale I have told, of the loves of others—and how the young were tried in regard to their heart's wishes, and the old were disappointed in the ambitions of life. But the simple egotisms of my own experience, and how I was vexed at the heart concerning a certain female, it does not become me to open out to the world.

The dismal time of the year was yet at its worst, for it was one dreary and dropping afternoon in the dark month of January, when these sombre musings came over my mind like a heavy cloud, reminding me of tenderness long gone by, and anticipations of joy which had melted away like the summer's sleet, and left nothing behind them, but a yearning of the heart. As I looked at the leafless trees round my dwelling, through whose naked boughs the cold wind of winter was mournfully whistling; and bethought me of the barren bachelor sterility, left at this late time of life without an object on which to let out the sympathies of my nature; and observed how the naked trees, like myself, stretched forth their bald arms towards the heavens, waiting for the genial days of spring life, which would soon return to them, but never again to me—the weakness of feeling broke out upon me, as it had been the dissolving clouds; and, like Rachel in the scripture, I wept for my children because they were not.

Anon, this weakness passed away, and I wiped with shame my solitary tears; for I reflected, that unavailing regret was but one of Solomon's vanities; seeing that it is not in the nature of Time's things to fill up the secret cravings of the affections. So, like others, I comforted myself in my sadness with the general discount, and resolved that when the warm spring should again return, I would take up my wallet and my staff, and set forth as I was wont, would once more venture to seek the gowans by Fairly Burn, and explore the sunny woods of sweet Carloghie.

The long winter at length passed over, and spring, as the song says, began to "cleed the birken shaw," when my time of travelling being come, I prepared to set forth with my face turned towards the pleasant south. The very evening, however, before my intended departing considerations began to press upon my thoughts, which almost tended to change my whole resolves. What the considerations precisely consisted of, it were tedious to the reader, at present, to amplify. But they pertained to that mixture of pride and delicacy, which may exist between persons who have known each other long, the circumstances that grow out of the changes of things, we know not how, but which fate or fortune is constantly bringing about, to disappoint our auguries of what is to happen to ourselves.

I had nearly made up my mind against my journey to this quarter, when looking forth from my window, I perceived, to my surprise, the postman with his bag coming slowly up the avenue. A sealed envelope was put into my hands, and I found myself addressed in the following unusual manner:—

"Carloghie Castle, 1st May 17—

"As there is a time, dear sir, for all things that are done in the world, so there ought to be a period, when reasons may be given for our darkest acts; and when, at least, may take pen in hand, to solicit the kindly recollections of an old friend. It is due to you; and has been, that I should explain in person various matters that might appear mysterious in my conduct a few former years.
